THE LITERARY CHRONICLE

And Weekly Review;

Forming an Analysis and General Repository of Literature, Philosophy, Science, Arts, History, the Drama, Morals, Manners, and Amusements.

This Paper is published early every Saturday Morning; and is forwarded Weekly, or in Monthly or Quarterly Parts, throughout the British Dominions.

No. 86.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 1821.

Price 6d.

Address to the Public.

If custom had not rendered it almost imperative, that, at the commencement of every new volume, the Editor should say something of himself and of his work, our delicacy would have induced us to have omitted it. To the readers of the LITERARY CHRONICLE, it cannot now be necessary to state the circumstances under which it was commenced; its objects, or how far these objects have been accomplished; but, in a time of unparalleled competition in periodical literature, when every species of empiricism is resorted to, and when works which, from the time they have been in existence, might be supposed to be established,—when such impose their youth on the public and are announced as new literary journals, then it becomes necessary that we should re-state the grounds on which we found our claims to public patronage and support.

The professed object of the LITERARY CHRONICLE was to give a review and analysis of every new work of value or importance as soon as published, and to form a faithful register of every novelty in Literature, Philosophy, the Fine and Useful Arts, Biography, the Drama, &c. and to insert Original Communications on all subjects that might be conducive to the happiness or the improvement of its readers.

How far this promise has been kept, we might proudly appeal to the Index of the last volume, and then leave our readers to determine. The Review department contains nearly two hundred new works, including every expensive and valuable production of the year, and with which our readers were immediately made acquainted. We have more than once stated that the LITERARY CHRONICLE is a Review of Books, but not a Bookseller's Review. The distinction is of much more importance than it may at first seem, for the one is free and unfettered, while the other must sacrifice its independence for profit sheets and anticipatory inspection. It is, however, a matter of proud satisfaction to us, that the character and the circulation which the LITERARY CHRONICLE continues to maintain, have been earned by means the most legitimate, and that its bold independence has been abundantly compensated in the extent of the public patronage.

In the outset of our labours, we pledged ourselves that the LITERARY CHRONICLE should never be raised in price, nor diminished in its contents; that promise we have not only kept, but, notwithstanding that it is the cheapest periodical work published, yet such has been our support, that we are enabled to extend our liberality. We commence the present volume on a much finer paper; and, in deference to the suggestions of many of our readers, we have adopted the plan of printing it in three columns. Our stamped edition, entitled THE COUNTRY LITERARY CHRONICLE, will share the same improvements, and continue to be published at the price of Tenpence. Gratitude for past favours and the hopes of increased patronage urge us to new exertions in every department, and we trust that the LITERARY CHRONICLE will go on improving in its contents, and in diffusing itself still more extensively every succeeding year. The LITERARY CHRONICLE, like all other works, must depend on time and exertion for its improvement, and though we will not, like a monthly contemporary, tell our readers, by anticipation, the very titles of the articles for the next twelve months, we can assure them that we have made new arrangements of considerable importance.

To those friends whose communications form a valuable part of our work, we return our most sincere and grateful thanks, as well as to the Public generally. With the commencement of a new Volume, we hope materially to increase our subscribers; since the LITERARY CHRONICLE presents one advantage over every other journal, viz. that each Volume is in itself complete.

Review of New Books.

WINE, BEER, AND BREAD.

1. A Treatise on the Art of making Wine from Native Fruits; exhibiting the Chemical Principles upon which the Art of Wine Making depends; the Fruits best adapted for Home-made Wines, and the Method of preparing them. By Fredrick Accum, Operative Chemist, &c. 12mo. pp. 92. London, 1820.
2. A Treatise on the Art of Brewing; exhibiting the London Practice of brewing Porter, Brown Stout, Ale, Table Beer, and various other kinds of Malt Liquors. With Copper-plates. By the same. 12mo. pp. 208. London, 1820.
3. A Treatise on the Art of making Good and Wholesome Breads, of Wheat, Oats, Rye, Barley, and other Farinaceous Seeds. Exhibiting the Chemical Constitution and Alimentary Properties of different kinds of Bread Corn, and other Substances employed in different Parts of the World, instead of Bread. By the same. 12mo. pp. 160. London, 1821.

It will be in the recollection of all our readers, that, about twelve months ago, Mr. Accum, who has the reputation of a skilful analyser, published a work which, if it did not, as Dr. Prolix says, 'occasion a great laugh at the time,' certainly excited considerable interest. This was a 'Treatise on Adulterations of Food and Culinary Poisons,' in which he, to the great terror of all epicures and hypochondriacs, declared that almost every article that we eat or drink is poisonous. In vain did we quit our wine or our brandy, and take to 'entire butt beer,' for we were instantly told that it was 'a very heterogeneous mixture, composed of all the waste and spoiled beer of the publicans,—the bottoms of the butts,—the leavings of the pots,—the drippings of the machines for drawing the beer,—the remnants of the beer that lay in the leadens pipes of the brewery,' &c. To fly to tea was useless, for he assured us that he had examined 27 samples of imitation leaves. In coffee, we were no better, for it was only pigeon's-beans and peas. At last, we determined to drink nothing but water; but here the persecuting spirit followed us, and we were forbidden to touch this simple beverage until we had ascertained that it contained the due proportions of common air and carbonic acid gas. Soda-water, cream, custards, confectionery, pickles, and sauces, bread and cheese, cum multis aliis, filled up the sordid catalogue of the miseries to which eating and drinking subjected us. It was in vain to protest that we had dieted on them for many years, and enjoyed good health, for, like Partridge, the Almanack Maker, who contradicted Swift's assertion, that he was dead, we were not believed. Our only remedy now appeared to be in calling in the assistance of the physician, with an antidote to the thousand poisons we had swallowed; but Mr. Accum would not even leave us this consolation, for he declared that 'nine-tenths of the most potent drugs and chemical preparations used in pharmacy, are vended in a sophisticated state by dealers who would be the last to be suspected.' Nothing, we found, would now save us, but to muster up courage and make an exertion of common sense; to burn Mr. Accum's book, and to drink our wine, sip our brandy, and trifle over our custards and confectionery as usual. This saved us.

Mr. Accum, after sounding the tocsin of alarm, and suffering it to operate for nearly 12 months, now comes forward to remove it, so far as relates to three important articles, of the poison and adulterations of which he had dwelt largely,—wine, bread, and beer. Should these books be successful, we doubt not but that, in the course of ten or a dozen years, he will gradually remove all the terrors of his first publication, and teach us how to make our pickles, sauces, and confectionery in the most wholesome and most economical manner.

In the Treatise on Wines, Mr. A. gives a concise description of the art of preparing the several varieties, from the fruits of domestic growth. He also states the destructive characters of British fruit wines, and their chemical difference from the wine of the grape. The 'historical sketch of the art of making wine,' with which the work commences, is very imperfect, particularly so far as relates to Britain. We are barely told that the vine was introduced here by the Romans, and appears to have very soon become common; that 'few ancient monasteries did not manufacture wine. In an early period of the history of Britain, the Isle of Ely was expressly denominated the Isle of Vine, by the Normans. The Bishop of Ely, shortly after the conquest, received at least three or four tuns of wine, annually, as tithes from the vines in his dioceses, and in his leases he made frequent reservations of a certain quantity of wine, by way of rent.' We now pass on to the most important part of the subject,—the art of making wines. Home made wines differ chiefly from foreign or grape wines, 'in containing a much greater quantity of malic acid, whilst the wine of the grape contains chiefly tartareous acid.' The British fruits most capable of being converted into wine, besides grapes, are the gooseberry, elderberry, mulberry, raspberry, blackberry, strawberry, red currant, black currant, white currant, and cranberry. These ferment well and afford good and wholesome wines. Without carrying our readers through the processes of fermentation, racking and sulphuring, barrelling and clarifying of wine, we shall extract a few of Mr. Accum's recipes for making such wines as are most common; and first, of—

Gooseberry Wine.—'Take 50lbs. of immature gooseberries, freed from the remains of the blossoms and fruit stalks, bruise them in successive portions, in a wooden tub, without much compressing the husk, or bruising the seeds; dilute the mass with four gallons of water, and after having suffered it to stand for ten or twelve hours, put it into a coarse canvas bag, and squeeze out the liquor.

'Pour upon the residue one gallon of water, suffer it to macerate for twelve hours, and then press it out, and add the produce to the before-obtained juice. Put the whole of the liquor into a tub, and add to it from 30 to 40lbs. of white loaf sugar, according to the desired strength and sweetness of the wine, and 1lb. of finely pulverized crude super-tartrate of potash.

'Stir this mixture, and make up the total bulk of the fluid with water, to the amount of 10½ gallons; cover it with a blanket or sacking, and let it stand in a moderately warm place.

'In a day or two, the fluid will begin to ferment, and when the yeast froth, which appears on the surface, has assumed a uniform texture, skim it off, and repeat the skimming from time to time, till no more yeast becomes separated. When the fermentation has so far been completed, draw off the liquor from the dregs, or lees, into a cask, which must be completely filled with the wine.

'A small quantity of yeast will continue to become separated, and overflow the bung-hole, in consequence of the slow fermentation in the cask, and hence the quantity of liquor diminishes; the loss thus sustained, must be made up by adding, from time to time, a portion of the liquor which was made for that purpose, so as to keep the cask always filled up to the bung-hole.

'When the fermentation has nearly ceased, the bung may be put loosely into its place; but a small hole must be bored by the side of the bung-hole, and loosely fitted with a peg, to give vent for the extrication of the carbonic acid that may become developed. When no farther froth appears, the vent-peg must be withdrawn, the spile may then be tightened, and the cask left undisturbed for five or six months; after which time, the wine should be drawn off from its lees into another cask; and if it is not fine, it may be rendered so by the addition of a small quantity of isinglass dissolved in water, which will render it clear in a few days, after which it may be bottled and stored in a cool cellar.

'Should the wine be too sweet, the fermentation, (before it is drawn off from its lees,) may be re-excited by stirring up the contents of the cask, and suffering it to repose in a warm place. By this means an additional portion of the undecomposed sugar which it contains will disappear. The wine may then be decanted. Sometimes it is necessary to decant it a second time, into a clean cask, after it has been suffered to stand two months. In any case it must be bottled during the month of March, provided that the wine is become perfectly clear; if not, some mistake has been committed in the manufacture of it.'

Wine from ripe gooseberries may be made in a similar manner to what has been just stated, a more careful exclusion of the husks and seeds being necessary. For,—

Brik Gooseberry Wine.—'Let 40lbs. of unripe gooseberries be mashed, and having poured upon the mass one gallon of water, squeeze out the juice, add to it 12lbs. of lump sugar, and six ounces of super-tartrate of potash, previously reduced to a fine powder; suffer the liquor to ferment in a tub for about two days only, and then transfer it into a cask, and attend to the process of replenishing the waste liquor by filling up the cask from time to time, till the fermentation has so far subsided, that the hissing noise which is heard at the bung-hole is but slightly perceptible. The bung of the cask may then be fastened down, and also the spile, and the cask left undisturbed, in a cool cellar, till the month of November, at which time the clear liquor should be racked off into a cask, and bottled.

Brisk Currant Wine.—Let the currants be gathered when they have nearly attained their full growth, but before they have shewn much tendency to ripen; separate the berries from the stalks, mash the fruit, and let all the preliminary process for obtaining the juice, be conducted precisely in the same manner as described in the method for making brisk gooseberry wine; add the same proportion of sugar and super-tartrate of potash.

The fermentation and further treatment of the wine should also be similar to that of brisk gooseberry wine. We now pass on to—

Elder Wine.—This fruit is excellently calculated for the production of wine. Its juice contains a considerable portion of the fermentative matter which is so essential for the production of a vigorous fermentation, and its beautiful colour communicates to the wine a rich tint; but, as the fruit is deficient in saccharine matter, this substance must be liberally supplied. This wine is much ameliorated by adding to the elderberry juice a small portion of super-tartrate of potash. Dr. Macculloch observes, "that the proportion of this salt may vary from one to four, and even six per cent. The cause of this admissible laxity will appear, when it is considered that the greater part of the super-tartrate of potash is again deposited in the lees. I may also remark, that from two to four per cent. will be found a sufficient dose, in proportion to the greater or less sweetness of the fruit, the sweetest requiring the largest quantity of this salt, and vice versa. The dose of it ought also to vary in proportion to the added sugar, increasing as it increases."

To every two quarts of bruised berries, put one quart of water; strain the juice through a hair sieve, and add to every quart of the diluted juice one pound of lump sugar. Boil the mixture for about one quarter of an hour, and suffer it to ferment in the manner before stated. —See Gooseberry Wine.

Or, bruise a bushel of picked elderberries; dilute the mass with ten gallons of water, and having boiled it for a few minutes, strain off the juice, and squeeze out the husks. Measure the whole quantity of the juice, and to every quart put three-quarters of a pound of lump sugar; and, whilst still warm, add to it half a pint of yeast, and fill up the cask with some of the reserved liquor.

When the wine is clear, it may be drawn off from the lees, (which will be in about three months,) and bottled for use.

For flavouring the wine, ginger, allspice, or any other aromatic substance, may be used; the flavouring materials may be enclosed in a bag, and suspended in the cask, and removed when the desired flavour is produced.

Ginger Wine.—Dissolve 18 or 20 pounds of sugar, in nine and a-half gallons of boiling water, and add to it 10 or 12 ounces of bruised ginger-root. Boil the mixture for about a quarter of an hour, and when nearly cold, add to it half a pint of yeast, and pour it into a cask to ferment, taking care to fill up the cask from time to time with the surplus of the liquor made for that purpose. When the fermentation ceases, take off the wine, and bottle it when transparent.

It is a common practice to boil the outer rind of a few lemons, together with the ginger destined for the wine, to impart to the wine the flavour of lemon-peel.

Orange Wine.—Take the outer rind of 100 Seville oranges, so thinly pared that no white appears in it; pour upon it 10½ gallons of boiling water; suffer it to stand for eight or ten hours, and having strained off the liquor, whilst slightly warm, add to it the juice of the pulp, and from 25 to 30 pounds of lump sugar, and a few table-spoonfuls of yeast; suffer it to ferment in the cask for about five days, or till the fermentation has apparently ceased; and when the wine is perfectly transparent, draw it off from the lees, and bottle it.

A raisin wine, possessing the flavour of Frontignac, we are told, may be made in the following manner:—

Take six pounds of raisins, boil them in six gallons of water, and, when perfectly soft, rub them through a cullender, to separate the stones. Add the pulp to the water in which the raisins have been boiled; pour the mixture upon 12lbs. of white sugar, and suffer it to ferment with the addition of half a pound of yeast. When the fermentation has nearly ceased, add a quarter of a peck of elder flowers, contained in a bag, which should be suspended in the cask, and removed when the wine has acquired the desired flavour. When the wine has become clear, draw it off into bottles.

With this extract we close the Treatise on Wines: we do not pledge ourselves that Mr. Accum's recipes are unknown to many of our fair readers; but even they will, we doubt not, be pleased at having the opinion of a scientific writer on the subject, who will, no doubt, take care that in all the preparations he recommends, there shall not be 'death in the pot.' The addition of spirit, so often recommended in the recipes for making wine, so far from checking the wine from becoming sour, increases the tendency; and, therefore, the use of brandy as a preservative to wine is founded in error. The effect, on the contrary, is to destroy the briskness of the wine, while it increases their expense and diminishes their salubrity.

The 'Treatise on Brewing' is of a less popular character than that on the making of wine; the first 190 pages being chiefly applicable to brewing on a large scale, as practised in the London breweries. Then comes a chapter on 'brewing in the small way'; but before we touch on this part of the subject, we shall notice some of the ingredients which ought to be used in all breweries, both in a large and small way; such as malt and hops. And first, of malt:—

The best malt is of a round full body; the grains, when broken, present a soft flour, enveloped in a thin skin; it breaks easy between the teeth, and has a sweet mellow taste. Such malt is devoid of a saccharine and mealy taste, and agreeable colour, and which breaks hard and stinty, ought to be rejected.

Another method employed by brewers to ascertain the goodness of malt, is to put a quantity in a glass of water; when that part of it which has been thoroughly malted will swim upon its surface, and such grains as are unmalted, sink to the bottom.

The most rational method of ascertaining the relative value of different samples of malt, is to determine the quantity of fermentable matter obtainable from a given quantity; for no substance of commerce varies more in quality than malt. And this may easily be accomplished, by extracting in the small way, by means of water heated to the temperature employed in the brewing process, all the fermentable matter from a given sample of malt.

Mr. Accum says, hops were first brought into England from the Netherlands, in the year 1524; and that they are first mentioned in the English statute-book in the year 1552. Now, although we have not the statute-book to refer to at the present moment, and do not profess to be fully acquainted with the history of hops, yet we suspect that Mr. Accum is quite erroneous in his statement, and that they were known in England at least a century before the date he assigns. In the Harleian MSS. in the British Museum, vol. 950, we find the following mention of the prohibition of hops, so early as the year 1428: 'There was an information, about the 4th of Hen. VI. against a person, for that he put a kind of unwholesome weed into his brewing, called an hop.' Whether hops had been the subject of legislative enactments before this time or not, we will not pretend to determine, but the passage we have quoted proves that they were known and used in England early in the fifteenth century. On the 'characters of the goodness of hops, with which we doubt not Mr. A. is better acquainted than with his history; he says,—

'The goodness of hops depends upon several different circumstances, but principally on the clammy or resinous feel of the yellow farinacious powdery matter which is sprinkled over them, their colour, and aromatic odour. And a sample is considered the more or less valuable, the more or less clammy the flower-buds feel; while it is of the greatest consequence, in relation to the colour, that it should be preserved as bright as possible; yet it does not always follow that the best coloured samples possess the strongest aromatic flavour.

'Rub a few of the hop-pods strongly in the palm of the hand, and if they are good, an oily, rich, or resinous substance will be perceptible, accompanied by a most fragrant smell. The friction should produce a quantity of fine yellow dust, called by the trade, condition, in which the richness of the hop in part consists, as does their strength in the oily or resinous substance. On opening a sample of good hops, a considerable quantity of seeds are found; and if they have been properly dried, they possess a fine olive-green colour. Attention should be paid to the bags, or pockets, to see that they have been properly strained or tightened.

Having treated on hops, we shall now make a skip, and then jump at once, not into the mash-tub, but into Mr. Accum's Treatise on Domestic Brewing. It would far exceed our limits to give the whole process of brewing even in 'a small way,' nor could we condense it sufficiently to render our readers masters of the subject; we shall, therefore, only quote an extract on the quantity of ale or table beer to be brewed from a given quantity of malt and hops:—

'In domestic brewing, and if the beer be not intended for keeping, one bushel of malt, and ten ounces of hops, will produce 12 gallons of common, or table ale; and ale brewers allow one measure of such ale to be equal to two of table beer. From one bushel of malt, therefore, may be brewed 24 gallons of table beer, without any table ale, or nine gallons of ale, and six of table beer; or six of ale and 12 of table beer, or any other proportions of ale and table beer, bearing in mind the proportions that common ale and table beer are here considered as two of table beer being equivalent to one of ale. This is the smallest quantity of malt that should be employed for brewing 12 gallons of good table or common ale. It is likewise understood that the malt be measured before it is ground, because a bushel of malt, by measure, produces, when coarsely ground, one and a quarter of grist; and, when finely ground, the increase of bulk is still more considerable; hence, if the malt be purchased in a ground state, this allowance must be made accordingly.

'If the ale is intended for keeping, it is advisable to allow from five and three-quarters to six bushels of pale malt to a hogshead, (54 gallons,) of good ale. The quantity of hops must be suited to the taste of the drinker, and the time the liquor is intended to be kept. For strong ale, intended to be kept about 12 months, three-quarters of a pound of hops should be used, (if the hop be new or of the best kind,) to every bushel of malt. If the beer is to be preserved 16 or 18 months, one pound of hops to a bushel of malt will be a good proportion.'

'Pale malt is preferable to amber-coloured malt, for brewing in the small way, and should always be used, and the best malt produces the best flavoured beer. If the beer be intended to have a brown colour, the addition of a small portion of burnt sugar answers that purpose very well.'

The private brewer may employ molasses, sugar, or any other substance in his brewing, which the public brewer is not allowed to do:—

'When economy is an object, a quantity of molasses or muscovado sugar may be substituted for a portion of the malt. From experiments in which we [Mr. Accum] have been professionally engaged, on a large scale, we are authorized to state that 12lbs. of molasses, or 10lbs. of muscovado sugar, are equivalent, or yield as much fermentable matter, as is produced from one bushel of malt of the usual quality, that is, such as is capable of yielding 63lbs. of solid fermentable matter per quarter of malt.'

We will conclude the brewing treatise with Mr. Accum's recipe for making spruce beer, which is prepared in the following manner:—

'Add to 18 gallons of boiling water, from 12 to 14lbs of molasses, and from 14 to 16 ounces of extract of spruce. Suffer the mixture to cool, and when lukewarm, add to it one pint of yeast, and suffer the mixture to ferment.

'Whilst the fermentation is going on, remove the yeast by skimming, and when the fermentative process begins to become languid, which usually happens in two days, let the beer be bottled. It will be fit for use in three or four days. Sugar is preferable to molasses, and if malt-wort of an ordinary strength, (15 or 18 gallons drawn from a bushel of pale malt,) be substituted for the water, a spruce beer of a much superior flavour is obtained.

'White spruce beer is made in a similar manner, by substituting for molasses, common sugar.'

We now come to Mr. Accum's treatise on making bread. An egotistical preface commences the work, in which an 'I have' begins almost every sentence. He then gives some preliminary observations on the chemical constitution and nutritive quality of vegetable food. This is followed by an historical sketch of the art of making bread,—an account of the various substitutes for bread,—an analysis of bread flour,—the methods of making various sorts of unleavened and leavened bread,—bread made with yeast, &c. Among the substitutes for bread, used in different countries, are the bread fruit, sago, cassava, tapioca, the plantain, hapana,—bread made of dried fish, of woos, and of earth. The Icelanders collect the Lichen Rangiferinus, or reindeer moss, in summer, and, when dry, grind it into powder and make it into bread. But the strangest substitute for bread that has ever been employed, is a sort of white earth:—

'The poor, in the lordship of Moscov, in Upper Lusania, have been frequently compelled to make use of this earth as a substitute for bread.

'The earth is dug out of a pit where saltpetre had formerly been worked: when exposed to the rays of the sun, it splits and cracks, and small globules issue from it like meal, which ferments when mixed with flour. On this earth, baked into bread, many persons have subsisted a considerable time.'

We doubt not but that every good house-wife will hint herself as well qualified to make bread as Mr. Accum, although she may not be able to explain the chemical changes that it undergoes in the process; we shall, however, quote his recipe for home-made wheaten bread:—

'Take a bushel of wheaten flour, and put two third parts of it in one heap into a trough or tub; then dilute two pints of yeast with three or four pints of warm water, and add to this mixture from eight to ten ounces of salt. Make a hole in the middle of the heap of flour, pour the mixture of yeast, salt, and water into it, and knead the whole into an uniform stiff dough, with such an additional quantity of water as is requisite for that purpose, and suffer the dough to rise in a warm place.

'When the dough has risen, and just begins again to subside, add to it gradually the remaining one-third part of the flour; knead it again thoroughly, taking care to add gradually so much warm water as is sufficient to form the whole into a stiff tenacious dough, and continue the kneading. At first the mass is very adhesive, and clings to the fingers, but it becomes less so the longer the kneading is continued; and when the fist, on being withdrawn, leaves its perfect impression in the dough, none of it adhering to the fingers, the kneading may be discontinued. The dough may be then divided into loaf pieces, (of about 5lb. in weight.) Knead each piece once more separately, and having made it up in the proper form, put it in a warm place, cover it with a blanket, to promote the last rising: and when this has taken place, put it into the oven. When the loaves are withdrawn, they should be covered up with a blanket, to cool as slowly as possible.

As a matter of curiosity rather than of actual utility to our readers, we quote the account of manufacturing sea-biscuits:—

'The process of biscuit-baking for the British navy is as follows, and it is equally simple and ingenious. The meal, and every other article, being supplied with much certainty and simplicity, large lumps of dough, consisting merely of flour and water, are mixed up together; and as the quantity is so immense as to preclude, by any common process, a possibility of kneading it, a man manages, or, as it is termed, rides a machine, which is called a horse. This machine is a long roller, apparently about four or five inches in diameter, and about seven or eight feet in length. It has a play to a certain extension, by means of a staple in the wall, to which is inserted a kind of eye, making its action like the machine by which they cut chaff for horses. The lump of dough being placed exactly in the centre of a raised platform, the man sits upon the end of the machine, and literally rides up and down throughout its whole circular direction, till the dough is equally indented; and this is repeated till it is sufficiently kneaded; at which times, by the different positions of the lines, large or small circles are described, according as they are near to or distant from the wall.

'The dough, in this state, is handed over to a second workman, who slices it with a prodigious knife; and it is then in a proper state for the use of those bakers who attend the oven. These are five in number; and their different departments are as well calculated for expedition and correctness, as the making of pins, or other mechanical employments. On each side of a large table, where the dough is laid, stands a workman; at a small table near the oven stands another; a fourth stands by the side of the oven, to receive the bread; and a fifth to supply the peel. By this arrangement the oven is as regularly filled, and the whole exercise performed in as exact time, as a military evolution. The man on the further side of the large table, moulds the dough; having previously formed it into small pieces, till it has the appearance of muffins, although rather thinner, and which he does two together, with each hand; and, as fast as he accomplishes this task, he delivers his work over to the man on the other side of the table, who stamps them with a docker on both sides with a mark. As he rides himself of this work, he throws the biscuits on the smaller table next the oven, where stands the third workman, whose business is merely to separate the different pieces into two, and place them immediately under the hand of him who supplies the oven, whose work of throwing, or rather chucking, the bread upon the peel, must be so exact, that if he looked round for a single moment, it is impossible he should perform it correctly. The fifth receives the biscuit on the peel, and arranges it in the oven; in which duty he is so very expert, that though the different pieces are thrown at the rate of seventy in a minute, the peel is always disengaged in time to receive them separately.

'As the oven stands open during the whole time of filling it, the biscuits first thrown in would be first baked, were there not some counteraction to such an inconvenience. The remedy lies in the ingenuity of the man who forms the pieces of dough, and who, by imperceptible degrees, proportionably diminishes their size, till the loss of that time, which is taken up during the filling of the oven, has no more effect to the disadvantage of one of the biscuits than to another.

'So much critical exactness and neat activity occur in the exercise of this labour, that it is difficult to decide whether the palm of excellence is due to the moulder, the marker, the splitter, the chucker, or the depositor; all of them, like the wheels of a machine, seeming to be actuated by the same principle. The business is to deposit in the oven seventy biscuits in a minute; and this is accomplished with the regularity of a clock; the clack of the peel, during the motion in the oven, operating like the pendulum.'

We do not think it necessary to notice the methods of making turnip bread, or potatoe bread, since the price of grain is such, at present, as will, we trust, enable the humblest peasant to eat good wheaten bread. A description of a family oven, an abstract of the laws prohibiting the adulterations of bread, and a few remarks on the economy of use of yeast, conclude the volume.

We will now take leave of Mr. Accum and his three treatises on the making of wine, beer, and bread. There is another art which these works teach, and which Mr. A. has had the modesty not to mention.—We mean the art of book-making, in which he has proved himself quite an adept. The treatises on wine and on brewing afford fine specimens of spinning out a subject; and that on bread has been eked out, with nearly thirty pages of extracts from an old pamphlet on 'the advantage of eating pure and genuine bread.' The whole of the works are printed very loosely, and, though sold at the price of sixteen shillings and sixpence, do not contain so much matter as three numbers of the Literary Chronicle.

Wallace; A Historical Tragedy. in five acts. By C. E. Walker, Esq. 8vo. pp. 74. London, 1830.

If we thought that we should be the means of discouraging the young author of this dramatic production, which has been represented with so much success at Covent Garden Theatre, or that we should, in the least degree, injure his creditable fame, we would throw down our pen and let the tragedy of Wallace repose with 'all its imperfections on its head.' But, if the judgment of a well-known critic and poet can be relied on, that

'Your own defects to know,' you must

'Make use of every friend and every foe;' then we shall feel ourselves justified by pointing out the most striking blemishes that deface many poetical and judicious passages in this tragedy.

A modern writer, in speaking of our immortal bard, who was not for an age but for all time, has justly observed, 'That which distinguishes the dramatic productions of Shakspeare from all others, is the wonderful variety and perfect individuality of his characters. Each of these is as much itself, and as absolutely independent of the rest, as if they were living persons, not fictions of the mind. The poet appears, for the time being, to be identified with the character he wishes to represent, and to pass from one to the other, like the same soul, successively animating different bodies. By an art like that of the ventriloquist, he throws his imagination out of himself: and makes every word appear to proceed from the very mouth of the person whose name it bears. His plays, alone, are properly expressions of the passions, not descriptions of them. His characters are real beings of flesh and blood; they speak like men, not like authors. One might suppose that he had stood by at the time and had overheard what passed. Each object and circumstance seems to exist in his mind as it existed in nature. Each several train of thought and feeling goes on of itself without effort or confusion; in the world of his imagination, every thing has a life, a place, and being of its own.' Every dramatic writer would do well to recollect these remarks; and Mr. Walker in particular, for he has failed most in individuality of character. All his characters think, act, and speak alike. He has fixed on some favourite words and expressions which he has put into the mouth of each of them, and they are repeated perpetually. The exclamations 'away,' 'enough,' 'heaven,' 'hn,' &c. are used indiscriminately, by several of the characters, in vast profusion. Wallace has—

- Away! hence some of you, and skirt the gien.
- Away at once.
- Away with hands.
- Wert thou but now away.

Helen has—

- Away—waste not a thought on me.
- Then away to him.
- Hence, away, and leave me here to die.
- And I stand idly here—Away!

Douglas away's it half a dozen times, and Monteith nearly as many. The word enough is used frequently, and often very injudiciously. Take the following examples:—

Wallace. 'Enough'; and now I do but snatch an hour.

Douglas. 'Enough'; now mark!

Enough! thy hand.

Monteith. 'Enough! thou hast remember'd me of that [which] Might make me drag a lingering life of woe.

Monteith. 'Enough! ye have your orders.'

Helen. 'Enough! I see.'

But of all others, the word heaven is the most hacknied; we could quote at least forty lines in which it occurs; for, in addition to numerous appeals to heaven, we have 'gracious heaven,' the 'face of heaven,' 'dews from heaven,' 'merciful heaven,' 'a glimpse of heaven,' 'yonder heaven,' 'patient heaven,' 'the eye of heaven,' with a number of 'ah! heavens,' and 'oh! heavens.' The exclamation 'Ha!' is used still more reprehensibly: but we will not stop to notice the instances, as the author will perhaps think we have done enough already. Well then, to be brief; there are a few must not be's, cannot be's, and other be's which, though evidently favourites, are intruders in legitimate tragedy; therefore, we advise Mr. Walker to give them a peaceful exit. There is a little word called ye, that has crept in and disfigured some of the best poetry. No more of that, has spoiled another dozen lines; and in sooth is any thing but soothing.

Thus, having dwelt so largely on its blemishes, justice demands our giving quotations of a higher description, and which have biased the public, as well as ourselves, in Mr. Walker's favour:—

From Act 5—Scene the First. [Interior of a prison.]

Glas. Wallace, it pitieth me to speak thy doom;

But, lo! the sovereign's seal and signature Hath past, and thou must die!

Wal. I have heard no less.

Glas. Aye; but belike this hour; even now the guards

Do wait without to bear thee to thy fate;
And circling thousands, round the barrier stand,
In hope to see—

Wal. A fellow-creature die?

And they shall see, how undimay'd
By every change and charge, the intrepid soul
Can proudly triumph o'er oppression.
I am prepared.

Glas. Farewell, then, thou brave Scot!

Would that my power availed to change thy doom.

But Edward's edict is imperative.

Nor will admit delay—yet—yet—awhile—
Farewell!

Helen. [Without.] Restrain me not!

[From scene the last.]

Wal. Free again! once more my country free!

Catch the blast sound ye choiring angels—ye
That circle heaven's high throne exulting!;

Ye thunders, join your notes, and loud proclaim
To all the astonished world, the tidings round—

Scotland again is free! the star hath ris'n
That prognosts a day of peace!

The Bruce! the Bruce! he comes! he rushes on Her chains!—my native land is free!

Scotland again is free!

Clif. But for thee

This instant—

Wal. Aye—this instant to the block!

Scotland is free and Wallace falls contending!

Clif. Now lead him on!

The King hath sworn he will not quit you lower Till the commingling swell of trumpet and drum,
Shall to the city's utmost bounds proclaim,
Th' arch-rebel is no more!

Come! [Helen falls senseless into the arms of Gloster.]

Wal. Hold yet, awhile:

Helen! my latest moment is arrived.
Nay; rouse thee—and collect thy noble self.

To bid me one farewell—one dear farewell—
Till we do part.

Clif. Now, prisoner—it were best—

Guards, bear him to the block! [Soldiers approach.]

Wal. [With extreme indignation.] Back!
back! ye slaves!

Nor dare pollute me with your ruffian land!
Shall it not be permitted me to pour

A few warm tears o'er an expiring wife?

Look there!—there!—[throwing himself on his knees beside her.]

Thou loveliest and thou best!

Is there a power on earth to tear me hence,

Ere I have taken of thee one last embrace?

Ah me! my wife! my poor, dear, desolate wife!

And art thou stricken thus for me—for me?

Falls this stroke on thee? Ah! when I'm gone

Thou shalt revive! for I have been to thee

As the fell poison-tree, beneath whose shade,
Thou, sweetest flower, hast sickening died away!

Farewell! farewell! farewell! [Retiring slowly.]
Yet, one kiss more!

One other! oh, eternally farewell!

We have an utter dislike to the presumptuous appeals of tragedians, however Roman-like and prevailing; and independently of our citations of heavens, there are other expressions which are reprehensible. The galloping syllable is permitted to run very freely, and the imitations are numerous.

To conclude, we must observe that the orthography and punctuation are very incorrectly printed throughout, and trust Mr. Walker will improve from our candour and impartiality; for we can assure him we would not have taken this pains with an old author, whom we might suspect to be incorrigible.

Notes on Rio Janeiro and the Southern Parts of Brazil; taken during a Residence of Ten Years in that Country, from 1808 to 1818. By John Luccock. 4to. pp. 639. London, 1820.

MR. SOUTHEY has given us a valuable history of Brazil; Koster and Prince Maximilian, of Wied Newwied, have added much information respecting that interesting and extensive country; Mawe has explored its mines; and now Mr. Luccock, in a bulky quarto, pours in a vast quantity of general information to complete our knowledge of the subject. The title of 'Notes' is modestly and very appropriately assumed, for the facts stated by Mr. Luccock are desultory and ill arranged: he is evidently a plain and intelligent man, who has, during his ten years' residence, gleaned a variety of interesting information respecting the Brazils. The singular facts which he details in natural history are confined to general descriptions, and not to scientific notices: this being a branch of science with which he does not appear to be acquainted. This is the more to be regretted as no country in the world presents such an extensive or valuable field for the naturalist; but, not to dwell longer on what Mr. Luccock does not presume to know, we will come to those subjects on which he is sufficiently informed, and make a few extracts from this miscellaneous and unconnected work: and, although by no means first in order, yet of the first importance, we quote a passage on the present state of literature and the arts in Brazil:—

'The licensed press has produced some useful works besides those which relate to military affairs. Among them we reckon, as the most useful, the Thesouro dos Meninos, which treats of "Morals, Virtue, and Good Manners." It was dedicated, very properly, to Don Miguel, the king's second son, for no boy can require such instructions more than he does; his education has been most limited and unfortunate. A book entitled, Lectures on Philosophy, contains too much of the dogmas of Aristotle and the dark ages to evince that the author is either enlightened or judicious. We have also the History of Extravagant Delusions and Supernatural Influence; the Commercial Laws of Brazil; several useful works on Commerce and Navigation, particularly a Nautical Almanack, calculated for the meridian of Rio; a work badly executed but followed by Tables of the Sun's Declination, of Latitudes and Logarithms; one or two works on Geography; and a Treatise on the Diseases of Negroes.

A private printing press was established at the close of 1816; philosophical lectures were read and attended; the cabinet which formerly belonged to the celebrated Werner was arranged and studied; mineral waters, found in Minas Graes and other places, had been analysed; and Brazilians boasted of a native discovery, in the composition of gunpowder, but, I apprehend, without reason, for it consists simply in mixing a quantity of fresh saw-dust with the grains; a patent had been granted for making bricks by machinery, and another for the navigation of the bay by a steam boat; a company had been formed even in Cuyaba, under royal patronage, for improvements in the art of mining.

In 1818, at a sale of books, English works went off well, as did some Latin ones; but few, I believe, fell into Brazilian hands; French books are in demand, but it was impossible, by any means, to sell the Glasgow edition of Homer's Iliad in Greek; the Septuagint and New Testament, in the same language; Hederich's, nor even Schrevelius's Lexicon, nor did a Hebrew Psalter with a Latin translation, find a customer.

With the sciences, the arts both mechanic and those which are commonly denominated fine ones, prospered in a large degree, and we had not only blacksmiths, carpenters, and bricklayers, but poets and painters in abundance.

Having discussed the subject of literature, we now turn to that of agriculture, though this would have been a treasonable preference in the time of Jack Cade. The farms in the Brazils, as in all thinly populated countries, are of vast extent:—

The smallest are stated at four square leagues, or more than twenty thousand acres; the largest are said to reach to a hundred square leagues, or near six hundred thousand acres.* To each three square leagues are allotted four or five thousand head of cattle, six men, and a hundred horses; though, according to circumstances, such as the distance from navigable waters or from church, there must be a variety in the number of oxen kept for the business of a farm. The proportion of horses will appear a very large one; but, it is to be remembered, they cost nothing in keeping, as they are turned out on the plains; that no one about the farm, not even a slave, ever goes the shortest distance on foot; and that each manager will change his horse two or three times in a day. About a hundred cows are allowed for the supply of milk, butter, cheese, and veal, to a farm of the average size. Hogs are usually found near the houses, but little care is taken of them; they wander about, root up the earth, devour reptiles, and make a good part of their subsistence on the waste parts of the cattle slaughtered. There are few sheep, and they are remarkably light and ill made, with a short ordinary wool, which, however, might easily be improved. This wool is, at present, used partly unstripped from the skins, as saddle covers and the like; partly, for the stuffing of beds and mattresses. The country is so thinly peopled, its inhabitants have so little liking to mutton, and the wild dogs, and other beasts and birds of prey are so numerous, that there can be little inducement to increase the flocks.

In every farm there is, at least, one enclosed place, called rodeio, generally on the highest spot; here the cattle are occasionally collected, marked, and treated as circumstances may require. So accustomed are they, particularly the horses, to this practice, that when the servants of the farm ride along, swinging their lasso or their hats, and loudly pronouncing the word rodeio, they all walk slowly to the spot. In a country so little enlivened by variety, this assemblage forms one of its most rural and pleasant scenes.

As an instance of the extent to which grazing is carried in Brazil, Mr. L. states 'that in one year, an individual, José Antonio dos Anjos, slaughtered fifty-four thousand head of cattle, and charqued the flesh.' The name of charqueados is derived from the charqued beef which the district prepares and exports. When the cattle are killed and skinned, the flesh is taken off from the sides in one broad piece, something like a fitch of bacon; it is then slightly sprinkled with salt and dried in the sun. In that state it is the common food of the peasantry of Brazil; and, says our author, 'is, in itself, by no means to be despised.' From the numerous notices of subjects on natural history, which this work contains, we select the following, hoping that Mr. L. did not participate in the barbarous amusement with the frogs:—

No stranger can possibly conceive the number of frogs found on the swampy grounds, nor the noise which they make. It was a common diversion when they issued from their lurking places at night, to procure a forked stick, with sharp points, and to strike it on the ground, without any very particular selection of place, until the forked part was full of them; these were stripped off, and the operation recommenced; thus many hundreds were killed in a very short time. Ants, of several species, are also a most serious pest. Every house, and almost every yard of dry ground, is infested with them, and the wounds which they inflict are painful and irritating, arising, I suspect, not from the mere bite, but from some venomous fluid left by them beneath the skin. The wandering Indians, who cannot escape them, cultivate in their warriors not only a contempt for such molestations, but a general spirit of stern endurance, by placing them in a nest of these insects. In this country these insects present no lesson of useful labour; they are restless and active, but, as it seems to me, to no purpose. I have observed them carrying a heap of sand through a hole in a wall, dropping it on the opposite side; and, when the whole is cleared away, carrying it back again with the same air of important occupation.

We suspect Mr. Lucock is quite wrong here, and that this employment of the ants is to promote habits of industry. Lord Castlereagh, who recommended in the House of Commons that the labouring poor should be employed in digging holes in the ground and filling them up again, no doubt took the hint from the Brazilian insects, although he claimed it as an original idea.

In a broad sandy plain, north of St. John, which is covered with coarse herbage, Mr. Lucock met with a Brazilian porcupine, which he attempted to drive before him. He says,—

'The animal is naturally slow, and to urge it to greater speed and prevent its escape among the shrubs, I made use of my hat, a leghorn one, lined with leather at the back part of the brim. Being released from the office of driver by some boys, who willingly undertook it, and about to put on my hat, I was surprised to find several of the animal's quills sticking in it, which had penetrated the leather as well as the straw. This circumstance induced me to think that they are discharged with considerable force; and this opinion was confirmed by my hearing one of the boys cry out that he was wounded in the leg; a misfortune to which his companions evidently thought themselves liable, and which rendered them cautious. It is probable that the hat might be very near, if not actually touching the porcupine, when the quills struck the brim, and that at a greater distance they might have fallen to the ground. Yet the wound which the boy received showed that they could take effect at the distance of several, if not of many inches. The quills were nearly an inch long, had a hard, sharp, brown point; the other end hollow, of a pale straw, inclining to flesh colour, and the intermediate space had alternate rings of bright yellow and brown. These points appeared perfectly smooth and polished; but their effect on dogs, which seized the animal in hunting, indicates that they are really barbed, for they work into the tongues and gums of the poor howling creatures and cannot be extracted without violence.

* Thus a single farm in Brazil nearly equals, in extent, the English counties of Chester, Hereford, Northampton, or Warwick.—REV.

The snakes in Brazil are of large size, and many of them extremely venomous. Mr. L. mentions one, which was killed near his inn, called the Jaracá:—

'It was about eight feet long, and from the dinginess of its blue and yellow skin, was, I suspect, old or diseased. The blow by which it was destroyed, had exposed the fangs of the lower jaw, in which state it was carelessly left: when a hen of the common domestic kind, with her chickens, approaching the spot, instantly gave the note of alarm, collected the terrified brood behind her, spread her wings, bristled her feathers, and seemed prepared either to fight or fly. Seeing the reptile motionless, she took courage, gradually drew nearer to it, at length made a hasty attack with her bill on the open jaw, and immediately retreated. She continued such attacks until she had taken something from each side of the jaw and swallowed it. She then appeared to think no farther precaution necessary, but led her chickens to feed close by the carcass. I had frequently observed domestic fowls devouring ants and scorpions, and had watched, with interest, their battles with centipedes; but never before saw one attack so large a reptile, or seek its food from such a creature. Little did I imagine that the vesicles of poison in the jaw of a snake could be delicious, or even wholesome food for any living thing.'

We have hitherto quoted nothing respecting the character of the Brazilians, but, indeed, on that subject, we have inserted much in the two preceding volumes of the Literary Chronicle, in our reviews of Southey's Brazil and Prince Maximilian's Travels. We, however, now add an anecdote of Indian revenge, which occurred near Uvá:—

'Two gentlemen having obtained a grant, sent a person, accustomed to the country, to settle upon it. Probably, by some means, he offended the Indians remaining in the neighbouring woods; for one day a shot fired at him, struck the powder horn in his waistcoat pocket, and wounded him in the wrist. Being on horseback, he instantly pursued his assailants, and saw two Indians, who escaped from him in their usual mode. In such cases, the fugitive endeavours to reach the brow of a hill little encumbered with wood, where, dropping on his breech, he puts his head between his knees, and his arms round his ancles: in this state being nearly as round as a ball, he precipitates himself from the brow and rolls speedily to the bottom. From this circumstance, I apprehend, the Indians take their modern name of Booticudies or Butudies, a barbarous word, half Tupi, half Portuguese, signifying fallers by the breech. The man who had been wounded was obliged to come down to Rio for surgical assistance. On his return, he was seriously cautioned against exposing himself to similar attacks. About fourteen days after, as he was riding along the road, followed, at some distance, by a slave, a shot fired again by an invisible hand, threw him forward on the saddle, and a second brought him to the ground. Two Indians then came out of the wood, one of whom walked deliberately to the Negro, and ordered him to halt, while the other went to their victim, broke his legs, and beat out his brains. Afterwards they shot the horse and decamped. Every search was made for them, but these people are too well acquainted with the forests to find secure lurking places, and defy, if they have any knowledge of, the arm of the law.'

We are going to conclude with an extract which more immediately concerns our female readers, and yet, we suspect, they will scarcely thank us for it, as most persons had rather suffer a fraud unconsciously, than know they have been imposed upon. Mr. L. says,—

'At Chapoá, we visited the gold and topaz mines, the possessors of which are reported to be wealthy; but, if they are so, it is in the midst of such a want of comforts as would make a Briton, not over delicate, completely miserable. They produced a large quantity of real topazes, and endeavoured to convince me that a cubical mass of yellow transparent spar, though differing so widely from the usual form, was a stone of that description; when closely pressed, however, they wished to insinuate that it was composed of parts truly prismatic. We ought to distinguish between precious stones and such spars as these, which abound in the country, are of various colours, and though of almost as little value as pebbles, are made to imitate the topaz, the emerald, the amethyst, and even the diamond, and as such are frequently passed off to inexperienced purchasers. The appearance of the imitative topaz is often more imposing than that of the real one of South America, for I never yet saw the latter in a perfect state, but almost invariably fractured at one end, frequently at both. Of the stones sent to Europe under dazzling names, particularly as topazes, agao-marinao, and amethysts, many are nothing more than pieces of spar, found in the beds of rivers and affected by the common attrition of streams.'

With this extract we close our notice of Mr. Luccock's work; which, although more bulky than was necessary, contains much varied and valuable information respecting a country which is growing in interest.

Poems. By Thomas Gent. 18mo. pp. 155. London, 1820.

MR. GENT is one of the most pleasing, as well as the most unassuming of the minor poets of the day. We use the word minor, rather in reference to the extent than the merit of his productions, for this small volume affords some specimens which might compare with those of our most popular and most favourite authors. In proof of this assertion we need only quote the following:—

TO MARY.

Oh! is there not in infant smiles
A witching power, a cheering ray,
A charm that every care beguiles,
And bids the weary soul be gay?

There surely is—for thou hast been
Child of my heart, my peaceful dove,
Gladd'ning life's sad and chequered scene,
An emblem of the peace above.

Now all is calm and dark and still,
And bright the beam the moonlight throws
O'er ocean wave, and gentle rill,
And on thy slumbering cheek of rose.

And may no care disturb that breast,
Nor sorrow dim that brow serene;
And may thy latest years be blest
As thy sweet infancy has been.

Mr. Gent is as successful in facetiousness as he is in tenderness, and this little volume abounds with instances of both, in the most agreeable variety. There is a good deal of satiric humour in the following epigram:—

'I knew a being once, his peaked head
With a few lank and greasy hairs was spread;
His visage bow, in length was like your own
Seen in the convex of a table spoon.
His mouth, or rather gash, athwart his face,
To stop at either ear had just the grace,
A hideous rift: his teeth were all canine;
And just like Death's (in Milton) was his grin.
One shilling and one fourteen penny leg,
(This shorter was than that, and not so big),
He had; and they, when meeting at his knees,
An angle formed of ninety-eight degrees.
Nature in scheming how his back to vary,
A hint had taken from the dromedary;
His eyes an inward screwing vision threw,
Striving each other thro' his nose to view;
His intellect was just one ray above
The idiot Cymon's, ere he fell in love.
At school they Taraxippus called the wight;
The Misses, when they met him, shrieked with fright;
But, spite of all that Nature had denied,
When sudden Fortune made the cub her pride,
And gave him twenty thousand pounds a-year,
Then from the pretty Misses you might hear,
"His face was not the finest; and, indeed,
He was a little, they must own, in-kneed;
His shoulders, certainly, were rather high,
But then, he had a most expressive eye;"

Nor were their hearts by outward charms inclined;

Give them the higher beauties of the mind."

These specimens will enable such of our readers as are not already acquainted with Mr. Gent, to judge of his poetical talents, of which we have always thought very favourably.

BOILED INFANT COTTON SPINNERS!

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—It is stated that France and England shall never be at peace,—the moment the sword is sheathed, the pen is dipped in gall, and the French writers make sad havoc with us, our manners, our books, and even our art of cookery; for the latter, look only into the Cuisinière Bourgeoise, and you will learn not only the 'English way of dressing roast beef of beef, but also roast beef of mutton and lamb!' The last number of the Revue Encyclopédique, a monthly journal, accused the English of 'incredible barbarity' to the young children employed in cotton manufactories, keeping them from 13 to 16 hours a-day, in a place 25 degrees above the boiling point. Now, as their own bouillie beef takes only seven hours to boil, they must think English children made of tough stuff not to be stewed to rags in that time; and lest the author's veracity should be doubted, he quotes the English text, from the Report of the House of Commons, wherein it is stated, the children are kept in a heat of 70 to 90 degrees; this, the sapient Frenchman translates literally, forgetting, or perhaps not knowing, that we calculate by Fahrenheit, on which the boiling point is at 212°, and they by Reaumur, in which it is at 80°!! We leave our learned brethren of the Seine to explain this blunder in their own way, but we would in future recommend them to look before they leap, and abstain from condemning till they understand. CLERICAL DANCING.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—As I expected, answers to and observations on the Clerical Dancer have speedily appeared; but I certainly expected something more substantial, pro and con. The two* would-be ladies are far from treating the subject with the attention and argument it deserves; neither are Mr. Cantab's observations and defence of clerical dancing sufficiently substantial, making his plea in its being a healthy exercise, since I can prove that many a valuable life has fallen a sacrifice to the effects of dancing.

I am myself so fond of dancing, that I have frequently rode many miles to a family dance, and returned, at this season of the year, at midnight, through frost and snow, when a bed could not be spared; and the ladies also were obliged to turn out when beds were scarce. I leave it to Cantab to judge if many constitutions could sustain so much with impunity. But this is not so much to the point. I deny that dancing in a crowded, heated, and consequently impure atmosphere, is productive of any corporeal advantage; half an hour's walk or a ride, in the fresh air, will be of more benefit to a person of studious habits, than four or six hours' dancing in a close room. So that dancing, so far as it concerns health, can form no plea for the practice.

How ridiculous would Dr. Herschell make himself appear, even were he younger, or any other grave philosopher, in a country-dance or waltz, for no other reason than that it is derogatory to the character supposed essential to profound philosophers, who spend much time in serious contemplation.

We are pleased with toys when children, but as we grow older, and have our minds interested with nobler pursuits, we neglect our toys, which afforded us so much pleasure, as objects beneath our attention.

So methinks the clerical character, from frequent meditation and contemplation on the divine precepts and ordinances of Almighty God, contained in the Holy Scriptures, would so far elevate his ideas and desires, as that all worldly desires and pleasures should appear mere trifles, not worth concern, and beneath his pursuit who has joys and rewards of Paradise in the society of blissful angels, in view, to recompense him for all deprivations, self-denials, and sufferings in this transitory world. I am far from considering dancing a sin; but, at the same time, I think it indecorous for clerical gentlemen to be seen hopping and frisking about in a dance. The preachers of the Gospel are the successors of the Apostles and Jesus Christ; and I think it is inconsistent to see a modern apostle dance, as it is improbable that St.

Paul or the Evangelists ever mingled in a Jewish, Grecian, or Roman dance.

It is much to be regretted that persons enter the sacred profession from other motives than that of serving the cause of christianity and morality. A good living, through the interest of a friend, is frequently a strong inducement to a parent to bring up his child to the church, who does no credit to it or himself, but might have proved a brave soldier, or a physician, or lawyer, &c. So long as this continues to be a motive with candidates for church preferment, so long shall we have clergymen hankering after worldly pleasures and amusements, forgetting that no man putting his hand to the plough and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of heaven.

I beg, in conclusion, to offer this consolation to Rev. P.—, of Essex, that, if he is a sound christian, a man of refined sentiments and education (which a clergyman ought to be), he will find it more to his comfort and interest to remain in a state of celibacy, than marry a lady who can perceive no other accomplishments in him, to induce her to prefer him for a husband, than a pretty dancer.

Your constant reader,

NEW YEAR'S DAY IN PARIS.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

NEW Year's Day in Paris is the most remarkable in the whole year; it is the only day which resembles in its external an English Sunday; for, though that day receives no respect in Paris, the opening of the new year displays all its characteristics,—all the shops are shut,—labour suspends his toil,—commerce reposes on her oars,—and the philosopher suspends his studies; nature and nature's son enjoy an universal holiday.

For several weeks preceding New Year's Day, various classes of ingenious artists employ all their talent and skill, to shine with an uncommon lustre on the auspicious opening of the new year; these are the confectioners, the embossers of visiting cards, the jewellers, &c. and their shops on this day display a degree of taste and magnificence difficult to describe, and totally unknown in England. This is the day of universal greetings, of renewing acquaintance, of counting how many links have been broken by time last year in the circles of friendship, and what new ones have replaced them. All persons, whatever may be their rank, degree, or profession, form a list of the names of persons whose friendship they wish to preserve or cultivate; to each of these persons a porter is sent, to deliver their card. Those more particularly connected with them by blood or friendship, are visited in person; and all who meet embrace on this happy day. Millions of cards are distributed; and nothing is seen in the streets but well dressed persons going to visit their friends and relations, and renew in an affectionate manner all the endearing charms of friendship. On this day, too, parents, friends, and lovers bestow their presents on the various objects of their affection, and pour so many draughts of the most delightful balm that human nature can partake of. We will not pretend to depict these scenes of universal joy,—every sensible heart will feel, relish, and enjoy them, and thereby anticipate all that a rapturous poet could imagine on so delightful a subject. Then,—

‘Let mirth abound; let social cheer
Invest the dawning o’ the year;
Let blithesome innocence appear
To crown our joy,
Nor envy, with sarcastic sneer,
Our bliss destroy.’

ANECDOTES OF THE HIGHLANDERS.

[FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE]

The Highlanders* are now, and ever have been, remarkable for their presence of mind and ready wit; to prove which, the following anecdotes may serve as a few instances.

The two powerful clans of M'Donald and M'Dougald are descended from two twin brothers, whose birth-right, from some neglect of the midwives, could not be decided. Their father, a powerful Irish chieftain, died; and disputes ran high between the brothers concerning primogeniture. This was the state of affairs, when, being in the train of Fergus I., on his voyage to Scotland, at the suggestion of that prince, it was mutually agreed, that he whose hand should first touch Scottish ground should be considered as

* It is not a little singular that less is known in England, and even in Edinburgh, of the manners and domestic habits of the Highlanders than of those of the Hotentots. Their superstitions also, notwithstanding Mrs. Grant's work on that subject, are very imperfectly known. The reasons are, that Scotchmen are too vain to tell what would do no honor to their countrymen, and Englishmen, being ignorant of the language, have not the means of arriving at the truth.

chief of his house. It was supposed that both, on approaching the shore, would plunge into the waves, and that success would crown the efforts of the best swimmer. Dougald meant to follow that course, but was prevented by Donald, who, on coming within a stone-cast of the beach, drew his sword, cut off his left hand by the wrist, and threw it bleeding on land; at the same time calling the King and his attendants to witness that his left hand, his flesh, blood, and bone, had first touched the Scottish earth. In commemoration of this extraordinary instance of presence of mind, the lords of the isles wear a bloody hand in their coat of arms ‘unto this day.’

After the defeat of the Highlanders at Culloden, John Roy Stewart was lurking in a hiding place, in Kincardine, Strathspey, his native place, and a party of soldiers stationed there, were in search of him. One day, they received private intelligence of his retreat, and the party, in a body, was marching thither to secure him, when his son, a boy about ten or twelve years of age, happened, luckily, to be going to his father with some provisions tied in a handkerchief. He could not be mistaken! the whole party, consisting of a serjeant and twelve, were making directly towards his father's cave,—something must instantly be done to give the alarm. There was a drummer also of the party, and with him young Stewart entered into conversation. He soon learnt that the greatest grievance little duck-leg had to complain of was the woeeful effect which the keen Highland air had upon his stomach.—

‘Nothing can be better,’ argued the sagacious mountaineer; ‘he will soon forget the danger of his back for the gratification of his belly.’ They lagged behind; and Stewart affected great curiosity to know the use of the drum. ‘I’ll give you all the provisions I carry in this bundle,’ said he to the drummer, ‘if you shew me the use of that same thing.’ The offer was too tempting, the drum was braced; and three jolly ruffians put its possessor also in possession of a roasted fowl, a quantity of bread and cheese, and some whiskey; and warned the intrepid Roy Stewart to fly from his merciless pursuers.

Captain Lewis Grant meeting a Highland girl, who had just forded the Spey with a peck of meal under her arm, was minded to puzzle her, by asking the depth of the ford, the price of the meal, and the hour of the day, all in a breath.—

‘How deep?—How dear?—How late?’ quired the witty captain,—

‘Past nine, going to ten;
Knee deep, and eleven pence,’ was the quick reply. ULIN.

TWELFTH-DAY.

[FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE]

‘Now, now the mirth comes,
With the cake full of plums,
Where Beane’s the King of the sport here:
Best let us we must know,
The Pea also
Must revell as Quenee in the court here.

Begin thou to abuse,
This night as ye use,
Who shall for the present delight here;
Be a King by the lot,
And who shall not Be Twelfe-day Quenee for the night here.’

HEARICK.

THE rites of Twelfth Day, called also the Feast of the Epiphany, (from a Greek word, signifying ‘manifestation,’) though different in various countries, have the same common object, that of doing honour to the eastern magi, to whom Christ on this day was manifested, and who, according to a tradition of the Romish church, were three in number, and of royal dignity. ‘Of these magi, or sages, (vulgarly called the three kings of Colen,) the first, named Melchior, an aged man, with a long beard, offered gold; the second, Jasper, a beardless youth, offered frankincense; the third, Balthasar, a black or Moor, with a large spreading beard, offered myrrh, according to this distich:—

‘Tres Reges Regi Regum tria dona ferebant;
Myrrham homini, Ucto auro, Thura dedere Deo.’

The custom of making the offerings was observed at court so late as the year 1731, when, at the Chapel Royal of St. James, on Twelfth Day, George II. and his son, the Prince of Wales, ‘made the offerings at the altar, of gold, frankincense, and myrrh, according to custom.’ The offerings are still continued, but they are now made by proxy.

Ever since the days of Alfred, who made a law that the twelve days after the nativity of our Saviour should be kept as festivals, Twelfth Day has been remarkable for its festivities. Bourne says, it is one of the greatest of the twelve, and of more jovial observation for the visiting of friends and Christmas gambols.

During the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. the celebration of Twelfth

Day was, equally with Christmas Day, a festival throughout the land, and was observed with great ostentation and ceremony in both the universities, at court, at the Temple, and at Lincoln's and Gray's Inn. Many of the Masques of Ben Jonson were written for the amusement of the royal family on this night; and Dugdale, in his Origines Juridicæ, has given us a long and particular account of the revelry at the Temple on each of the twelve days of Christmas, in the year 1562.

The breakfast on Twelfth Day was directed to be of brawn, mustard, and malmsey; the dinner of two courses, to be served in the hall; and, after the first course, cometh in the master of the game, apparelled in green velvet; and the ranger of the forest also, in a green suit of satten, bearing in his hand a green bow, and divers arrows; with either of them a hunting horn about their necks, they pace round about the fire three times. Then the master of the game maketh three curtseys, kneels down, and petitions to be admitted into the service of the lord of the feast.

This ceremony performed, a huntsman cometh into the hall with a fox, and a purse-net with a cat, both bound at the end of a staff, and with them nine or ten couple of hounds, with the blowing of hunting horns. And the fox and cat are by the hounds set upon and killed beneath the fire. This sport finished, the marshal (an officer so called, who with many others, under different appellations, were created for the purpose of conducting the revels,) placeth them in their several appointed places.

After the second course, the 'ancientest of the masters of the revels singeth a song, with the assistance of others there present;' and after some repose and revels, supper, consisting of two courses, is then served in the hall, and being finished, 'the marshal presenteth himself with drums afore him, mounted upon a scaffold, born by four men; and goeth three times round about the harthe, crying out aloud, "A lord, a lord," &c.; then he descendeth and goeth to dance. This done, the lord of mirth addresseth himself to the banquet, which ended with some minstrelsy, mirth, and dancing, every man departeth to rest.'

Such were the rural sports of our ancestors on Twelfth Day, in the 16th century; these, however, were not the only amusements, as a King and Queen were chosen for the night, as appears by the quotation from Herrick, who was contemporary with Shakespeare, at the head of this article; and in Ben Jonson's Masque of Christmas, the character of Babycake is attended by 'an usher, bearing a great cake with a bean and pease.' The chusing a person King or Queen by a bean found in a piece of a divided cake, was formerly a common Christmas gambol in both the English universities; and the practice of balloting for them by written papers or characters is of modern date.

The practice of chusing King and Queen on Twelfth Night, is said to owe its origin to a custom among the Romans, which they took from the Grecians, of casting dice who should be the Rex Conviviæ, or, as Horace calls him, the Arbiter Bibendi. Whoever threw the lucky cast, which they termed Venus or Basilicus, gave laws for the night. A similar custom was observed at the festival called Saturnalia, among the Romans and Grecians, when persons of the same rank drew lots for kingdoms, and, like kings, exercised their temporal authority.

In the ancient calendar of the Romish church, there is an observation on the 5th day of January, the eve or vigil of the Epiphany: 'Kings created or elected by beans.' The 6th is called 'The Festival of Kings,' with this additional remark, 'that the ceremony of electing kings was continued with feasting for many days.' In the cities and academies of Germany, the students and citizens choose one of their own number for King, providing a most magnificent banquet on the occasion. In France, during the ancien regime, one of the courtiers was chosen King, and the nobles attended on this day at an entertainment; but, at the end of the year 1792, the council general of the commons at Paris, passed an arrêt, in consequence of which, 'La Fête des Rois,' (Twelfth Day,) was thenceforth to be called 'La Fête des Sansculottes.' It was called an anti-civic feast, which made every priest that kept it a royalist.

With the French, 'Le Roi de la Fête' signifies a Twelfth Night King; and they have a proverb, 'Il a trouvé la fève au gâteau,' signifying, 'he is in luck,' &c. but, literally, 'he has found the bean in the cake.' There is a very curious account in Le Rouch Dictionnaire Comique, of the French ceremony of the 'Rois de la Fête,' which explains Jordan's fine picture of 'Le Roi boit;' but we prefer concluding this account of Twelfth Day with a song from the Anthologie Française, for 1817, in which the subject is very happily moralized:—

'LES ROIS DE LA FEVE.

En ce jour le sort n'est propice,
Et sur le trône il m'a porté;
Amis, que l'on se réjouisse,
Pour célébrer ma royauté.
Mon règne n'étant qu'un beau rêve,
Prolongez mon heureux sommeil;
Car vous me direz au réveil:
"Tu n'étais qu'un Roi de la fève."

Nous voyons souvent sur la scène
César, Auguste, Agamemnon;
Mais les enfans de Melpomène
De ces grands Rois n'ont que le nom.
Alors que la pièce s'achève
Se dissipe l'illusion;
César, Auguste, Agamemnon,
Ne sont que des Rois de la fève.

Si le bonheur est sur le trône,
J'en jouirai quelques momens;
Mais si la gloire l'environne,
Elle en cache aussi les tourmens.
Quand vers les cieux mon œil s'élève,
Je dis: "Ces Rois si grands, si fiers,
Devant le Roi de l'Univers,
Que sont-ils? des Rois de la fève."

Messrs. POPE, EGERTON, CONNOR, AND HOLLAND.

'I'd rather bear a bruise can stick turn'd,
Or a dry wheel grate on an axle-tree.'

SHAKESPEARE.

Of these four worthies perhaps Mr. Pope stands rather the highest, though bad indeed is the best; we have heard that, fourteen or sixteen years ago, this gentleman was an extremely fine actor;—if so, he may now with great justice and propriety exclaim with Wolsey,—'Nay, then, farewell! I've touched the highest point of all my greatness, and from that full meridian of my glory, I haste now to my setting.' Mr. Pope has undoubtedly fine lungs; he makes a great noise, has a great skill in clapping, and is a tatterdemalion of passions. He has not one requisite for an actor, excepting a good voice, and this he uses at all times, and on all occasions, with such vehemence, that its value is entirely lost. He substitutes rant for reason and raving for energy; in fine, he exactly answers Shakespeare's description of a 'robustious fellow, who tears a passion to rags, to very tatters.' His face is as hard and unmeaning as a piece of wainscot, his eyes are generally nearly closed, and his brow always pursed up and contracted with an angry frown. We have been told that he formerly performed Othello with great applause; if this was the case, it must have been because his countenance was not exactly seen, for surely no person can be pleased unless the eye answers to the heart, and the external corresponds with the internal action. Mr. Pope may have been a good actor; we do not mean to deny it; we cannot contradict it; but we are speaking of him as he is at the present time, when he is neither a fine, a good, or even, generally speaking, a tolerable actor. He is barely respectable in more than half a dozen characters; nothing can be worse than his Iago; indeed, we only mention it to deplore that any one should be permitted to stalk through the very character which has acquired so much celebrity from the pre-eminent acting of the late Mr. Cooke, Mr. Kean, and Mr. Macready. The illusion is completely destroyed; we trust, however, never again to endure the pain of its repetition. We are, however, always more happy to point out beauties than defects; it therefore gives us pleasure to eulogize the feeling manner in which he plays Hubert, particularly the scene in which he is about to put out the eyes of the unfortunate Arthur. His rough honesty in Clytus, his 'trusty Caius,' in 'King Lear,' his admirable performance of Sciolto, his 'Old John of Gault, Time Honour'd Lancaster,' his blunt Casca, and his highly natural representation of Old Norval, deserve favourable mention. But here commendation must cease. His Henry the Sixth is boisterous, noisy, and vociferous; and we really feel obliged to Richard for ridding us of so much clamorous vehemence. He may have played Mr. Oakley and Mr. Strickland well in his younger days, but they are miserable now. His Friar Lawrence and Lascasas are the best things he has done lately; they might, however, be very much improved. We advise Mr. Pope to repress his voice as much as possible; his other physical deficiencies, of course, he can never supply, but he may be more calm, and act with a little more judgment and discretion; we never expect to see him play finely, but he certainly may, with care and attention, maintain his station as a decent third-rate performer.

Of Mr. Egerton the less said the better, he is indeed a fellow of no mark nor likelihood, if he has been seen once, he has been seen always, he has no change of voice, no variety of manner, always the same monotonous sepulchral drawl, always inanimate, always unfeeling. Whether as the fat ghost in Hamlet, or Banquo, the hypocritical arch fiend Stukely, the distrest merchant Antonio, the Solemn Capulet, the licentious and overbearing Henry the Eighth, or the majestic Cymbeline, it is still nothing but Mr. Egerton. The pungent remarks of the sarcastic sneer are entirely lost by the inefficient manner in which Mr. Egerton performs the character. In Tullus Aufidius, he looks more like a brawny butcher than a Volscian, he is sadly wanting in nobility in his interviews with the haughty Coriolanus. His attempt of Joseph Surface merits the severest animadversion, unless, indeed, we would divest the accomplished hypocrite of every thing like gentlemanly manners. What are we to say then of his Macduff? If clenching his fist and striking his bosom every other moment, is pathetic, it is unquestionably a fine performance: in our humble opinion, however, every body can do so; it is the transition of voice and countenance from desperate to languid sorrow, as the passion fluctuates, that indicates the master; it is this which renders Mr. C. Kemble's personation of the wronged and virtuous Thane, the most perfect representation on the stage. He is coarse and vulgar in Major Oakley, to a degree that can charm only his counterparts in the galleries. His Ford possesses very few beauties, but we forbear further comment, as the part is altogether far beyond him. His Iago is but little better than Mr. Pope's; his own good sense should teach him never to appear in characters of this nature; he cannot surely expect to succeed in them. His best efforts, and they are but efforts, are Syphax, Clytus, and Sully, in 'Henri Quatre.' He makes as much of the bluntness of the two former characters, as it is possible, and he both looked and dressed the latter extremely well. The good humoured gaiety, gallantry, and generosity of Henri are finely contrasted with the gravity of his staid counsellor, Sully; we again repeat that these characters are very decently performed.

It may be, with justice, said of Mr. CONNOR, that 'he has no spur to prick the sides of his intent, but only vaulting ambition which overleaps itself.' The characters of Glow-worm, in 'Tessing made Easy,' (originally sustained by Mr. Jones); Howard, in 'The Will'; Keri Khan, Pizarro, the fiery Tybalt, (Mr. Connor having no more animation or fire than an automaton); Axalla, in 'Tamerlane'; Lovell, in the 'Clandestine Marriage,' &c. &c. and numberless others, formerly performed by Mr. C. Kemble, will fully justify our remarks. It was a direct insult to the public to assign him the character of the Prince of Wales, in Henry IV.; the gay, the airy, the sprightly Henry was converted into a vulgar Irish bog-trotter; all the elegance, the wit, the piquant railery was completely lost; our disgust was also much increased by having, a short time before, seen Mr. C. Kemble in the same part, whose exquisite delineation was still vivid in our recollection. What are we to say, then, of his perpetual performance of Don Juan? why, merely this; that he is about as far distant from giving us any conception of the character, as we are from the Antipodes. Imagine a fat, vulgar, bald-headed man of forty, personating the handsomest, most gallant, and most dissipated character throughout the Spanish dominions. Is it possible that such a representation can excite any thing but laughter and well-merited contempt? The only characters which he performs at all respectably, are Irishmen; he is, however, too hurried in his articulation; still he possesses a more just conception of an Irish gentleman than we generally see exhibited; he has no more of the brogue than is sufficient to distinguish his country, in which respect he reminds us of the inimitable Johnstone. We have good specimens of gentlemen in Sir Patrick MacGuire and Sir Lucius O'Trigger; he likewise displays considerable ability in such bog-trotters as Pat, in 'Pigeons and Crows,' and the Irishman, in 'Rosina'; nor will we forget O'Donnell, in 'Henri Quatre'; Foigard, in the 'Beaux Stratagem'; Father Luke, in the 'Poor Soldier'; and Captain O'Cutter, in the 'Jealous Wife.'

'Though hat not least in our dear love' stands Mr. HOLLAND; we think this gentleman has a small portion of talent, but it is obscured by a host of faults. 'He creeps, he flies, (a hero should not walk); he struts, he bel-lows, he saws the air with one hand. Whenever he personates old men, he walks as if his legs were tied together; when young ones or lovers, he seems to have infinitely too much self importance to think of any thing but himself; it is, therefore, in middle aged characters that he succeeds the best. Among these we would instance Buckingham, and Valerius, in Brutus, which possess considerable merit. It was presumpt-

tion in him to attempt the character of the Abbé de L'Épée, especially after Mr. Kemble had performed it in so masterly a style. In Lord Lovell, he sits as unconcerned during the time Sir Giles Overreach is relating his villainous projects, as if they were conversing on common place topics. Nothing can be much more absurd than to see him figuring away in comedy; it is quite ridiculous for a man of his age to aim at performing Danley, in the Hypocrite; Hastings, in She Stoops to Conquer; and Colonel Briton, in The Wonder. What could induce him to undertake Cassio, for which he has not a single requisite? His drunken scene is miserable; indeed, the whole character is completely murdered. The only part which he really plays fairly, is the Prior, in Bertram; he could not have imagined that he possessed so much talent: in several passages he was eminently successful, and received that applause which his admirable delineation so richly deserved; indeed, we really are at a loss whether to admire him, in the Prior, or Mr. Keen, in Bertram, the most; we should, however, have preferred religion clad in a little less austerity. We shall now conclude our brief notices of these gentlemen, merely observing, that we trust they will never appear in any character which requires more than ordinary share of genius or ability.

THE JEW'S LEAP.*

The path we were now obliged to follow was not more than two feet wide, in one place, and on our left it broke off in a precipice of some hundred feet deep to the sea; the smallest slip of the mule or camel would have plunged it and its rider down the rocks to inevitable and instant death, as there was no bush or any thing to lay hold of by which a man might save his life. Very fortunately for us, there had been no rain for a considerable time previous, so that the road was now dry. Kail told me, when it was wet it was never attempted, and that many fatal accidents had happened there within his remembrance; though there was another road which led round over the mountain far within the country.

One of these accidents he said he would mention.—A company of Jews, six in number, from Santa Cruz for Morocco, came to this place with their loaded mules in the twilight, after sunset; being very anxious to get past it before night, they did not take the precaution to look out and call aloud before they entered on it, for there is a place built at each end of this dangerous piece of road, from whence one may see if there are others on it, not being quite half a mile in length; a person, in hallooing out, can be heard from one end to the other, and it is the practice of all who go this way to give this signal. A company of Moors had entered at the other end going towards Santa Cruz, at the same time, and they also supposing that no others would dare to pass it at that hour, came on without the usual precaution. When about half way over, and in the place the two parties met, there was no possibility of passing each other, or turning about to back either way; the Moors were mounted as well as the Jews, neither party could retire, nor could any one, except the foremost, get on his mule: the Moors soon became outrageous, and threatened to throw the Jews down headlong; the Jews, though they had always been treated like slaves, and forced to submit to every insult and indignity, yet finding themselves in this perilous situation, without the possibility of retreating, and unwilling to break their necks merely to accommodate the Moors, the foremost Jew dismounted, carefully, over the head of his mule, with a stout stick in his hand; the Moor nearest him did the same, and came forward to attack him with his scimitar: both were fighting for their lives, as neither could retreat; the Jew's mule was first pitched down the craggy steep, and dashed to atoms by the fall. The Jew's stick was next hacked to pieces by the scimitar; when, finding it was impossible for him to save his life, he seized the Moor in his arms, and, springing off the precipice, both were instantly hurled to destruction; two more of the Jews and one Moor lost their lives, in the same way, together with eight mules! and the three Jews, who made out to escape, were hunted down and killed by the relations of the Moors who had lost their lives on the pass, and the place has, ever since, been called the Jew's Leap. It is, indeed, enough to produce dizziness, even in the head of a sailor, and if I had been told the story before getting on this frightful ridge, I am not certain, but that my imagination might have disturbed my faculties, and rendered me incapable of proceeding with safety along this perilous path.

ON BALLS FOR CHILDREN.

'To every thing there is a season, and a time for every purpose under heaven,' said the wise man; but said it before the invention of baby balls.

This modern device is a sort of a triple conspiracy against the innocence, the health, and the happiness of children.

Thus by factitious amusements to rob them of a relish for the simple joys, the unbought delights, which naturally belong to them, is like blotting out spring from the year.

To sacrifice the true and proper enjoyments of sprightly and happy children, is to make them pay a dear and disproportionate price for their artificial pleasures.

They step at once from the nursery to the ball-room, and, by a preposterous change of habits, are thinking of dressing themselves at an age when they ought to be dressing their dolls. Instead of bounding with the unrestrained freedom of wood-nymphs over hill and dale, their cheeks flushed with health, and their hearts overflowing with happiness, these pretty little creatures are shut up all the morning, demurely practising a minuet, or transacting the more serious business of acquiring the Highland fling, with more cost and pains than it would take them to acquire twenty new ideas.—Hannah More.

ANTAR'S DREAM.

(FROM AN UNPUBLISHED POEM.)

As they each other sat beside,
Looking to heaven, then on the tide
Of ocean, which before them lay,
Watching the beams that seemed to play
With the soft breeze, and waves all bright,
Flashing and curling,—blue and white,
Antar, with one hand round Lila's neck,
The other lock'd in her sweet one,
Directed her eyesight to a speck—
A cloud, on which the moonlight shone!
And while they gaz'd upon it there,
It slowly melted into air.
And then he turned, as if amaz'd,
And said, as he on Lila gaz'd,—
The cloud, that thou but now didst see,
Forbodes some dire distress to me!
For oh! I dreamt that you and I
Were lying 'neath as calm a sky
As that which now above us glows,
Tinted with colours sweet as rose;

* A dangerous and frightful pass, over which Captain Riley and his fellow sufferers travelled, in their journey from Santa Cruz towards Morocco, is related in his own narrative.—From Riley's Narrative.

Methought, that we that moment turn'd
Our eyes on heaven, where brightly burn'd
A meteor, with a train of fire,
That flash'd and trembled through the air:
Then came a cloud, like one in ire,
Whose brow of danger cries 'beware!'
Black as the midnight ocean, when
The moon and stars are veiled from men.
The meteor now the cloud had met,
And round it like a scorpion curl'd:
When 'gainst them both a high wind set,
And downward they to earth were hurld.
And then, methought that ev'ry star
Forsook the sphere where they were fixt;
And meeting, form'd a fiery car,
That roll'd the earth and sky betwixt.
And there were sitting side by side,
A bridegroom and his blushing bride,
And as though air the star-earrings hid,
They off embraced—but off her kist,
And seem'd as blest in either's eyes,
As our first parents ere they knew
The curse of sin and Satan too,
Seem'd in sainted Paradise!
While gliding on, all lightly they,
Thro' fields of ether, bent their way;
Like a young flower that blossoms when
The sun looks bright upon the world.
The wide sky opened—closed again,
And ev'ry star was, hiasing, whirl'd
Back to the heaven where they first shone,
Just as my niry dream began.
The bride and bridegroom downward fell,
When out I shriek'd in dreadful yell,
And woke in time—confused, amazed,
To hear the cry my echo rais'd!

WILFORD.

IMITATION.

SWEET is the moment, richly sweet,
When lovers, after absence, meet;
And find within the pure embrace,
That time cannot their love efface.
To gain an hour so sweet as this,
E'en separation perfects bliss;
They quite forget the parting pain,
So great the joy to meet again.
All their past troubles, all past cares,
While one relates, the other shares;
Then down they in the present minute,
Which gives an age of rapture in it.

THE WANDERER'S DREAM.

(FROM MELMOTH.)

He dreams, that on a lofty precipice
He stood, whose brow frown'd o'er a vast abyss,
No eye could measure, far and wide beneath;
Its base was scorch'd by the tempestuous breath
Of fiery waves, which sunk and rose again,
Drenching the dreamer with the sulphurous rain
Of their red spray; livid and fierce they glow'd,
On ev'ry curl a tortured spirit rode,
And shriek'd and sunk and rose again to air,
But to be blasted by the light'ning there.
With agonising and immortal life,
Each grogging bellow heaved in fearful strife;
The rude rock echoed back the madd'ning roar
Of the fierce wave, and ones that shoot the shore;
Of souls that struck upon its granite side,
Then yelling sunk beneath the scalding tide;
Sudden, the wand'rer felt his carcass flung
Half down the steep, and there in terror clung:
He looked aloft, no light could be decey,
But all was darkness, horror, agony.

He saw an arm alone, he felt its grasp,
And his breath died beneath its iron clasp.
He shriek'd, and with the strength that terror gave,
Felt round, and grasp'd at all he deemed might save.
A group stood there, Mononda, Stanton, those Whose days he gave in misery to close,
E'en his last, foudest victim, Isidore,
Turn'd coldly from him, and all hope was o'er.
His eye's bright glance (as slow they flitted by,) Roll'd 'twards the dial of eternity;
It pointed to the long protracted hour
When he must bow beneath a demon's power.
He fell, he sunk, he blazing rose, and heard
Float on the burning surge, the sick'ning word,
Echoed by myriad tongues in mock'ry roars:
Melmoth, th' accurs'd, the wanderer, has come.
The wide wave open'd to the hideous yell,
And bound his spirit in its proper hell.

SONG FROM THE GAELIC.

TUNE—MY POOR DOG TRAY.

THOUGH December to others seems bleak and severe,
'Tis the dearest to me of the circling year;
For it gave me a treasure, in giving a wife,
A lover less than e'er spring brought to life.
THOUGH December to others seems bleak and
severe,
'Tis the dearest to me of the circling year;
For it gave me twilights that outlive the rose,
And a bosom that's purer than new-driven snows.

It gave me a breath sweet as vernal perfume;
It gave me two cheeks of the loveliest hue;
It gave me two eyes that are brighter than dew;
And it gave me a heart that is faithful and true.

Then welcome, December, though hoary with snow,
Thou art dearer to me than the summer's bright glow;
And my Mary, the treasure thou gavest to me, Shall be dear when grown hoary and ancient like thee.

When her beauty and bloom shall have yielded to age,

As the beauties of nature now yield to thy rage,
Then dear shall she be as the light to my eyes,
For her fond faithful heart is the jewel I prize!

Fine Arts.

ANCIENT ARMOUR.

Which awakes
The stirring memory of a thousand years.
LORD BYRON.

Of all the branches of knowledge, which have, at different times, employed the energies, and excited the investigation of the human mind, there is, perhaps, scarcely any so universally useful as the study of antiquity, and the inquiry into the manners and customs of past ages. The genius of antiquarian research lends, successively, his assistance to history and romance, to literature, and the fine arts. It is, in its connexion with the last subject that we propose to consider, the present exhibition, and, we will venture to say, that the advantage which painting may derive from the study of this valuable collection, will not be inconsiderable.

The preservation of costume, in historical composition, is always desirable, and although deficiency, in this respect, may be pardoned, when its want is counterbalanced by excellence in the higher branches of art, still, we believe, none of our readers will be inclined to think that impropriety, as far as relates to costume, is not to be avoided. This assertion will have less weight, if we consider how many of the greatest masters have fallen into the most glaring and absurd incongruities from a want of attention to this point. We are disgusted when we see Rembrandt, the great master of the chiaroscuro, in his 'Descent from the cross,' representing a Jewish ruler under the similitude of a fat Dutch burghmaster, almost as much so as when we see in our old Bibles, God the Father represented in a Quaker's coat, with steel buckles, looking out of the burning bush, and Moses unlacing a pair of hob-nailed boots at his command. We lament, when even Il Divino Raffaello, in his celebrated
'Parnassus,' arms his Apollo like a French dancing-master, with a modern violin. As these instances plainly shew into what absurdities the greatest artists have fallen from neglect of appropriate costume, we cannot but regard it as a happy omen, when we see an exhibition opened in the heart of our fashionable metropolis, for the express purpose of introducing to our attention, some of the choicest specimens of military antiquities. The different parts of the collection are disposed in such a way as to reflect the highest credit on the taste and ingenuity of the exhibitor, as well as to make a striking impression on the mind of every visitor; indeed, the arrangement is only to be exceeded by the costliness and good choice displayed in the collection. We shall notice a few of the most striking specimens, as our limits will not allow us to enter into a minute detail of every part of the exhibition. A whole length of Henri Quatre, which we believe an authentic likeness of that distinguished sovereign, forms a striking object in the collection; and the armour, in point of beauty and preservation, has never perhaps been equalled, certainly never surpassed. The armour of a knight of the Second Crusade, consisting of a suit of chain armour of the most curious and unique nature, being in a state of preservation, when we consider the great antiquity which it has now attained; as if we transfer to other objects the title to excellence in the literary world, fixed by Dr. Johnson as tenable after the lapse of a century, the present valuable specimen of antiquity has already a sevenfold claim to our attention and admiration. When, to this consideration, we add the circumstance, that, after the invention of plate armour, and the subsequent disuse of the 'maillle enchainée,' this species of defensive armour was rarely to be met with, unless in the choice, and showy collections which existed in the armories of the nobility, and that even there, the plain appearance of the rusty and unsightly chain-mail gave way to the more elegant and elaborate manufacture of Milan and of Malta, we shall rather incline to wonder that any reliques of so remote a period should have reached us, than that so few collections can boast of more than detached portions of this species, and those, generally, carelessly and imperfectly preserved. To offer any observations on the suit of Albert, the great champion of Bararia, and upon numerous other specimens, as entire as they are detached, would extend this article to too great a length, but we cannot withhold our expression of satisfaction, at the manner in which the entire suits have been prepared for public exhibition, as well as at the execution of the striking countenances, and, comparatively speaking, natural attitudes of the figures invested with them. To conclude; we would wish to recommend to the antiquarian, to the artist, and to the curious in general, the present exhibition at the Gothic Hall, as one which unites, at once, instruction with amusement, in a way which cannot fail to attract the notice, and delight the taste of the enlightened public of the metropolis. After all, the contemplation of reliques like the present, recalls to our recollection the heroes on whose heroic forms these ponderous arms were once braced; they forcibly arrest our attention, and bring to our minds the words of the bard:—

'Where are our chiefs of old? Where are the kings?
Of mighty name? The fields of their battles are lone—

Where their mossy tombs remain.'

WILLIAM HENRY PARRY.

The Drama.

As it is seldom deemed necessary to make any exertion during the Christmas Holidays beyond that of producing a new pantomime, our notice of the drama, this week, is necessarily very limited, and we must, therefore, refer our dramatic readers to the criticism on the performers in another part of our journal.

DAVY LANE.—The comedy of The Wonder was performed at this theatre on Saturday night, for the purpose of introducing a Miss Barry in the character of Violante. Her appearance is not very youthful, and her figure is rather too embonpoint for the character of Violante, but her face is expressive and her voice clear and powerful. In many of the scenes she blended energy and tenderness very happily. If she was deficient in any thing, it was in sprightly humour, which was, in some degree, compensated by her unaffected ease. Her reception was very favourable, and she repeated the character on Wednesday night with increased effect. Elliston was the Don Felix, which he played with great spirit and vivacity. His drunken scene, though somewhat overacted, was productive of much amusement. Harley was a pleasant bustling Lissardo; and the two waiting maids were admirably sustained by Miss Kelly and Mrs. Orger.

The new pantomime of The North-west Passage, has received some judicious alterations, and may probably run the usual period of such productions.

COVENT GARDEN.—The public expectation has been considerably excited by the announcement of a new tragedy, from the pen of Mr. Barry, Cornwall, called Mirandola, which was to have been performed on Thursday night: its production is, however, postponed until Tuesday next. Green Room report, not always the most correct, speaks highly of the tragedy, and the talents of Mr. C. are such as to give the report considerable credence.

The new pantomime continues attractive.

Literature and Science.

Linnæus.—There has lately been discovered, accidentally, among the papers of a shopkeeper in Sweden, a biographical account of Linnæus, written by himself, and since continued to his death. The autograph MS., which is in the Swedish language, has been sent to Upsal, and will speedily be printed.

The Museum of the Asiatic Society of Calcutta, among other curiosities, contains a bulrush, cut in Nepal, eighty-four feet long; a serpent with two heads; specimens of mosaic from Agra and Calcutta; crystals from Nepal, and sculptures from Persepolis, Java, &c.

The promised edition of Mr. Sheridan's dramatic works is expected to appear in the course of this month; but Mr. T. Moore's life of that distinguished individual is likely to be long deferred.

Mr. Halbert, author of the 'African Traveller,' &c. has in the press, 'Select Antiquities, Curiosities, Beauties, and Varieties of Nature and Art.'

Dr. Cartwright's Pædo-Motive Machine.—The ingenious doctor's expectation, that he should live to see carriages of every description travelling the road without horses, has been, in some degree, realized. A letter in the Star, signed 'A Traveller,' states, that on the road between Tunbridge and Hastings he had met a cart loaded with coals, and travelling without horses, being impelled by an apparatus managed by two men,—the same, in short, as that invented by Dr. C. 'Its pace,' says the traveller, 'was uniform, and, as the men informed me, varied very little whether it was on level ground or going up hill, provided the carriage was not overloaded.' On expressing my doubts how this could be, the men could not explain the reason. But much as I might have doubted its facility of ascending a hill, I should have doubted still more (had I not seen it) the rapidity and safety with which it went down.—On coming to a short steep hill, instead of locking the wheel, considering how heavily the carriage was loaded, the carriage was suffered to run down with unrestrained velocity, much faster than any prudent man would have ventured with a light gig. I saw clearly, however, there was no danger; for the whole machine, I observed, was guided with the greatest accuracy, and its speed, as the men informed me (and of which, on inspecting the mechanism, I had no doubt), could be regulated at pleasure, or even stopped, should occasion require it, in the middle of its career, in an instant.' North Polar Expedition.—The natural curiosities brought from the arctic regions by Captain Parry have been

THE NEW TRAGEDY.

Mirandola. A Tragedy. By Barry Cornwall. 8vo. pp. 110. London, 1821.

We feel peculiar pleasure in commencing the second Number of the third Volume of the Literary Chronicle with a notice of one of the finest efforts of the tragic muse, that has been produced for many years. The late period at which the play has been published allows us little time for comment, and we have, already, in another part of our Journal, detailed the plot and incidents, and expressed our unqualified approbation. But we must confess that much as we felt gratified in witnessing the performance of this tragedy, and aware as we were of the many poetic beauties that it possessed, we enjoyed a still higher treat in its perusal. It possesses all the beauties of Mr. Cornwall's style, free from those blemishes with which his former productions were tinged. The same intense beauty and depth of feeling, the same good taste and vigour of expression, the same animated description and skilful appropriation of imagery which distinguishes his 'Dramatic Scenes' and his 'Marcian Colonna,' are exhibited in Mirandola in still greater power and perfection. Before we select two or three of the scenes, which, we believe, will fully justify all that we have said, we shall quote the author's advertisement as to the originality of the tragedy. He says,—

'The fact of a father having married the lady betrothed to his son, occurred in the case of Philip the Second of Spain and of D'Este, one of the Dukes of Ferrara. This fact I have borrowed, as well as the circumstance of the father condemning his son to death. In other respects, the Tragedy is, as far as I know, original. The character of the sensitive Mirandola, more particularly, is unborrowed. He is unlike Philip and D'Este: and he will be found to differ also from Othello and Polixenes. In mentioning these characters of Shakespeare, the reader will not. I am sure, infer that I mean to draw any comparison, otherwise than for the mere purpose of stating that a difference actually exists.

The first extract we shall make is part of the third scene in the first act, which breathes of love and tenderness:

Duke. Forgive me that I thus neglect you, love.

—Why my dear Isidora, yesterday

Has worn you to a shadow.

Isid. Oh! not so.

Duke. In faith it has.—Dear girl, I know you hate

These empty pageantries. Jove! so do I.

I'd rather be in battle, and weighed down

By steel and iron than by these idle gauds.

But we must play our part, my sweet one, in

This silly world. Could I order things here,

Half of the moon I'd waste in war: the rest

I'd give to Cupid.

Isid. So: not all to love then?

Duke. Why, no—yet I am wrong; for oh! with you

Who could desert the chamber for the camp?

Not I. I would be with you even—ever.

Isid. That were too long.

Duke. Too long, my Isidora?

Isid. Ay: 'Ever' is a long time, my dear lord:

Love has no such eternity.

Duke. Indeed!

Isid. Indeed, 'tis so: Life even has its end;

And love cannot be longer sure than life.

The declaration of the Duke's affection for Isidora, though partly anticipated in our dramatic critique, possesses so much force and beauty that we cannot forbear giving the passage at length:—

Duke. My own sweet! love! Oh! my dear peerless wife!

By the blue sky and all its crowding stars

I love you better—Oh! far better than

Woman was ever loved. There's not an hour

Of day or dreaming night but I am with thee:

There's not a wind but whispers of thy name,

And not a flower that sleeps beneath the moon

But in its hues or fragrance tells a tale

Of thee, my love, to thy Mirandola.

Speak, dearest Isidora, can you love

As I do? Can—no, no; I shall grow

Boish if thus I talk. You must be gone,

You must be gone, fair Isidora, else

The business of the dukedom soon will cease.

I speak the truth, by Dian. Even now

Gheraldi waits without (or should) to see me.

In faith, you must go; one kiss; and so, away.

Isid. Farewell, my lord.

Duke. We'll ride together, dearest,

Some few hours hence.

Isid. Just as you please; farewell! [Exit.]

Duke. Farewell! With what a waving air she goes

Along the corridor. How like a fawn;

Yet statelier.—Hark! no sound, however soft

(Not gentlest echo) telleth when she treads;

But every motion of her shape doth seem

Hallowed by silence. Thus did Hebe grow

Amidst the gods, a paragon; and thus—

Away! I'm grown the very fool of love.'

The remaining part of this scene, in which the treacherous monk Gheraldi pours the subtle poison into the ear of the Duke, and makes him jealous of his son, when he hears that he had once loved Isidora, and was now on his way home, is extremely well managed. But we pass on to the third scene of the second act, which is the melancholy and affecting interview between Guido and Isidora:—

Isid. He comes, he comes; and I must see him, too.

Oh! that I must—Not yet—I must, I must.

Hark! no, it is not he: It is my heart.

Will it not burn! My throat is full and choking.

God! look upon me now, and save me!—Save!

He'll come and curse me—and it will be good;

For I have stolen his heart away, and sung

My own to ruin.—Ruin! Oh, that I Could tell him all about my cruel lot,

And how I was betrayed, and lost for ever!

That monk advised me—Oh! no more of that. Ha! some one comes.

[Guido enters.]

Guido. [after a pause.] Madam, I come to pay

My duty to you.

Isid. Welcome; you are welcome.

Guido. I come to see how well thy bridal dress

Becomes the Duchess of Mirandola.

Isid. You have been well, I hope?

Guido. Since when?

Isid. Since you—

You and I parted.

Guido. That's a long time, now.

I have forgot: how is 't that you remember?

Isid. I—I—Oh! pity me!

Guido. Weep, lady, weep.

Teem (yet they're bitter) purity the soul,

But your's is fair!—I know they ease the heart.

Moan!

Isid. Oh! Guido—cruel, cruel, cruel!

Guido. [aside.] By heaven, my courage begins to fail; and I Grow womanish. Now let me wring her heart,

As she wrung mine—Ah! there she weeps away

Almost to dissolution.—How she bends,

Like one who sickens with remorse or love;

And she, perhaps, has been betrayed.—Alas!

Poor Isidora!

Isid. Ah!—you spoke?—you spoke?
Guido. 'Twas nothing.
Isid. Nothing? It was all to me.
Isid. Happiness!—no, that is gone: 'twas hope.
Isid. Pardon. Oh! my lord, (Guido no more.)
 What have I done that you can use me thus?
 I would not for the world, for all the world,
 Put you to such great sorrow.
Guido. Shall I tell you?
Isid. Yes.
Guido. Listen to me, then. When you were young—
 You are young still, and fair—the more's the pity:
 But in the time I speak of, you were just Bursting from childhood—with a face as fair
 As though you had look'd in Paradise, and caught
 It's early beauty: then, your smile was soft,
 As innocence before it learns to love.
 And yet a woman's passion dwelt within Your heart, as warm as love.—But I am wrong?
Isid. Oh! no. I loved—
Guido. Indeed!
Isid. Indeed, indeed!
Guido. Well!—There was one who loved you too. He said
 That every hope he had rested on you.
 He worshipped you, as idols are adored
 In countries near the sun. He gave his heart
 So absolutely up, that had he thought Then, that you would desert him, he'd have slain Himself before you. You were his home, his heaven,
 His wealth, his light, his mind, and life substantial.
 But then he went away to the fierce wars,
 (His honour was pledged for it), and he left
 You with an oath upon your soul, behind,
 'Twas said he died—
Isid. One said he saw you fall.
Guido. 'Twas said he died, and that she grieved awhile,
 In virgin widowhood for him. At last,
 A duke—a reigning duke, with wintry hair,
 And subtle spirit, and—without a heart,
 Came wooing to her, and so—you do not heed me—
 And so she died her tears, and (tho' the youth Wrote that he lived,) she laugh'd, and left the son,
 To marry with the father.
Isid. And you wrote
 To me?
Guido. To you and him.
Isid. I feared 'twas so
 Now heaven help me; for I'm wound about
 By their strong toils, and there is no escaping.
 O! I am worn, and broken down by grief.
 I dare not hope that you'll believe me, yet
 That letter, Guido—Oh, I never knew it;
 I had no letter—saw no letter.
Guido. What!
 I wrote to you from Naples; from my bed
 Where I lay languishing, by Gaspero,
 My father's servant. Why, I wrote—(has there been cozening here!)—unto my father: he Will not deny't. Where is that slave?
Isid. Gaspero? He is dead.
Guido. He was my father's servant. Could he be Unfaithful? No.
Isid. Your father priz'd him much.
 Oh! it is too clear: we are both undone.
Guido. It may be; nay, it is. But, 'ere I sink,
 I will be righted some way, or revenged.

What! does he think to cheat me now, and wear
 His prize abroad so boldly—before me?
 I'll have revenge.
Isid. He is your father, Guido.
 Nay—
Guido. I disown him. He has lost his son.
 Some parents shut their children from their homes,
 (Young boys and gentle girls) but I abjure
 My father in his age: let him go down
 Into his grave alone!
Isid. Do not incense him.
Guido. Whom?
Isid. The duke.
Guido. You're right.
 Call him no more my father. No; I'll talk
 As one man with his equal; or, perhaps,
 I may wear something of superior scorn,
 And drop a word or two of charity;
 But that will be for thy sake, my poor girl!
 Nay, dry your tears: and let us part awhile.
Isid. Farewell.
Guido. Oh! not farewell yet. I but go
 To see the duke. When shall we meet again?
Isid. We must not; yet—
Guido. We will, we will, once more.
Isid. Hark!—lush! your father comes.
Guido. Why, that is well.
 We will (I'm glad of't) say at once good-morrow,
 Without more ceremony.
Isid. No; not now.
 Not now, I cannot bear it.—Nay, for me.
Guido. That is a charm I cannot disobey.
Isid. Quick, quick, he comes!
Guido. We'll meet again. Remember!
 [Isid. exit.]
 Isidora does not, however, meet Guido, but, at the persuasion of Isabella, sends him a ring, a fit and not unfrequent instrument for exciting jealousy.
 The Duke gives a banquet to celebrate his son's return; and, after welcoming him with music, discovers that Isidora does not wear the ring: the circumstance does not much affect him until he sees it on the finger of his son:—
Duke. More wine: fill high!
 Gentlemen! a brave welcome to my son!
 Guido, may discord never, never come
 Between us.—Bring a goblet hither, Sirs,
 And let him taste his welcome. Let the health
 Pass round, and no one slight it. My dear son, Give me your hand.—At Mantua once this—
 Ah— [He sees the ring.]
Julio. Look!—What's the matter with the Duke?
Guido. My lord!
Hyp. Look at my uncle, mother!
Isab. Sir, be still!
Lord. Come forward—How?
Isid. My Lord!—Ha!
Guido. Father, speak,
 What means this?
Duke. Nothing. I am quiet—calm.
 The heavens are o'er us, and it may be—no thing.
 It may be—Ha! begone!—Now, now, for ever
 I cast aside goodness and faith and love,
 No more to be put on—masks as they are,
 To hide the base and villainous tricks of men.
 Break up the feast! All leave us!—O bright
 Heaven!
 Laugh you in scorn upon me? See! it shines Right through the windows, and the nodding pines

Shake their black heads and mock me.—Shall I swear
 To kill? [The guests go out.]
Guido. Father!
Duke. That is—
Guido. My lord!
Duke. A lie.
 Monstrous and foul, not to be said or thought.
Isid. My gracious lord!
Duke. False painted thing, begone!
Isab. Nay—
Duke. Sister, will you drive me mad—outrageous?
 I am abused—abused, I tell you. Ha!
 Now do you start?
Isab. Retire, sweet Isidora;
 And you, dear Guido, bid Gheraldi come.
Guido. Poor Isidora!—What a fate is thine!
 [Guido and Isidora exit.]
Duke. Just then I had forgiven—almost forgot
 All his most insolent taunts, all; and her cold Unwilling smiles, that made—that make me mad.
 I could have loved her—like a fiery star,
 I could have bent before her from my path
 And worshipped her as something holy—Now,
 O, now!—
Isab. Dear brother!
Duke. Still am I the Duke
 Must you too put aside respect? No matter.
 I'll keep my way alone, and burn away—
 Evil or good I care not, so I spread Tremendous desolation on my road:—
 I'll be remembered as huge meteors are,
 From the dizziness they scatter.
 [Gheraldi enters.]
Gher. Gmelous Sir!
Duke. I wish to be alone.
 O earth and heaven! so fair, so lovely, yet
 To be—detestable!—Now for all future time
 I'll hate all things which seem as they were true,
 For then they're false, I know.—What I am
 I care not.—Father, draw you curtain down;
 Those cypripedium branches with their bending leaves
 Mock me: they mock my misery—my pain.
 O how my heart aches!
Isab. Brother, be composed.
Duke. I cannot.—Will you pour upon my brain
 Oblivion, or sweet balm over my heart?
 No: then you jeer me when you bid me still Be calm.—Would I were dull as Lethe is!
 Or dead—dead: that were better; yet not so,
 For I will live to be a terror still.
Gher. My lord!—
Duke. And yet,—were it not better, now,
 To leave the world at once, and pass my age
 In cell or forest?—this has been.
Gher. My lord!
 Perhaps the lady Isidora—
Duke. Slave!
 That word destroys me—tears me,—heart and soul.
 Cannot I dream, or sleep, but thou must be (My black familiar) at my elbow? Monk!
 I hate your fawning—(Sister, stay your speech,
 I hate your sly insinuating smiles,
 Your tongue that mocks your eyes, and tells a tale
 As foul as night. I will not trust that tongue;
 No, nor your eye, for both may be—are false.
 Audacious slave!
Isab. Dear brother, I must speak.
Duke. I've heard of men who in a moment have Done deeds of blood; but I—I will not thus Redden my memory. Leave us, Monk.—Begone! [Gheraldi exit.]

Isid. Dear brother, you—

Duke. And you too go.

Go, Isabella!—Nay it must be so.

Leave me to think.

Isid. Farewell!

[Exit.]

Duke. To think—of what?

Of hell and all its horrors; for this earth,

It seems, may have a hell as full of pains,

And burning torture as was ever hid

In the dark bowels of the rolling world.

Place there, 'tis said, where ill-starred souls Pine amongst flames. My flames are in the heart,

And in the head—the brain, and every nerve,

And every trembling muscle of my frame.

On this hot tongue: and my parching tongue

Clings close and closer still, and thro' my eyes

Run blood and fire, and—Ah!—O false, false, false!

Hush! some one comes. What! shall the Prince be jeered?

I'll fly unto some corner, dark as night. [Exit.]

There is a pretty passage on content in one of the subsequent scenes, part of which has been omitted in the representation.
It is the Duke speaking to Isidora,

'Sorrow has past

Over us like a storm—my heart is stilled;

And though more lonely than I thought to live,

We'll make the best of life. Poor policy

It is to shun the few bright hours that come,

'Cause more are absent from us. Let us be Happy, love, if not gay.'

Guido promises his father to leave the city and has the assurance of unlimited pecuniary resources; but, in an interview which he has with Isidora previous to his departure, in the garden, at moonlight, they are surprised by the Duke, who has been made acquainted with their intended meeting.
The Duke vows revenge, and delivers his son up to the officers in attendance.
The catastrophe now fast approaches, and we quote the concluding part of the scene descriptive of it. The officers seize us on Guido:—

Isid. (Shrieks.) Ha!—What's that?

Oh! mercy, mercy! Spare him—spare us both,

My lord—O husband!

Guido. Sweet, implore no more.

My fate is come. I'll meet it as a man.

Of thee I dare not think: but thou—

Duke. Speak on!

You shall have license,—once—but once.

Speak on.

Guido. Thou hast abused

Thy trust of father, husband, prince.—

Isid. No, no.

Guido. Thou hast, to glut a base and bitter hate,

Destroyed thine only son. Angels now look Upon us, and before their homes I swear

That I am innocent. Remember this:

For her who stands palely beside you there,

(A star amidst this darkness,) she is pure

As heaven. I speak this with a dying tongue.

I loved her—

Duke. Ha! shall this be said? Away,

Away, I say!—If once I swear— [Rises.]

Isid. One word—

Isid. One word!

Guido. Four Isidora!

Isid. One—

Guido. One word's enough. My lord, when

I depart,

To where—no matter, mark me. I shall tread

With the same step,—the same bold, faithful

step,

Which bore me on, 'midst fire and carnage,

when

I saved your life at Mantua—Now, lead on!

[Guido exit with officers.]

Duke. (Shrinks down.) He's gone!

Isid. A moment stop!—My lord! my lord!

Spare him! I'll kneel to you, and wet the dust

With tears. Oh! husband: my dear husband!

speak!

I.—Isidora—Isidora, whom

You loved so once, am here—here on my knees.

Before the world,—in the broad light. My lord:

Give him but time,—a word—do you hear that:

A word will clear him. Will you not listen?

Oh!

Cruel, oh! cruel! Mercy, yet—oh, God!

[Isidora falls before him.]

Piero. (after a pause.) Shall we not help the duchess?

Curio. Stay, stay: he begins to move.

Piero. He looks like marble with those fixed eyes.

Curio. Ha! those are heavy tears.

Officer. Hark!

Duke. Mercy!

No more of that. I am a desolate man:

Much injured! almost mad. I want—I'll have Vengeance—tremendous vengeance! Ha!

pale thing;

I will not tread upon her. Tears? what, tears?

Take her away. [Isidora is taken out.]

My heart is cold as lead.

I should have had a cloak to cover me—

A tomb, a tomb, to keep the wind out. Ha!

I love this lonely pomp. My lamps are hung

All round a mighty dome; and music, like

The noises bustling from Æolian caves,

Come round me like a charm. Oh! I have Betrayed; ay, and revenged.—All silent!

How!

Come, talk, Sirs, talk. [Isabella enters.]

Officer. Will not your highness go?

Duke. Go? where? where? Ah! the light comes. I have been Long wandering. Misery! oh, misery!

But justice shall be done; and vengeance.

[Leaves back.]

Gheraldi and Pesarò enter.

Isid. Ha!

Gher. Madam, he has escaped.

Isid. Be still, Sir. Who?

Pes. Count Casti.

Isid. Ha! go seek him, and confine him:

Do this, and you shall thrive. This is unlucky.

Gher. 'Tis death.

Isid. Not quite so bad! Guido is gone to rest.

Gher. How the duke sits!

Isid. We'll lead him in. My lord!

Duke. Ah! sister. Well; justice is done.

Casti. (without.) The duke?

Duke. What voice is that?

[Casti enters quickly.]

Casti. The duke—where is the duke?

Duke. Here; on his seat of judgment.

Casti. Seize the monk!

My lord, pray pardon me, but—O my heart!

Madam, you must not go.

Isid. Shave! dare you think

To daunt the sister of Mirandola?

Duke. What's this?

Casti. You are abused.

Duke. I know it. Wretch!

Will you bring back my terrors? Silence him.

Casti. You and your son are both abused,— betrayed.

You and your innocent wife. Look on the monk.

Your son's as fair as heaven. Mark the monk,

I say. Here, my lord, here are letters,—scrawls

Fashioned in hell, too black for such a place.

Here are the letters which you sent to Naples.

Look! these your son writ: these—your sister sent.

I took them from the monk: he bribed, and prayed,

Nay, wept and tore my cloak to get them, but

I have them here,—read! read!

Duke. Letters! my son!

Casti. He met the duchess here by my entreaty:

Against his wish he met her: nay—

Duke. Ah, sister! [reads.]

Casti. Read, Sir!

Isid. Slave! my son

Reigns in Mirandola. I am content.

Casti. Lend out the lady.

[Isabella is taken out.]

Duke. Now, where is she!—gone!

'Tis better. Ah! thou coward villain,—thou

Whom I have loved and trusted. I forgot—

Where am I? I am wandering yet.

Casti. My lord;

Where is your son?

Duke. My son? Ha! death and haste!

Fly, fly and save him! Bring him hither! Drag

That villain to a dungeon. Oh! my heart!

Fly some one! fly again, and bring my son.

Oh! mercy, mercy!

Casti. Where is he—his son?

Officer. Led out to death.

Casti. Ha! where?

Officer. In the western court.

[Casti rushes out.]

Duke. My son! where is my son? Is no one

gone

To stop my orders? Go—some more. I'll sit

Here, while the heavens are trembling.

[A distant report of musquetry is heard.]

Ha!

[Sinks down.]

[After a short pause, Casti re-enters.]

Casti. My lord!

Duke. Ha! my good messenger, a word, a word;

But one: I'll give my dukedom to you,—all.

Tell me he lives. Swear it. 'Tis my command.

Casti. Alas! it was too late. We can but pray.

Duke. Rain down your blessings upon us!

Casti. Sir, be calm.

Duke. Sulphur and blistering fire. I want to die;

Unloose me here, here: I'm too tight—Some one

Has tied my heart up; no, no; here, Sir, here.

All round my heart, and round my brain,— quick, quick—

I'm burning—Hush! a drug—

Casti. Hold him up

Duke. Some dull—some potent drink. I'll give—I'll give

The world away for peace. Oh! round my heart,

And—Ah! unloose this cord about my throat.

Has no one mercy here? I am the duke,—

The duke. Ha!—I am—nothing.

Casti. Raise his head.

Now, my dear lord—

Duke. O my poor son! my son!

Young victims—both so young—so innocent.

But they are gone. I feel as I could sleep—
Sleep—hush! for ever. My poor son! [Dies.]

Memoirs of the Life of Andrew Hofer: containing an Account of the Transactions in the Tyrol during the Year 1809. Taken from the German. By Charles Henry Hall, Esq. 8vo. pp. 198. London, 1820.

The name of Andrew Hofer is not only dear to every German, but to every one who admires undaunted courage and bold resistance of usurpation. The events in the Tyrol, in 1809, in which Hofer took so distinguished a part by rousing his fellow countrymen, who had been abandoned by their government to the French, created much interest at the time, and all Europe rung with the daring exploits which the brave leader of the Tyrolese achieved. It was with the recollection of these events, which we considered might have been imperfectly detailed at the time, that we took up the present volume with eager expectation, but never did we feel so disappointed. So far from its being a Life of Hofer, it details very few particulars respecting him, and assigns him a very subordinate part in all the events it narrates. 'This contradiction between the title and the subject of these few pages,' says the translator in his preface, 'must, in justice, be thrown on the original, as I could give no more than what my materials gave me, though I certainly was not without suspicion that, in more than one instance, the fame of Hofer had been sacrificed by the writer, to that of his more fortunate rival, Hormayr.' This suspicion receives considerable weight from the circumstance that Baron Hormayr, one of the most active Tyrolese patriots, and who was constantly at variance with Hofer, is believed to be the author of the work, or that, at least, he furnished the materials for it. The work is evidently the production of a man who wished to depreciate the merits of Hofer, as some insidious observations on his love of the bottle, and others of a similar nature, evidently show.

Of the early life of Andrew Hofer we learn nothing more than that he was born on the 22d of November, 1767, at the village of St. Leonhard, in the valley of Pusseyr, and that his father kept an inn, as his ancestors had done from time immemorial:—

'Hofer was in his forty-seventh year when the insurrection first broke out in the Tyrol; he was of Herculean make, with black eyes and brown hair; he stooped considerably, having been accustomed from his youth to carry heavy burthens over the mountains; in his ordinary walk his knees were bent, but his step, though slow, was firm,—his voice was soft and pleasing,—his countenance, though not generally animated, was expressive of great good humour, particularly when he smiled; when he prayed, his eyes were raised to heaven with the humility and resignation of a Christian.

'His education was superior to that of the generality of people in his station of life; and, from his frequent intercourse with travellers, as well as from the traffic which he carried on in wine and horses, he had acquired a competent knowledge of the Italian language, which he spoke fluently, but in the Venetian dialect; he was popular through the whole country for his integrity, his unaffected religion, his attachment to ancient customs, and his dislike of all innovation.

'He wore the dress of his country, with some trifling variation: a large black hat with a broad brim, adorned with black ribbons, and a black curling feather; a short green coat, red waistcoat, over which were green braces, a broad black girdle with a border, short black breeches with red or black stockings, and occasionally boots; he wore a small crucifix, with a large silver medal of St. George, to which were afterwards added, a large gold medal and chain sent him by the Emperor; it is not true that he ever received the cross of Maria Theresa, or obtained any rank in the Austrian army.

'But that which was most remarkable in the appearance of Hofer, was his long black beard, which reached to his girdle, and which, particularly when he rode on horseback, had an extraordinary effect. It had been an ancient custom for the innkeepers in these vallies, to allow their beards to grow; but Hofer had been principally induced to cherish his in consequence of a wager of two oxen, which he had made with some of his friends.

'In his disposition he was phlegmatic, fond of ease and tranquillity, averse from every new and rash proceeding, and only to be roused to action by his respect for the ancient customs of his native country. He was cheerful and good tempered, slow in decision, confined in his information, confused in his projects, superstitious like the rest of his countrymen, and accessible to the grossest flattery; his head, indeed, was turned by his unexpected good fortune, in being raised to a rank for which his own talents had not qualified him. He was easily urged to strong measures, the performance of which, however, was usually prevented by the natural mildness of his disposition; and when his national pride or patriotism was roused, the unaffected manner in which he expressed himself, appealed most powerfully to the feelings of his hearers. He was wholly destitute of dissimulation; and generally convinced by the last speaker, especially when he had found the way to his heart. The mention of a victory gained by Austria, or in the cause of his native country—an allusion to the old times of the Tyrol—an enthusiastic word in favour of the sacred person of the Emperor, or of the Archduke John, so dear to every Tyrolean—were appeals which had too powerful an effect on the feelings of Hofer; and he, who, according to the testimony of those who attended him, conducted himself in his last moments, "come un eroe Cristiano e martire intrepido," was for some time bathed in tears and unable to utter a word.

In personal courage, Hofer was certainly not deficient: he has sufficiently proved it by the manner in which he exposed himself for the sake of his country; but though it may appear incredible, it is a well known fact, that he never was in action but once during the whole of 1809, but was usually to be found (even during the two decisive battles near Innsbruck, on the 29th of May, and the 12th of August), carousing in a public house. He was incapable of directing a march, attack, or indeed any disposition of his troops, altho' much might naturally have been expected from the complete knowledge which he possessed of the country; and, in allusion to the superstitious weakness of his character, he has been described leading his troops with a rosary in one hand, and a bottle in the other.'

The details which follow this brief notice of Hofer, possess no other interest than that which the struggles of a brave people for their freedom must necessarily inspire. We have copies of all the proclamations that were issued in the Tyrol from the Emperor Francis down to the conceited Hormayr, but we have none of those striking facts, those romantic incidents, and those instances of noble daring which we know were frequent in the wars of the Tyrol. The name of Hofer is studiously kept in the back ground, and when it is impossible to avoid naming him, there is always some ungenerous reflection on his character or his conduct. We quote the following, as instances of the writer's impartiality in this respect. The author is speaking of an engagement with the Bavarians at Innsbruck:—

'Hormayr had, previous to this action, remained at Landeck, from whence he kept up a correspondence with Hofer; but Hofer's letters were so wild, and his intelligence so inconsistent and unconnected, that he was unable to understand his intentions; and had it not been for a message which he received from Colonel Ertel, he would have been ignorant of the affair of the 29th. Hofer, he heard, passed the principal part of his time at the alehouse; but he was particularly fond of writing and dispatching couriers, without considering the danger they ran of falling into the hands of the enemy, and of disclosing their plans and motions. The following singular letter, which is very characteristic of the man, was addressed by him to the inhabitants of the Upper Innthal:—

“Dear Brethren of the Upper Innthal.—For God, the emperor, and our dear native country. To-morrow, early in the morning, it fixed for the attack. With the help of our Holy Mother, we will seize and destroy the Bavarians, and we confide ourselves to the beloved Jesus. Come to our assistance, but if you fancy yourselves wiser than Divine Providence, we will do without you.

“ANDREW HOFER.”

The appointment of Hofer to be Commander-in-Chief is thus noticed:—

“Hofer himself shortly appeared amongst them [the Tyrolese], and declared that he was willing to accept the office of commander-in-chief, if they wished to confer it on him, but if they preferred Leiningen, he was prepared to draw his sword as simple commandant of the Passseyr Valley; but that, in whatever situation it pleased God to place him, he would sacrifice his life for the cause in which he was engaged, and that he was confident the Emperor of Austria would not desert them, but return, as soon as he was able, to their assistance. This declaration was received with shouts of approbation, and Hofer from that moment became Commander-in-Chief of the Tyrolese.

“His first care was to organize a fresh force, sufficient to defend his country, and in a short time hundreds of peasants flocked to his standard, partly from a sort of confidence they had in his powers, and partly from the hope that the discipline of his army would be less strict than that which had hitherto been so irksome to them, so that he found himself at the head of a formidable body of men, all prepared to follow him and sacrifice their lives in his service.”

This would have been very well, if the author had not accompanied the passage with the following malicious note. Speaking of Hofer, he says, ‘His vanity, on this occasion, carried him so far that he is said to have caused his initials to be stamped on a new coin.’ The author ought either to have known the truth, which he might easily have done, or not have made the assertion. The remaining notices of Hofer are very scanty, but such as they are we collect them. When summoned by the Duke of Dantzig to appear at Innspruck, he replied, ‘he would come, accompanied by 10,000 sharpshooters,’ a retinue with which the duke would, no doubt, gladly dispense. Three times Hofer delivered his country from the Bavarians, and a grand festival was held at Innspruck in honour of him. He was that day formally invested with a medal, sent to him by the Emperor, in the great Church, at the foot of the tomb of Maximilian, by the abbot of Wilna, amidst the acclamations of the people.

Tragical events now followed: the Bavarians gained ground in the Tyrol, and their successes were followed by a treaty of peace between France and Austria. Hofer could not brook the idea of becoming a subject of the French emperor, and when he was deserted by all his followers, he retired to a place of concealment in the mountains of his native valley, where he remained for some time undiscovered, in spite of the active search that was made for him, and the reward that was offered for his head.

“The sudden disappearance of Hofer, in the mean time, had given rise to innumerable contradictory rumours and conjectures. Many believed that he had followed the example of Speckbacher and his companions, and escaped over the mountains into Austria, and they expected to hear intelligence of him soon from that quarter; others were persuaded that he had actually been seen at Vienna; and some few rightly conjectured that he was concealed in the Tyrol. The place of his concealment, in which he remained from the end of Nov. to the end of the month of January following, was a solitary Alpine hut, four long leagues distant from his own house, at times inaccessible from the snow which surrounded it; a few faithful adherents supplied him from time to time with the food that was necessary for himself and his family, and more than once he was visited by confidential messengers from the Emperor of Austria, who used every entreaty to make him quit his abode and follow them to Austria, assuring him, at the same time, a safe conduct through the enemy’s army. But Hofer steadily refused all their offers, and expressed his determination never to abandon either his country or his family. He adhered tenaciously to all his old attachments and habits, and even resisted the urgent entreaties of his friends, who endeavoured to persuade him to cut off his beard, from an apprehension that it would lead to a discovery of his person. At length, the traitor Donay, once his intimate friend, allured by the flattering promises of the French, basely persuaded a man who had been entrusted with the secret, to betray him to Barraguy d’Hilliers, and Captain Renouard, of the 44th regiment, was appointed to the command of sixteen hundred men, to take him prisoner. Besides this force, which appears enormous, when we consider that it was intended merely for the capture of one unfortunate man, who, situated as he was, could not hope to defend himself, two thousand more were ordered to be in readiness to assist them, so fearful were they of some attempt being made to rescue him.

midnight, over ice and snow, and at five o’clock in the morning, of the 20th of January, Hofer and his family were made prisoners. It was dark when the French approached the hut, but as soon as he heard the officer inquire for him, he came intrepidly forward and submitted to be bound.

“He was then marched, together with his wife, his daughter, and his son, who was twelve years old, through Meran to Botzen, amidst the shouts of the French soldiery, and the tears of his countrymen. At Botzen he met with kinder treatment; Baraguay d’Hilliers gave orders that he should be removed to a more commodious prison, and that less rigour should be used against him. The French officers also did all in their power to alleviate the pain of his confinement, by such attentions as it was in their power to bestow, in return for the kindness with which he had always treated his prisoners. While at Botzen, he requested forgiveness of several persons whom he feared he had offended, but was answered only by their tears; and having parted with his family, whom he was fated never to see again, he was hurried off, under a strong escort, to Mantua.

“From his long confinement in his miserable retreat, and his coarse food, his appearance was much altered, and his hair had become more grey; but his spirit was as untamed as ever, and his countenance, in the midst of the gloom which surrounded him, preserved to the last the same expression of cheerfulness and serenity. He did not, however, expect the sentence which was passed upon him, but continued to hope that his innocence and the justice of his cause would protect him.

“On his arrival at Mantua, a court-martial was immediately holden for the purpose of trying him, of which General Bissone, then governor, was appointed president; on comparing the votes, a great difference of opinion was found to prevail as to the nature of his sentence; the majority were for confinement; two had the courage to vote for his entire deliverance; but a telegram from Milan decided the question, by decreeing death within twenty-four hours, thus putting it out of the power of Austria to render him any assistance.

“Berthier, who was then at Vienna, excited universal indignation by the hypocritical manner in which he affected to pity him; he ventured even to affirm that it would cause great pain to Napoleon, who would never have permitted such a proceeding had he been aware of it. Hofer received his sentence of death with the same unshaken firmness that had marked his character throughout, and requested that a priest might be allowed to attend him, which was immediately complied with. To this priest, (Manifesti,) who never quitted him till the moment of his death, he delivered his last adieu to his family, conversed with him of the Tyros lese war with great eagerness, and constantly expressed his confidence that the Tyrol would sooner or later return to the government of Austria.

"The fatal morning of his execution now arrived. As the clock struck eleven, the general sounded, a battalion of grenadiers was drawn out, and the officers who were to attend the execution entered his prison. As he came from thence, he passed by the barracks on the Porta Molina, in which the Tyrolese were confined; all who were there fell on their knees, put up their prayers, and wept aloud. Those who were at large in the citadel assembled on the road by which he passed, and, approaching as near as the escort permitted them, threw themselves on the ground and implored his blessing. This Hofer gave them, and then begged their forgiveness for having been the cause of their present misfortunes, assuring them at the same time that he felt confident they would once again return under the dominion of the Emperor Francis, to whom he cried out the last "vivat" with a clear and steady voice. He delivered to Manifesti, the priest, every thing he possessed, to be distributed amongst his countrymen; this consisted of 500 florins in Austrian bank notes, his silver-snuff box, and his beautiful rosary; a few moments before his death, he also delivered to this faithful attendant his small silver rosary, which he constantly carried about him.

"On the broad bastion, at a little distance from the Porta Ceresa, the commanding officer halted his men. The grenadiers formed a square open in the rear; twelve men and a corporal stepped forward, while Hofer remained standing in the centre. The drummer then offered him a white handkerchief to bind his eyes, and told him that it was necessary to kneel down, but Hofer declined the handkerchief, and peremptorily refused to kneel, observing, "that he was used to stand upright before his Creator, and in that posture he would deliver up his spirit to him." He cautioned the corporal to perform his duty well, at the same time presenting him with a piece of twenty kreutzers, and having uttered a few words by way of farewell, expressive of his unshaken attachment to his native country, he pronounced the word "Fire" with a firm voice. His death, like that of Palm, was not instantaneous, for on the first fire he sunk only on his knees; a merciful shot, however, at last dispatched him. The spot on which he fell is still considered sacred by his countrymen and companions in arms.

"His body, instead of being allowed to remain for some time on the place of execution, as was usual on such occasions, was borne by the grenadiers on a black bier to the church of St. Michael, where it lay in state, and a guard of honour appointed to watch it, that the people might see that the much dreaded Barboue (or General Sanvird, as the French used to call him) ally no more. The funeral then took place, and by the solemnity with which it was conducted, it appeared as if the French were anxious to compensate for the injury they had done him when alive, by the honours they paid to him now dead. His family were permitted to depart for Austria, and the Emperor immediately gave them a pension of 2000 florins, and a sum of money to enable them to settle; but his widow could not prevail upon herself to abandon her native country, and in spite of the offers made to her by the Court of Austria, preferred returning to her old habitation in the valley of Passeyr. His son was also handsomely provided for.

"Thus perished Hofer in the prime of life. Amidst the numerous crimes that stain the name of Napoleon, there is not one of a deeper dye than the murder of Hofer. With all his faults, all his irresolution, and contradictory conduct, when we reflect that Hofer was a simple uneducated village innkeeper, who opposed for some time with success the enormous power of France and Bavaria, with an army of undisciplined peasants, we cannot contemplate his conduct without astonishment and admiration. It is true that his name will not occupy a conspicuous place in the page of general history; but in his own country, by those who knew and could estimate his merits, as well as by those who had experienced his power or his kindness, it will never be forgotten.

"By his companions and countrymen, he was regarded as the hero, the saviour of his country. His faults were forgotten in his victories; and his name is never mentioned in the Tyrol at this day without tears of grateful affection and admiration.

"A simple tomb has been erected to his memory on the Breiner, at a short distance from his own habitation; it contains no other inscription than his name, and the dates of his birth and death. The record of his actions is left to be transmitted, as it doubtless will be, to the latest posterity, in the popular stories and rude ballads of the mountaineers, who love and revere his name as a model of disinterested loyalty and devoted attachment to his native land."

Of the conduct of the Tyrolese in the war, we have the following anecdotes:—

"The enthusiasm displayed in these districts [Bassano and Belluno] was such, that the women took an active part in the hostilities, and aided each other to hurl down stones upon the enemy's troops in the narrow defiles. A girl of eighteen, named Josephine Negretti, assumed the dress of a man, and was several times in action with the sharpshooters, carrying a rifle and using it with considerable dexterity. Among the natives of this small district, Casimir Bosio and Charles Savoi were particularly distinguished, and were appointed by Hornay to the rank of majors, as well as the brave Ottavio Bianchi, whom the Archduke John made chief of the Ty-rolese volunteers; he was taken prisoner at Belluno, in June, and was shot at Mantua, as one of the rebellious chiefs, leaving a wife and a large family of young children to lament his untimely end. Bianchi died like a hero, exclaiming in his last moments, "long live the Emperor Francis."

"Speckbacher, with his column, consisting of six hundred men, attacked the enemy at the bridge of Halle, drove them back, and destroyed it. The farm of Rainerhof was three times attacked by the Bavarians, who were each time driven back with considerable loss. During the conflict at the farm, a young woman, who resided at the house, brought out a small cask of wine to encourage and refresh the peasants, and had advanced to the scene of action, regardless of the tremendous fire of the Bavarians, with the cask upon her head, when a bullet struck it, and compelled her to let it go. Undaunted by this accident, she hastened to repair the mischief, by placing her thumb to the orifice caused by the ball, and encouraged those nearest her to refresh themselves quickly, that she might not remain in her dangerous situation, and suffer for her generosity."

In an action with the Bavarians at Brixen,—

"One extraordinary method of destruction used by the Tyrolese on this occasion, ought not to be omitted. They had, by the direction of Haspinger, felled several enormous large trees, upon which they piled large masses of rock, and heaps of rubbish; the whole being supported by strong cords, by means of which they were suspended over the edge of a precipice. During the action, the Tyrolese decoyed a body of the enemy's troops, by appearing to retreat immediately under the spot, when in an instant the ropes were cut, and the whole structure came thundering down upon the heads of the unfortunate troops beneath. Few had time to escape; the principal part of them were instantly crushed to death: a death-like stillness succeeded to the tremendous noise of the falling avalanche, which was alone interrupted by the dreadful shrieks of those who were perishing in the ruins. For a moment the firing ceased on both sides, but was soon renewed with double vigour on the part of the enemy, who at length succeeded in forcing the Tyrolese to retreat to the Laditser bridge, which was immediately blown up. The enemy had sustained too severe a loss to renew the combat, and both parties separated. Haspinger immediately retreated to Brixen, to collect provisions, and to re-assemble those peasants who had returned there during the action."

A more striking incident was published in the newspapers at the time of the war, and which the translator has given in a note. With this we conclude our extracts:—

'The following interesting account of Lefevre's expedition against the Tyrol, was communicated by a Saxon officer, who was himself a witness of what he describes. "We had penetrated to Innspruck," he says, "without great resistance, and although much was reported about the Tyrolese stationed upon and round the Brenner, we gave little credit to it, thinking the rebels to have been dispersed by a short cannonade, and already considering ourselves as conquerors. Our entrance into the passes of the Brenner was only opposed by small corps, which continued to fall back after an obstinate though short resistance; among others I perceived a man, full eighty years of age, posted against the side of a rock, and sending death among our ranks at every shot; upon the Bavarians descending from behind to make him prisoner, he shouted a loud hurrah, struck the first man to the ground with a ball, seized the second, and with the ejaculation, 'In God's name!' precipitated himself with him into the abyss below. Marching onwards, we heard from the summit of a high rock, 'Stephen, shall I chop it off yet?' to which a loud 'nay' reverberated from the opposite side. This was told to the Duke of Dantzig, who, notwithstanding, ordered us to advance. The van, consisting of four thousand Bavarians, had just stormed a deep ravine, when we again heard over our heads, 'Hans! for the most Holy Trinity!' Our terror was completed by the reply that immediately followed: 'In the name of the Holy Trinity cut all loose above!' and ere a minute had elapsed, thousands of my comrades in arms were crushed, buried, and overwhelmed by an incredible heap of broken rock, stones, and trees, hurled down upon us.'

With the translator we ought not, perhaps, to quarrel, since he acknowledges the scantiness of the materials, and apologises for his paraphrastic version, on the ground, that 'the style of the German author is so perplexed and intricate, so loaded with metaphor and poetical imagery, and in many places so very harsh and obscure, that a literal translation would be perfectly unintelligible.' We must, however, say, that we do not think the work was worth translating, and that a history of the Tyrolese war, in 1809, as well as a life of Hofer, still remain desiderata.

Orient Harping; a Desultory Poem. In two Parts. By John Lawson, Missionary at Calcutta. pp. 227. London, 1820.

Mr. Lawson's piety is stronger and more harmonious than his poetry; it gentle, and ascends with unrenitting ardour to the source of light and love: but, if there is a deficiency of elevation of soul, and a degenerate feeling in the writings of some of our modern bards, they have the decided advantage of the author of 'Orient Harping,' in the earthly attributes of poetry. 'Of all bad poems,' said Dr. Johnson, 'a poem in blank verse is the worst,' because there are no bounds to the extent of the poet's imagination. And Mr. Lawson's poetical fame will not be enhanced by this his last production. His 'Maniac,' written in the stile of Mr. Montgomery's 'Wanderer of Switzerland,' with miscellaneous pieces, was favourably reviewed, and perhaps deservedly received by the public; they were published for the benefit of an orphan, but, like the benefits of many theatrical performers, when expenses necessarily incurred, and incidentals are properly discharged, he derived but little advantage from the publication. 'Orient Harping' is, as its title expresses, 'a desultory poem in blank verse;' it gives many accurate descriptions of the characteristics of the Hindoos, and, with the advantage of eastern scenery, produces occasional passages of chaste and energetic writing; but, on the other hand, we are sorry to say, the same poem also produces much prose and eking out of syllabic measures and rough reading; there is not sufficient rhythm and elegance to give effect to the purity of thought which ever elevates its subject, and which, if aptly illustrated, would, like angels' golden wings, bear its reader to those regions of which it writes and so fervently recommends.

Of the author's skill in 'harping,' these chords, which introduce him to his celestial music, will convey a fair criterion:—

'The orient panorama glowing grand,
Strange to the eyes of poetry; the depths
Of jungle shade; the wild immensity
Of forests rank with plenteity, where trees
Foreign to song display their mighty forms
And clothe themselves with all the pomp of blossoms;
The fervid heavens; the hot consuming wind;
The fierce delirium of north-western storms
Black with vehemence; the vicissitude
Of shape and hue afloat upon the sky,
When the full clouds are tossed upon the gale,
The village thronged with sable peasantry;
The temple, dark abode of numerous gods
Of all complexions, in chromatic glory;—
Of various structure, tall or short, and round,
Brittle, but comely to the admiring eye;
Or tough or servicable, made to last
As gods should last,
The muse discursive sings.'

muse proceeds to sing; and by the few concluding lines being prosaic, much chromatic glory is necessarily lost. This will be but too applicable to the tone of the whole poem. But why will Mr. Lawson hang his harp on the willow to sing blank verse into prose?

The Percy Anecdotes. Part XIV. Anecdotes of the Fine Arts. 18mo. pp. 180. London, 1821.

We have so frequently called the attention of our readers to this neat little work, that any further expression of our opinion, as to its general merits, is quite unnecessary. The grand object in works of this nature, that of blending amusement with instruction, appears to us to have been happily attained; and, in those volumes which were illustrative of some peculiar virtue, the anecdotes were such as to increase a love of it, and to enforce, by a series of examples, the best of precepts. The present part, like that of Science, ranks somewhat higher, and furnishes a concise, but general and correct history of the subject. The Fine Arts particularly noticed are those of Sculpture, Painting, and Engraving; and their progress is regularly traced from the earliest period to the present time, in a succession of the most striking anecdotes of those individuals who have most distinguished themselves and contributed most to the advancement of the Arts. In the course of some hundreds of anecdotes, which this work contains, there will, necessarily, be many with which the amateur and the general reader will be acquainted; but even these appear to be sparingly and judiciously selected, while the number of rare anecdotes, and those of modern artists, is very considerable. Without extending our remarks, we select the following:—

The Slave of Velasquez.—'A slave of the name of Juan de Paresa, a Mulatto, was employed by the Spanish painter, Velasquez de Sylva, in mixing his colours and feeding his pallet; from painting the arrows of Apollo, he became ambitious of trying his strength at the bow. The disqualification of his condition nevertheless was such, that to touch the most liberal arts with the hand of a slave, was dangerous in the extreme. The casts in India do not stand at a greater distance from each other, than degrees of men did in Spain; and Velasquez was, of all masters, the least likely to brook a violation so presumptuous as that which Paresa mediated. Hung round with chains of gold and courtly orders, of haughty preten-your and familiarity with his sovereign, Velasquez would have treated the insolence of the slave, as Jupiter did that of Salmoeneus, by extinguishing his existence. Notwithstanding this, the temptation was for ever present, and the impulses of genius in the end became irresistible. In the stolen moments of his master's siesta, or when court avocations called him from home, Pareza seized the clandestine opportunities, and by force of talents, arrived in time an accomplished artist. Ambition now inspired him with higher projects; and, as the liberality of Philip held out a general asylum to merit, he determined upon a method of introducing his performance to the eye of the King. He observed it was his Majesty's practice in Velasquez's chamber, to order the pictures that stood within their faces to the wall, to be turned, that he might see them; this suggested to him the thought of substituting one of his own productions, and taking his chance for what should follow. The experiment happily succeeded. The King coming into the academy, ordered the canvas to be turned. Pareza eagerly obeyed, and presented to the royal view, a piece composed by the audacious pencil of a slave and a Mulatto, but such an one, in point of excellence, as would have done honour to a freer and a fairer artist. It was not easy to appeal to better judgment than that of the King, or to enter upon his trial at a more merciful tribunal. Pareza fell upon his knees, and avowing the guilt of the performance, implored protection against the resentment of his master for having secretly purloined his art. "Velasquez," said the King, "you must not only overlook this transgression in Pareza, but observe that such talents should emancipate the possessor." The generous decree was obeyed by Velasquez, and Pareza had his freedom. The grateful freedman continued his voluntary services during the life of Velasquez; and, after his death, to his daughter, who married Don Juan Baptista del Mazo, until his own death, which was in 1670, at the age of sixty years.

Blunders.—Tintoret, in a picture which represents the Israelites gathering manna in the desert, has armed the Hebrews with guns; and a modern Neapolitan artist has represented the Holy Family, during their journey to Egypt, as passing the Nile in a barge as richly ornamented as that of Cleopatra.

Breughel, a Dutch painter, in a picture of the Eastern Magi, has, according to the grotesque fashion of his country, drawn the Indian king in a large white surplice, with boots and spurs, and bearing in his hand, as a present to the holy child, the model of a Dutch seventy-four!

Lanfrac has thrown churchmen in their robes at the feet of our Saviour, when an infant; and Algarotti relates, that Paul Veronese introduced several Benedictines among the guests at the feast of Cana.

painted by Chella delle Puera, representing the Annunciation, is a curious collection of absurdities. The Virgin is seated in a rich arm-chair of crimson velvet, with gold flowers; a cat and parrot placed near her, seem extremely attentive to the whole scene; and on the table are a silver coffee-pot and cup.

A modern Italian has painted the same subject in a similar way. The Virgin is on her knees near the toilette; on a chair are thrown a variety of fashionable dresses, which show that, in the painter's opinion at least, she must have been a practised coquette; and at a little distance appears a cat, with its head lifted up towards the angel, and its ears on end to catch what he has got to say.

Paulo Mazzochi painted a piece representing the four elements, in which fishes marked the sea, moles the earth, and a salamander the fire. He wished to have represented the air by a camelion; but not knowing how to draw that scarce animal, he contented himself, from a similarity of sounds, to introduce a camel, who extending his long neck, snuffs up the breezes around him.

But of all the blunders which artists have committed, none is perhaps so great as the painter who, in a picture of the Crucifixion, represented the confessor holding out a crucifix to the good thief who was crucified with our Saviour.

Anachronisms of this description have been so often noticed, that they are now scarcely worth collecting; but there are others of a rarer sort, which owe their existence to the barbarous transformations which pictures, originally correct, have undergone, to please the passions and prejudices of a day; and which it is well to treasure up, as marks of the impotence of power, when it would torture genius into a violation of sincerity and truth.

In the chapel of one of the principal colleges in Paris, there was a picture representing the general in chief of the army of Egypt, attended by some of his aides-de-camp, paying a visit to the plague hospital. Since the restoration of the Bourbon family to the throne of France, Bonaparte has been converted into Christ, and his aides-de-camps into apostles. The artist who has made these alterations, has not, however, thought it necessary entirely to change the costume, and our Saviour appears in the boots of Napoleon.

An instance of similar absurdity occurred at Naples, where, to preserve Gros's magnificent picture of the Battle of Aboukir, a Neapolitan general who never set foot in Egypt, has been substituted for Murat.

Patriotism.—When Nancy was taken from the Duke of Lorraine, by Cardinal Richelieu, he wished Jacques Callot, who was one of the duke's subjects, to make a set of prints descriptive of the siege of that important place. The artist refused; and trily that he should do it, he replied, "My lord, if you continue to urge me, I will cut off the thumb of my right hand before your face; for I will never consent to perpetuate the calamity and disgrace of my sovereign and protector."

Spagnuolo.—The Spanish painter Ribera, known by the name of Spagnuolo, was of very humble parentage; but suffering the extreme of poverty, he felt within himself such powers of genius, as were superior to depression. After being some time with Ribalta, he went to Rome, and enlisting himself in the academy, pursued his studies with an industry which knew no remission; even whilst he was in the pursuit of the scanty necessities of life, which he obtained by the sale of drawings and sketches in the academy. Without friends, and, at times, almost without food or raiment, he persisted in his course with a stubborn virtuous perseverance, which nothing could divert from its object. One day, a cardinal passing in his coach, observed a tattered figure employed in painting a board affixed to the outside of one of the ordinary houses in the streets of Rome; the youth and wretchedness of the spectacle excited pity, and the singular attention with which he pursued his work, attracted his attention. It was Ribera, in the act of earning his bread, of which his appearance showed he was absolutely in want. The cardinal called him to his coach, and ordering him to his palace, immediately domiciliated the lucky youth. Here he lived in ease and affluence; but that virtue which the frowns of fortune could not shake, was not proof against her caresses. Young Ribera became a slave to pleasures of which he had not before even speculative enjoyment. At length, the ruin which his genius was menaced with, alarmed his pride. With one gallant effort he burst the shackles of temptation, and sallied out of the palace of the cardinal, re-assumed his dignity of soul and poverty at once.

He had now all his former miseries to encounter, with the aggravated contrast of experienced delights. The slender encouragement he met with at Rome, determined him to go to Naples. He set out in a ragged jacket, having pledged his cloak to make provision for the journey. In Naples, he engaged himself to a common painter for hire. This man, however, had some science and much humanity; the abilities of Ribera surprised him; he clearly saw how superior his talents were to the low occupation in which he was engaged. He employed him on better subjects; and a further acquaintance opening to him his good qualities, he gave him his only daughter in marriage.

It was now that Ribera's genius was enabled to display itself. A new choice of subjects now presented themselves to the world; and people saw, with a terror partaking of delight, martyrdoms, execu-truth and fidelity hitherto unknown. He selected all that sacred or classic history afforded in the terrible, for "horrors were not displeasing to him." All that the Pagan theology, or the poetical hell, had represented to appal the guilty, was to be found on the canvas of Ribera. A martyred St. Bartholomew, stripped to the muscles, became a study for anatomists. Cato of Utica, in the act of tearing out his bowels, brought the horror of self-murder to the eyes and hearts of men. Hercules, struggling in the throes of death, and all the tortured in the fabulous realm of Pluto, were now exhibited like Eschylus's furies on the stage of Athens, and, in some instances, with the same effects. His pictures were now eagerly sought after, and adorned the best collections in Europe.

Tribute to the Arts.—In the Life of Philippe Lippi, the Florentine painter, we have a memorable proof how much it is in the power of painting to charm even the most barbarous minds, and to soften hearts the most hardened. Lippi and some friends happened one day to be making an excursion in a small boat along the sea coast, when they were surprised by a Moorish brigantine, and taken prisoners into Barbary. After they had been eighteen months in a state of the most cruel slavery, Lippi, one day, took a piece of coal, and drew, on a wall, a portrait of the master he served. The likeness was so strong, that it struck the Barbarian, who had never seen any thing of the kind before, with astonishment and delight. He requested Philippe to draw some other portraits for him; and was, in the end, so pleased, that he not only gave him his liberty, but procured him a safe conveyance to Naples.

All for Love.—Quintin Mesius, or Matis, was a farrier at Antwerp; when in his twentieth year, he became enamoured of a young woman of his own condition in life, who was, at the same time, sought in marriage by a painter of some repute. The damsel confessed to Quintin, that she had a greater inclination for him than for the painter, but that she had an unconquerable aversion to his trade of a farrier. Quintin, who, from his childhood, had evinced a strong taste for designing, instantly resolved to be on equal terms with his rival, and to abandon the hammer for the brush. He applied to his new art with so much liking and assiduity, that in a short time he produced pictures which gave a promise of the highest excellence. He gained, for his reward, the fair hand for which he sighed; and continuing after his marriage, to exercise the art in which he had made so noble an essay, he rose, ere long, to a high rank in his profession.

Among other productions of Quintin's pencil, were the portraits in one piece of the two friends Erasmus and Egidius, which afterwards formed part of the collection of Charles I. of England. Sir wrote on this painting, apostrophized the artist in terms which shew the high estimation in which he was held, both by his countrymen and foreigners:—

"Quintine, O veteris Novator artis
Magna non minor artifex Appelle!
Mire composito potens colore, &c."

Quintin died in 1540. A hundred years afterwards, a monument was erected to his memory in the cathedral church of Notre Dame, at Antwerp, the inscription on which records in a few expressive words the singular story of his life:—

"Connubialis amor de muliere fecit Apulem."

Skillful Fraud.—It is related of Cross, an English painter, who was remarkable for his talent in copying correctly, that, being employed by King Charles the First to copy some of the works of the best masters of Italy, and being permitted by the State of Venice to copy a famous Madonna of Raffael, in the church of St. Mark, he executed his commission so lappily, that he brought away the original, and left the copy in its stead. The deception was not immediately discovered, and the detection was made too late to regain it; for, although several messengers pursued him expeditiously, they were all disappointed.

Genius Rescued.—Brooking, who died in 1759, was the most eminent painter of sea pieces, since the time of Van de Velde; but his merits were scarcely known until after his death. He used to paint for a picture-dealer near the Mews, who exposed his productions in his window. A gentleman, who sometimes passed the shop, being struck with the merits of some sea pieces by this artist, desired to know his name; but he was not satisfied in this respect, and only told, that if he pleased he could procure any thing that he might wish from the same painter.

Brooking was accustomed to write his name on his pictures, which mark was constantly obliterated by the shopkeeper before he placed them in the window; it, however, happened that the artist carried home a piece while the master was from home; it was placed in the window by his wife, and the gentleman passing soon after, discovered the name of the painter whose works he had so much admired. He immediately advertised for the artist. To this advertisement, Brooking, at first, paid no attention; but seeing it repeated, with assurances of benefit to the person to whom it was addressed, he prudently attended, and had an interview with the gentleman, who, from that time, became his friend and patron; but, unfortunately, the artist did not live long to receive the advantage of his patronage.

The Sorceress.—It is related of Mademoiselle Rozee, one of the most extraordinary painters that ever lived, that she used neither oil nor water-colours in her astonishing performances, and only worked on the rough side of the panel with a expressible care, and disposed in different boxes, according to different degrees of the bright and dark tints, out of which she applied whatever colour was requisite for her work. She blended, softened, and united the tints with such inconceivable art and judgment, that she imitated the warmth of flesh with as great a glow of life as could be produced by the most exquisite pencil in oil; nor could the nicest eye discern, at a proper distance, whether the whole was not the work of the pencil. Houbraken says, he cannot tell how she managed her work, nor with what instruments. But, by whatever art her pictures were executed, they were truly beautiful, and like nature. Her portraits have as striking a likeness as possible; and every object was a just imitation of her model, whether the subject was portrait, architecture, landscape, or flowers; and, as her manner of working could not be well accounted for, she was distinguished by the name of the Sorceress, as if her work had been the effect of magic.

One landscape painted by Mademoiselle Rozee, was sold for five hundred florins; the subject of the picture was only the trunk of an old tree covered with moss, and a large spider finishing its web among the leaves and branches; but every part appeared with so great a degree of force, so relieved, so true, and so natural, that it was always belied with astonishment.

A Painter's last hours.—When Lucas of Leyden, during the last six years of his life, lay pining under the pressure of disease, his industry and love of his art were eminently conspicuous. It having been represented to him that such close attention increased the malignity of his disorder, he calmly replied: "I am content it should be so, since by my studies I endeavour to make my bed of sickness a bed of honour. An artist can never die in a more suitable manner than with his pencil in his hand." The "Goddess Pallas" was the last plate which he engraved; and it was on requesting to see it a short time before he died, that he is said to have used these memorable words.

The invention of oil painting has generally been attributed to Van Eyck, who flourished in the fifteenth century; it is, however, believed that he only revived the art; the brothers Percy mention an oil painting of a Madonna and child, which has the date 996. This picture is said to have formed part of the treasures of the old palace of the Florentine Republic. We do not know on what authority this anecdote is related, and should have been happy to have had more information on a subject so curious and interesting.

LITERARY PREMIUM.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—It will no doubt be in your recollection, and perhaps in that of many of your readers, that, about two years ago, the proprietor of the New Monthly Magazine very pompously announced the offer of a premium of one hundred guineas, for the best essay 'on English literature during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.' Your cotemporary declared at the time, that from what he knew of the party offering this prize, he could take upon himself 'to invite the attention of aspiring writers to it, as an honourable object for competition, which would be bona fide and justly awarded.'

Now, as it is very improbable that in a country and in an age when literature is so much cultivated, there should not have been numerous candidates, (if the offer of the proprietor was deemed sincere,) I wish to know, through the medium of the Literary Chronicle, to whom the prize was awarded, or if it was ever given to any one.

If you, Mr. Editor, or any of your readers, can give me this information, you will much oblige*.

Your's, &c. R. B. S.

INAUGURAL SPEECH OF

SIR HUMPHREY DAVY, BART.

ON HIS TAKING THE CHAIR AT THE ROYAL SOCIETY.

AFTER expressing to the members his deep sense of the honour they had done him in placing him in their chair, Sir Humphrey entered into some general views of the present state of the Royal Society, its relations to other scientific bodies, and on the prospects and hopes of science. In the early periods of the history of the Society, experiments were made with the apparatus belonging to the body of their curators and operators, under the eyes of the Society; but since the progress of the useful arts had rendered it easy for individuals, attached to scientific pursuits, to procure chemical and mechanical

* We confess our inability to answer the inquiries of our correspondent, and should have referred him to the proprietor to whom he alludes, but that we wish to give him the chance of gaining the information from our readers.—

tical apparatus, the Fellows, in general, had worked in their own laboratories. 'There may, however,' said the President, 'occur instances in which instruments upon a great scale may be required; or very expensive experiments; and, in such cases, it is to be hoped the proposers will recur to the Society: for, by the commands of our august patron, government has never been tardy in affording us assistance, when our objects have been of national importance; and, on inferior occasions, the object might be effected by a division of expense amongst the members.'

In speaking of the relations of the Royal Society to other scientific bodies, the President expressed a hope that they would naturally assist each other. He disclaimed any thing like patriarchal authority on the part of the Royal Society: but considered it as entitled to respect and affection 'as an elder brother of the same family, acting for objects which ought to be a bond of harmony and of peace, not merely amongst the philosophers of the same country, but even amongst those of distant nations.'

The President took an extensive view of the different departments of science which seemed to offer promising subjects of new investigation. In the mathematical sciences he pointed at the application of the doctrines of quantity, weight, and number; to the elementary philosophy of chemistry; and to many other parts of general physics.

In astronomy, he referred to the system of the fixed stars, the motions of the comets, and of the bodies which, in passing through our atmosphere, throw down showers of stones; for it cannot be doubted (he said) that these extraordinary phenomena do not depend upon fortuitous or accidental formations in the atmosphere; but are owing to heavy bodies which, in a system where all appears harmonious, must be governed by fixed laws, and intended for definite purposes.

In Optics, he mentioned the discoveries of Wollaston and Young, which, followed by those of Malus, Arago, Biot, and Brewster, have opened a curious connexion between the crystalline forms of bodies and their relations to the particles of light.

In Electricity, the learned President alluded to the wonderful instrument of Volta, which, he said, had done more for the recondite chemo-physical sciences than the telescope for astronomy, or the microscope for natural history.

the discoveries of Ersted, which promised to connect so intimately magnetism and electricity, and to solve the grand problem of the magnetic phenomena of the earth.

In speaking of the figure of the earth, the President took notice of Capt. Kater's experiments with the pendulum, and expressed a hope that his ingenious contrivance would be applied to determine the physical constitution of the surface. On this point he said, that he hoped there might be a co-operation with the members of the French Royal Academy of Sciences in completing the measurement of 20 degrees of an arc of the meridian; on which these able philosophers had laboured with so much zeal and address. He referred, in this part of his discourse, to the expedition to the polar regions, which he designated as equally honourable to those by whom the expedition was planned, and to the brave and enterprising navigators by whom it was executed. Such expeditions (said the President) are worthy the great maritime nation of the world, as applying her resources, not for empire alone, but for the advancement of science and benefits common to all countries,—thus creating a purer species of glory than that dependent upon power or conquest.

In speaking of Chemistry, he mentioned various interesting objects of research, and congratulated the Society on the progress made in the theory of definite proportions since it was first brought forward in a definite form by Mr. Dalton.

In alluding to Vegetable and Animal Physiology, he described the imperfect state of these sciences, and said that the Society had a right to expect elucidation of them from those disciples of the schools of Grew and of Hunter, who had already done so much for the Anatomy of Plants and for Comparative Anatomy.

It would be impossible to follow the learned President through every part of his profound views on the improvement of science, as we could not do them justice; but we earnestly hope that he will himself be induced to lay them before the public in some lasting record. He concluded by recommending to the Fellows the sure path of investigation, and the same methods of reasoning that constituted the glory of the founders of the Royal Society—cautious inductions from exact experiments. He expressed his ardent desire to assist in every way the progress of science, and stated that through their good opinion had elected him to a high dignity, corresponding to that of a general, yet that he should always be happy to act with them as a private in the ranks of science.

Let us (said the President) labour together, animated by the noblest kind of emulation; let us prove that we are not unworthy of the name we bear, and of the times in which we live; and let us endeavour to transmit the glory of the Royal Society to posterity, not impaired, but exalted.

ON THE

SERVICES RENDERED TO AGRICULTURE BY WOMEN.

[FROM THE FRENCH OF M. DE CUBIERES.]

MAN (says M. de Cubieres) has not alone contributed to the perfection of agriculture; in this he has been assisted by that partner, which the Eternal, in the height of his beneficence, has given him, to share his labours, to alleviate his pains, and to embellish his life.

And, indeed, by opening the annals of the world, and by reverting to the most distant periods of time, we shall perceive, through the glimmering light which succeeds the darkness of unknown centuries, that woman, so well designated by Madame Bourdie, in her epistle to the men, as 'the flower of the human species,' has had, in all ages, a direct share in the progress of agriculture.

By raising up the veil, which fiction and heathenism have placed between us and truth, we shall see, in a very remote back-ground, history pointing to Isis, and saying, 'she was queen of Egypt.'

While Osiris was dictating laws to the Egyptians, Isis, his wife, was giving them those precepts of agriculture, which rendered his dominions the richest in the universe. Isis had chosen the ox as her type, on account of its great usefulness in agriculture; from hence the Egyptians fancied, that the soul of that princess had, after her death, animated the ox; and, impelled by this idea, they exalted that useful animal to the rank of a deity.

There are still extant, several statues of Isis, which represent her with the body of a woman, and the head of an ox; and we know of several monuments, on which their numerous inscriptions witness, what an idea those people who had adopted the worship of Isis, entertained of their deity.

If we continue in our attempts to dispel the clouds which fable and superstition have raised around truth, we shall find in Sicily, a queen who conferred the greatest benefits on mankind, by giving them lessons of agriculture, by making them acquainted with the use of corn, and with the mode of cultivating it. That queen is Ceres, whom the ancients, by an allegory equally just and ingenious, have represented as mother of Plutus; meaning, unquestionably, that agriculture is the source of all riches.

The Greeks, who personified all received favours, as they deified all virtues, wishing to perpetuate their gratitude to the queen of Sicily, made her the goddess of agriculture and harvest.

These facts, purified from the dross of fable and mythology, prove that the two best cultivated countries, whose fruitfulness was envied by all others, were indebted to women for their fertility.

How many more instances could I here adduce! I might name Minerva, queen of Athens, who brought her subjects acquainted with the olive-tree, and the use of its fruit; and who made them cultivate the land, instead of following piracy, which she suppressed.

The honours of apotheosis, conferred on Flora, on Pomona, on Pales, Perenna, Bubona, Mellona, Vellona, &c. afford just ground to believe, that all these women rendered services to agriculture.

In Sparta, while the men were fighting for their country, the women were cultivating the soil.

In the Isle-Dyœux, or Isle-Dieu; belonging to the department of La Vendée, the men are exclusively employed in navigation, fisheries, &c. and the women, from time out of mind, have taken upon themselves all the agricultural labours of the island.

Among almost all savage nations, the men have enjoyed the pleasures of hunting, while the women were performing all the business of agriculture.

In the first centuries of the Roman republic, the care of the kitchen-garden was intrusted to the mother of the family.

It is to an empress of China that we are indebted for the culture of the mulberry-tree, and the rearing of silk-worms.

Isabella, sister to Charles V., married to the unfortunate Christian, king of Denmark, made the Danes adopt the use of vegetables; and taught them that mode of culture by her own example.

Marie Sybille de Merian braved all the dangers of a long and disagreeable voyage, to study botany in Surinam; from whence she brought a figured herbal, forming a large quarto volume.

Mlle. Linnæus, daughter to the celebrated professor of the Upsal University, assisted her father in his immortal work.

The charming Hydrangea, so well known under the name of Hortesia, is a new tribute paid by Commerson to the talents and memory of Mlle. Hortense de Pante.

Elizabeth Blackwall has published a work on botany, in six volumes folio, with figured plants, which is held in great estimation by the learned.

Mlle. Victorine de Chateaufort has published a work in three volumes, entitled le Calendrier de Flore, (Flora's Calendar,) and in which are united correctness as to facts, with that peculiar grace of epistolary style which is so peculiar to her sex.

Madame de Genlis, whose name is above all praise, has written, with her usual eloquence, several articles on botany.

The charming garden at Kew, one of the first, one of the handsomest, and one of the most luxuriant of those landscape gardens which the English have imitated from the Chinese, was created by a Princess of Wales; and this kind of gardens, improperly called 'the English garden,' has been so much approved of in France by women, that, at their solicitation, we have adopted them.

To this we shall add M. de Cubieres' picture of a French farmer's wife; not as it really exists, but as his imagination has depicted her.

'The farmer's wife,' (fermiere) says M. de Cubieres, 'bestows her attention and her daily cares on whatever is connected with the administration of the farm. She inspects the dovecote, the farm-yard, the stalls, the dairy, the orchard, &c. She sells the vegetables, the fruit, the produce of the dairy; ewes and their fleeces; to her is intrusted the gathering of hemp and flax, with the first operations these plants undergo; in the southern countries, she has also under her management the important business of rearing silk worms, and the sale of their produce.'

'She knows how to excite workmen to their labour; to the lazy, she gives a new life, by friendly remonstrances, and, at the same time, she supports by her praises the zeal of the most laborious.'

'She knows how to inspire awe, by a studied silence, and to insure obedience by the mildness of command; she renders all her labourers faithful, by bestowing on them a due share of her confidence.

'It is she who presides daily at the preparation of their food; in their sickness she attends them with maternal care; on the days of rest she excites them to rural sports.

'In short, surrounded by her labourers, by her husband, by her children, who form her principal riches, she enjoys that felicity which springs from benevolence; she is happy in the happiness she confers on others; and that large family, free from fear, from cupidity, from ambition, leads a happy and peaceful life.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

The English language is a curious compound. It is an olio of Greek and Latin, of Saxon, French, and Dutch ingredients. With this admixture it would be impossible to reduce etymology to any regular system; yet it may be remarked generally, that our scientific terms are from the Greek; our terms of art are from the French, Latin, and Italian; whilst most of our domestic words, words expressive of objects, which daily attract our attention, are from the Saxon. Our derivatives are of course deduced from primitives; while our primitives are derived from other languages, much after the rate of the following scale of obligation. Mathematical accuracy, in a case of this sort, is not to be fairly expected, particularly as etymologists are so frequently at war with each other. It, however, ought to be observed, that the obligations here stated are very far from being over-charged:—

Latin	6621	German	117
French	4361	Welsh	111
Saxon	3060	Spanish	83
Greek	1288	Danish	81
Dutch	660	Arabic	18
Italian	229

With several words from the Teutonic, Gothic, Hebrew, Swedish, Portuguese, Flemish, Russian, Egyptian, Persian, Cimbric, and Chinese.

Nothing is more singular in the history of English etymology, than the circumstance of our having borrowed so little from the Welsh, which may be esteemed the most uncorrupted of all the fourteen vernacular languages of Europe, and for which reason it is the worst, being exceedingly harsh and guttural, and if we may judge from the dictionary of a very limited range, this language had four dialects: the Cornish, the American, the Northern, and the Southern. The Cornish is extinct; but the American may still be traced in Brittany.

DISCOVERIES IN AFRICA.

'If Africa is to be discovered, it must be by missionaries.' WILBERFORCE.

IN 1812, the Rev. John Campbell, as the agent of the London Missionary Society, visited South Africa, and on that occasion he penetrated as far as Lattaakoo, a very large town, about nine hundred miles north of the cape, inhabited by savages of the Bootchuana tribes, (who, since that visit of Mr. Campbell, have removed and formed a new settlement, called New Lattaakoo.) The journal of that enterprising tour has long been before the public.

In 1818, Mr. Campbell consented to visit south Africa a second time, and the following statement has just been received of the successful discoveries of what was to us terra incognita.

On Mr. Campbell's arrival at Lattaakoo, in 1819, he found circumstances uncommonly favourable to the further extension of his journey into the interior. The missionaries had been recently visited by Bootchuans from different tribes beyond them, who had expressed a wish to have missionaries among them, and a powerful chief of one of the tribes was at this time at Lattaakoo, and had offered his services to assist our traveller in accomplishing the object of his wishes. Accompanied by Munameets, the King of Lattaakoo's uncle, and the King, whose name is not mentioned, and a suitable escort, Mr. Campbell left Lattaakoo on the 11th of April, 1820, in his bullock wagon.

Visit to Old Lattaakoo.—After travelling about forty miles in a northerly direction, they came to Old Lattaakoo. On the removal of Matteebe to New Lattaakoo, the place was taken possession of by people of different tribes, and Mr. Campbell supposes it to contain eight thousand inhabitants. It is governed by a chief of the name of Mahoomer Peeloo. At a public meeting of the principal men of the place, there was not only a willingness expressed to receive and protect missionaries, but even a desire to have them.

A Town called Meribolwhely.—From thence Mr. Campbell proceeded in a north-easterly direction, and after travelling a week, (about one hundred and twenty miles,) come to Meribolwhely, the principal town of the Tammaha tribe, sometimes called, 'Red Caffres,' and who are represented as a savage, warlike people. Mr. C. observed that their appearance corresponded with this report; but he experienced kind treatment from them; and after the chiefs had held a consultation, they consented to receive missionaries, and promised them their protection.

A large Town named Mashew.—He next visited Mashew, a town about twenty miles further, which was estimated to contain from twelve to fifteen thousand inhabitants. Much land was seen under cultivation. Here Mr. C. had some conversation with an intelligent old woman, who said she came from a country to the eastward, bordering on the Great Water, where people live, who, she said, had long hair. At Mashew the people expressed an equal willingness to receive missionaries.

Discovery of Kurreechane, a large Town.—From this town Mr. Campbell travelled a week, (about one hundred and twenty miles,) further to the north-eastward, and came to Kurreechane, the principal town of the Marootze tribe, containing about sixteen thousand inhabitants. Here Mr. C. found a people arrived to a degree of civilization, and possessing a knowledge of arts superior to any one of the tribes he had seen. They smelt iron and copper from the ore. The metals are procured from mountains in the neighbourhood. When Col. Collins was in Caffree Land, and among the Tambookes, in 1819, the articles of iron and copper which he found among the savages, he supposed to have been furnished by the Portuguese, at De La Goa Bay.

From the description Mr. C. has given of the Kurreechane, the colour appears to have been mistaken in this opinion. The manufactures of Kurreechane are found to have diffused themselves from the borders of the colony of the Cape of Good Hope to the shores of Mozambique, and from De La Goa Bay to the wandering tribes on the opposite coast. The needles, bodkins, and other articles of a similar nature manufactured at Kurreechane, and found in abundance in the neighbourhood of Augra Pequena Bay, strengthens the supposition that the Portuguese have for many years carried on an inland correspondence between their settlements and the eastern and western shores of Africa.

The desire of keeping any thing in trade secret, indicates considerable elevation above savage life. Mr. C. saw many foundries in Kurrerechane; but he regrets that they were guarded with so much jealousy that he was not allowed to enter them.

Kurrerechane appears to be the Staffordshire as well as the Birmingham of that part of South Africa. They manufacture pottery, and in the shape and painting of their articles shew a superior degree of taste. They appear to excel in the making of baskets; and Mr. C. found the walls of their houses ornamented with paintings of elephants, camel leopards, shields, &c. On the third day after arrival, Mr. C. found himself in a critical situation, and began to suspect a snare. He was told that the king was advised to take him and his party on a commando against a nation with whom he was at war. As we are not told by what means our brother escaped from this awkward predicament, we may suppose that he might have been deceived in his estimate of the comers on which this alarm was created. On Mr. C.'s proposing to send missionaries to reside in Kurrerechane, they called a Pietso, or meeting of the principal men. About three hundred assembled in a public place, all armed with spears, battle axes, shields, &c. and an exhibition of savage oratory ensued, where noise, gesture, and fluency of speech were not wanting to make it strikingly expressive. Messengers sat beside Mr. C. to explain the proceedings. In the course of the discussions, a lively old chief rose up and spoke, pointing his spear in a northerly direction, which immediately produced a general whistling, meaning 'Bravo, Bravo!'—The interpreter informed Mr. C., that the speech was intended to stir up the people to go to war with a nation beyond them, some of whose people had, a short time before, carried off several of their cattle. In his own way Mr. C. remarks 'between you and me, I have heard noises more agreeable to my ear than this whistling was.' After much had been said respecting the war, some of the people began to speak of white men as offering themselves; and the Assembly, at last, resolved that missionaries should be received and protected. The king then presented Mr. C. with two oxen and two large elephants' teeth.

General Account of the Country.—About Kurrerechane, and many other places, visited by Mr. C. the height of the hills, the smooth regularity of their outline, and the indentations upon their sides, afford sufficient indications of the presence of chalk, lime, &c. and of a secondary, and consequently, a fertile country. From the distance travelled by Mr. C. Kurrerechane must lay near the latitude of 24 degrees S. and not a very great distance from the eastern coast of Africa. In this neighbourhood some of the rivers were seen running to the westward, while others ran to the eastward, and in a S. S. E. direction. It is probable that some of the rivers seen by Mr. C., on this occasion, may be branches of the De la Goa, or Machavana, near the sources of those which empty themselves into the De la Goa Bay. Several large towns were reported to lay to the eastward of Kurrerechane, the smoke of one or two of them was seen in the distance. From this place Mr. C. returned nearly in the same route to Tammahala and from thence southward to Malapeetsee and Makoon's Kraal: then westward in a direct line to new Lattakoo, from which he had been absent two months.

Original Poetry.

FETCH ME THE HARP.

(A CAMBRIAN MELODY.)

Fetch me the harp, and let me try
One note of joy to waken;
For once, at least, let sadness lie
A little while forsaken.
Give me the goblet, let me drink
A short farewell to sorrow;
The heart hath time enough to think
Upon its griefs to-morrow.
Tis fit, at times, the sun should be Upon the desert glowing;
And oft 'mong barren rocks we see
The wild flower sweetly growing.
Give me the harp, we consecrate
The hour to song and pleasure;
To-morrow let the fiend, in hate,
Arrest its lively measure.
Now let it loudly sing,—the hour
Is ours, we'll freely pass it;
Spite of dull sorrow, envious pow'r,
With happy ones we'll clasp it.

OSSIAN'S ADDRESS TO THE SETTING SUN.

(FROM STEWART'S COLLECTION OF GAELIC POEMS.)

AND hast thou o'er thy narrow circle rolled,
Son of perfection, with the locks of gold?
Lo, to receive thee to thy hall of rest
Night opens her portals in the glowing west;
The heaving billows at thy presence blush,
Still all their roaring and their marm'ring hush,
Awe'd by the splendour of the rays divine,
Facetting glories that around them shine.
May no rude storm disturb thy rest, O sun!
And be thy radiant course again with joy begun!

AULD DOBIE.

TO ANNE,

Aged eight years; the daughter of Mrs. R.—
'Tis well for me
My years already doubly number'd thine—
My loveless eyes, unmoved, may gaze on thee."
LORD BRON.

I have not seen so sweet a face,
A form so promising,
So much of loveliness and grace,
Save when imagining
How beings of a brighter sphere
Would look were they permitted here.
Dear little fairy! with an eye
Pure, calm, and eloquent,
Whose glances, as they gently fly,
Seem capable and meant
To shew of charms and innocence
The bland and mighty influence;
Young Peri! with an angel-brow,
On which I deem I see
A promise and a proof that thou Shalt not ignoble be,—
I view upon thy forehead fair
The pledge of feelings high and rare.
And then thy voice, and wistful smile,
Thy cheek and raven hair,
All formed to charm and to beguile,
All bright beyond compare!
Of these some bards may sweeter tell,
But none can feel them half so well!
Farewell! the new and perfect bliss
Of gazing upon thee
Must fleet like other joys; but this Shall unforgetten be!
A page kept pure in mem'ry's book
On which, in happier hours, I'll look.

ANTAR'S BOWERS.

(FROM AN UNPUBLISHED POEM.)

BESIDE the cot where Antar dwelt,
A calm cool lake, with flow'r's o'erspread,
Extended far, and like the sky,
When sinks the sun to his billowy bed,
Look'd bright and dazzling;—Then was felt,
Beneath those pendant boughs, that hung
As if enamour'd with the young
Beauty of their own greenness, seen
Reflected in the glassy sheet,
The last—the refreshing breezes sigh,
That usher'd evening to its close,
Which round'd the flow'r's groves among,
And nidd' sweet from every rose!
Antar alone had access to
This wide deep lake of thousand bowers;
For none, save him, the pathway knew,—
As 'round its border cliffs arose,
And copse wood flank'd it every way,—
Seeming, forthwith, as if the day
The darkness threaten'd to oppose,—
Lapt in the veil of midnight hours.
And here, when day-light first began
To extend the orb of Mecha's clan,
Like the loose bat, he fled the plain,
Till night envelop'd earth again!

WILFORD.

The Drama.

The present week has witnessed an unusual spirit of honourable competition between the two great theatres, each of which has produced a new tragedy, and, although they vary much in their merits and success, yet the least fortunate of the two is a rather creditable effort. It is not a little singular that jealousy forms the basis of both, though differently treated and under very different circumstances. We congratulate our readers on the activity which pervades our great establishments, an activity which continues unabated, though far from being cheered with liberal patronage, and often very unsuccessful.

DRURY LANE.—A new tragedy was produced at this theatre on Monday night, called Montalto. The story, which is by no means fertile in incidents, is rather buried in prolixity; the following is a pretty correct outline:—

Montalto (Wallack), by marrying Julia (Mrs. W. West), has become the sovereign of a principality in Italy, to the exclusion of Laura (Mrs. Egerton), the cousin of Julia, whose affection, at an early period of her life, had been slighted by Montalto; irritated by this slight, and urged by ambition to obtain possession of those honours possessed by Montalto, in right of her cousin Julia, she determines on revenge: and, as a preliminary step to obtaining it, marries Durazzo (Booth), a favourite and confidential officer of Montalto; and, having succeeded in seducing Michael (Cooper), the brother of Durazzo, to become a party to her designs, she makes use of the influence which he has over his brother, to prevail on him to betray his benefactor and friend Montalto.—Such is the situation of the parties at the opening of the piece, at which time Montalto, who has been absent on an expedition against a neighbouring prince (Count Bassanio), arrives suddenly and unexpectedly at his own castle, induced to do so by a mysterious written warning, which he finds on his table in his tent, cautioning him to be careful that, during his absence, his honour was not betrayed by his wife. The business of the piece then consists of the endeavours of Laura, aided by Michael's base insinuations, to increase and strengthen the seeds of jealousy already sown in the mind of Montalto by the contents of the paper found in his tent, and which had been placed there by their contrivance. In these plans they were aided by the unsuspicious and open character of Julia; and the jealousy of Montalto is at length raised to such a height, that he is led to attempt to poignard his innocent victim whilst sleeping in her bed. She awakes, however, at the instant he is about to effect his diabolical purpose, which is thus defeated; and his suspicions of her guilt are somewhat shaken by her conduct on this occasion. Laura and Michael having, in the mean time, prevailed on Durazzo to come into their plans, the latter, in the night, opens the gates of Montalto's castle, and admits Count Bassanio! Montalto is roused, and opposes the enemy, but, in doing so, receives a mortal wound. In this situation his passions are again wrought on by Laura and Michael, and he is persuaded that it was by Julia's treachery that Bassanio was admitted into the castle, and Durazzo induced to become a traitor; and, under this impression, he, in the agonies of dissolution, curses his innocent wife. At this period, however, Laura is informed that Durazzo and Michael have fallen victims to their treachery; and, struck with remorse, she then confesses her own guilt, and the arts which have been used to deceive her unsuspecting victim. Montalto thus undeceived, revokes his curse, and dies, blessing the innocent object of his unjust suspicions.

The prologue, which was very well delivered by Mr. Cooper, prepared the audience to expect an imitation of Shakespeare, and it will be seen from the sketch of the plot which we have given, that the characters of Othello, Desdemona, and Iago, are all parodied in this production. The same remark will apply to many passages of the play which have been transferred, some unaltered, and others but very slightly altered. The story is by no means devoid of interest, but it is tedious in its development. Some of the situations are effective; and the language, though seldom rising above mediocrity, was not destitute of energy in two or three of the scenes. Great justice was done to the play by the performers, and by an audience as indulgent as we ever witnessed. Wallack exerted himself much in Montalto, and Cooper made the most of the part of Michael, which, however, is scarcely worthy of his talents. Booth was seized with one of his usual fits of tameness. This gentleman is one of the most unequal performers we ever saw, and, to play well at all, he must have a good character assigned him, for he will never make one. Mrs. West played the tender, affectionate, and injured Julia, with much effect, particularly in the scene where she meets her husband with a dagger, prepared to sacrifice her to the blindness of his passion; for really it cannot be said of Montalto as of Othello, 'that he is a man not easily jealous,' since there is nothing whatever to justify it. Mrs. Egerton, in spite of her fantastic dress and boisterous declamation, gave a good picture of the 'fury of a woman scorned.' The epilogue, a very silly piece of composition, was much better delivered than it deserved, by Mrs. Edwin. The tragedy was heard throughout with great attention, but experienced some opposition when given out for repetition. It was, however, performed on the following evening, with more success, as some judicious curtailments had been made. It will, probably, run a few nights, but we cannot expect it to keep its place on the stage.

COVENT GARDEN.—Few events in the dramatic world have excited more interest in the public mind than the announcement of a new tragedy, from the pen of Mr. Barry Cornwall, who had acquired considerable reputation by his 'Dramatic Scenes' and his Poem of 'Marcian Colonna.' His studies led him to choose his models from the writers in that golden era of the English stage, the age of Shakespeare. All lovers of the drama, therefore, who had watched the commencement of his career, felt gratified that a tragedy, avowedly from his pen, was to be submitted to the public; and the long-forgotten period of theatrical annals seemed to be revived, when a new tragedy in announcement was the theme of every tongue, and the expectation of every mind that aspired to literature. The appearance of the house, which was crowded in every part, corresponded with this sentiment.

The tragedy contains the following dramatis personæ:—

John, D. of Mirandola	Mr. Macready.
Guido, his son	— C. Kemble.
Hypolito, son of Isabella	Miss Boden.
Casti	— Mr. Abbott.
Julio	— Connor.
Gheraldi, a monk	— Egerton.
Isidora, Dss. of Mirandola	Miss Foote.
Isabella, the duke's sister	Mrs. Faucit.

The following is a sketch of the plot:—

Guido and Isidora have long entertained a mutual passion unknown to the Duke of Mirandola. The young prince, called away to defend his country in arms, is desperately wounded, and it is reported to his mistress and his father that he is dead. The Duke, in an evil hour, sees Isidora, loves her, and, under the impression that Guido was no more, obtains from her a weeping and cold consent to marry him. Guido writes to his father and his mistress the news of his recovery; but the letters are intercepted by Isabella, the sister of the Duke, a sort of female Iago, who labours, in concert with the miscreant monk Gheraldi, to ruin Guido, for the purpose of placing in the hands of her own son the sceptre of Mirandola, and, in ignorance of Guido's existence on this side the grave, the fatal union takes place. It is at this distressing moment that Guido returns. He meets Isidora, and the interview is full of tenderness. Then follows the meeting with his father, exquisitely wrought, which, after a condict of filial, paternal, and jealous feeling, ends in an affectionate reconciliation. Isabella persuades Isidora to give a ring to Guido as a token of friendship. The Duke, at a banquet, whilst holding Guido affectionately by the hand, recognizes the ring. It was his marriage present to her. He conceives a horrible suspicion, and is stung to very madness. Guido now determines to depart for ever—ignoring what has caused his father's jealous paroxysm. The father is again reconciled to him. But another interview, under the most innocent circumstances, and against Guido's will, is produced between him and Isidora, in a garden. The father, led by Isabella, surprises them; and, in his fury—or rather in the fixed and fearful calmness of despair, passes sentence of death upon Guido, and orders him to instant execution. Casti, in the mean time, has discovered the intercepted letters, and reveals to the Duke the horrid treason of Isabella and the monk. The wretched father invokes heaven to save Guido from the fatal stroke: and issues a mandate to arrest the execution, but in that moment the dread volley is heard from behind the scenes, and the Duke, agitated with a super-human pang of remorse, expires distracted with the horror of having deprived a beloved son of life.

There are two historic incidents to which the plot has affinity—the fate of Don Carlos, son of Philip the Second, and that of Ugo, natural son of Nicholas, Duke of Ferrara. The former has been treated by Otway not happily, and by Schiller and Alfieri with great power. In the former, there is the wild vigour of the German school; in the latter, the stern genius of Alfieri has embodied and developed sombrous tyranny, hypocrisy, and cruelty, with a giant's power. The fate of Ugo, as told by Gibbon and the Ferrarese historian, and which, by the bye, has inspired Lord Byron with one of the most beautiful of his shorter poems, seems more nearly allied to the subject of Mirandola, than the story of Philip.—Guido, like Ugo, is a natural son, and the desolate father, after his unnatural judgment, cried out—'Oh! that I were dead, since I have been hurried to smother thus against my own Ugo!'

The character of Mirandola is admirably drawn; the elements of tragic emotion are so, finely bleeded. His haughty and jealous temper, and his choleric suspicions are softened and mitigated by sentiments of the most kindly sensibility which filled every heart with emotion, and suffused many an eye in tears. The passions are so mingled with Mirandola—the transitions of touch from one chord of the heart to another—from terror to tenderness, and from suspicion to confiding—are so rapid as to require a dominion over tragic expression, which could only be exercised by great skill, united with the finest talent. Mr. Macready's performance of this character fully proved the greatness of his powers; it was of that class of performances which triumphs over the greatest difficulties. Mr. C. Kemble was as spirited as the conception of the poet, in the character of Guido, which is drawn with great skill. He breathed the very spirit of love and gallantry, and we never saw him to more advantage. Mr. Abbot obtained much applause in one scene, where a good opportunity was afforded him, and played well throughout the whole. Miss Foote and Mrs. Faucit sustained their respective characters with great ability, and the piece throughout was well acted.

The language of this play fully justified the expectations which the former talents of the author had excited. It was, however, feared by some, that he would allow his muse to luxuriate too freely in poetic imaginations. This he has very judiciously avoided; indeed, his design seems to have been to try the effect of natural dialogue on the stage, and to bring down the serious drama from its usual elevation without endangering its dignity. There are, however, several passages of great poetic beauty. His description of human happiness, as—

'The gay to-morrow of the mind
Which never comes.'

Strikes us as peculiarly happy and original. The Duke's passion for Isidora is finely expressed. He says,—

'By the blue sky and all its crowding stars
I love you better—Oh! far better than
Woman was ever lov'd. There's not an hour
Of day or dreaming night but I am with thee;
There's not a wind but whispers of thy name,
And not a flower that sleeps beneath the moon
But in its hues or fragrance tells a tale
Of thee, my love, to thy Mirandola.'

We could cite other passages which possess great merit, but these, for the present, must suffice. We have now only to add, that the tragedy was applauded throughout, and that, when it was given out for repetition, the acclamations were such as to leave no doubt of its complete success.

Literature and Science.

The late Voyage of Discovery.—It has been mentioned in many of the public Journals, that a newspaper was printed on board the Discovery Ships in the late northern expedition. This is partly erroneous; no printing materials were on board. The fact was, each officer contributed some article (generally, either an ingenious pleasantry, or else upon the subject of the Expedition) unknown, at the time, to the rest of the crew. The whole being collected were fairly copied out by a clerk, and thus was produced a newspaper, in writing, once a fortnight, to the great amusement of the crew.

A natural phenomenon occurred on board, which may be of peculiar interest to the admirers of Newton's principles of colours, of the truth of which it appears to be a remarkable confirmation. Near the stove was grown a considerable quantity of mustard and cress which was highly useful on account of its anti-scorbutic qualities. In consequence of the privation of light, during the winter, this vegetable, as it grew, was perfectly white; but when the summer returned, and the light was admitted to it, through an aperture, it immediately bent in the direction of the light, and the tips became green, which colour gradually spread itself down the stalks.

The crews used every means as may be supposed to escape the cold. The cabins were kept at a moderate and comfortable warmth, which was always regulated by a thermometer. They were also air-tight; but whenever the exterior air gained admission, the intensity of the cold was so violently opposed to even the moderate warmth of that within, that it produced an effect which had the appearance of a fall of snow which covered the floors.

The sailors generally wore masks, warmly lined, when upon deck. Upon their return below, they were examined by their messmates, for fear there should be any white spots upon their faces. These spots were the effects of the intense cold in congealing the blood, and if not attended to, were the forerunners of mortifications; they, therefore, immediately rubbed them with snow, until the free circulation returned. Although their situation, in regard to climate, was of itself thus difficult to be sustained, other disheartening troubles were added—for a long period, previous to their return, they laboured under a scarcity of provision. Four pounds, only, of meat, weekly, were allowed to each man, and a very small glass of rum each day. The former was weighed, and the latter measured with the most scrupulous exactness. The conduct of the men under these circumstances was highly deserving of praise.

The officers suffered from the cold, particularly when changing their clothes for the performance of the play, being obliged to go into another cabin, the warm one being fitted up as the theatre. This play was performed once a fortnight, and the time of its repetition was looked forward to by the men with the utmost delight and impatience. The subject of the drama related to the expedition, and exhibited the numerous dangers they were to encounter in the voyage. Among others was displayed a desperate battle with the ferocious white bears, which of course ended in the destruction of those animals. Then succeeded an encounter with an enormous sea horse, which, after giving ample scope to the palpitations of hope and fear, terminated in a similar manner. The successful passage of the ships into the Pacific Ocean was represented, and after that the acquirement of the 20,000*l.* in London. There was also a sort of after act, which turned upon the different ways of getting rid of the money in that great city.

By the above, and other judicious means, Lieutenant Parry and his officers succeeded in their highly meritorious endeavours to keep the men in excellent spirits during their very long confinement.

LUCANUS.

Becket's Executions.—In the year 1170, the four knights, who slew Thomas à Becket, fled for refuge to Knaresborough castle: Sir Hugh de Morville, whose descendants were settled in Cumberland, where the sword with which he slew Thomas à Becket was kept a long time, in memory of the fact: his family is extinct; Sir Richard Breton, of which name, a good family at this day is extant in Northamptonshire: Sir William Tracey, whose heirs, at this day flourish in Gloucestershire; Sir Reginald Fitz-Urse, or Bear's Son; his posterity were afterwards men of great lands and command, in the county of Monaghan, in Ireland; being there called Mac Mahon, which in Irish signifies the son of a Bear. They remained shut up for a year; but, submitting to the church, were pardoned, on condition of performing a pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

THE BOOK OF VERSIONS; or, Guide to French Translation and Construction, Fourth Edition, with many valuable additions.

By J. CHERPILLOU,

Professor of the French Language, Royal Military College, Sandhurst.—This Book, which is intended to facilitate the Translation of English into French, and to assist the Pupil in the Construction of the French Language, should be put into his hands as soon as he is acquainted with a few of the principal grammatical rules, in order to lead him to their application. The Book of Versions is divided into easy portions or lessons, which ascend, as to difficulty, in regular gradation; and the Notes accompanying each are constructed on the same principle. In the early lessons the assistance is full, affording every point essential to a learner; and, as the process, they either present greater difficulties in the construction, or assistance becomes more sparing, but always with a sufficient reference to particulars. The Notes also furnish the Idioms, as well as the Prepositions belonging to Verbs; and, in this respect, it is presumed, they will be essentially serviceable, by forcing a continual comparison between the peculiarities of the two Languages, as displayed in their most characteristic phraseology. The contents are partly drawn from the best French classics, which have been carefully translated and adapted to the learner's purpose; and, in the selection of the subjects, particular care has been taken to consult the improvement both of head and heart. The latter part of the Book of Versions contains some specimens of French Poetry from leading Authors, with free Translations. 12mo. price 3s. 6d. bound.

To which are added, a brief View of the Discoveries of Language, and a Guide to Authors in correcting the Press. By WILLIAM GREATHEAD LEWIS.

I consider Grammar as absolutely necessary in the search after philosophical truth, and I think it not less necessary in the most important questions concerning religion and civil society.

—HORNE TOOKER.

In this Work, which is the first fruit of Mr. Lewis's imprisonment, the Author has pointed out much false doctrine and many erroneous principles in the popular Grammar of Mr. Cobbett. This Grammar, like Mr. Cobbett's, is intended for the Use of the Working Classes of Society. The Author has, however, refrained from introducing political remarks, on the supposition, that such remarks would be calculated to divert the attention of the Learner from the subject more immediately under his consideration. ‘There is,’ says the wise man, ‘a time for all things.’

Review of New Books.

By WALTER SCOTT'S NEW ROMANCE.

Kenilworth: a Romance. By the Author of 'Waverley,' 'Ivanhoe,' &c. 3 vols. 12mo. pp. 1007. Edinburgh and London, 1821.

THIS Romance, from the matchless pen of the great unknown, is published too late in the week to allow us time for much critical remark, but such of our readers as are acquainted with the history of Kenilworth Castle*, and know any thing of the talents of the master spirit of the North, will anticipate a rich treat. No author, perhaps, ever luxuriated so much in the power of description, or threw such a clarn of classic grandeur over the monuments of British antiquity as this author; while, in the portraying of the soul stirring scenes of chivalry, or in delineating the character of the humble peasant, he is no less successful. The romance of 'Kenilworth' resembles that of 'Ivanhoe' more closely than any other production of the same author; and although it has been allowed, that he is more at home in Scotia's land, yet there are few Englishmen who would not wish to see the 'old days of merry England' recorded by such a pen.

The outline of the melancholy tale on which the romance of Kenilworth is founded, is narrated at length in Ashmole's Antiquities of Berkshire, and it is alluded to in many other works which treat of the history of Queen Elizabeth's celebrated favourite, Leicester. The fair heroine is the Countess of Leicester, whose tragic fate has been the subject of an elegy, by Mickle, called Connor Hall.

The novel commences with a scene at the Black Bear Inn, in the village of Connor, three or four miles from Oxford, kept by Giles Gosling, 'a man of goodly person, and of somewhat a round belly, fifty years of age and upwards, moderate in his reckonings, prompt in his payments, having a cellar of sound liquor, a ready wit, and a pretty daughter.' To this inn, Michael Lambourne, the landlord's nephew, a hopeless vagabond, 'a swasher, and a desperate Dick,' returns from serving with the Spaniards: and here also a young gentleman, of the name of Tressilian, has taken up his residence. The company of the inn get very merry, and Lambourne enquires of the guests the fate of many of his accomplices in guilt. The scene is well drawn, but we only select a brief extract. 'Goldthred, the cutting mercer,' sings a song:—

"There is savour in this, my heart," said Michael, when the mercer had finished his song. "and some goodness seems left among you yet—but what a headroll to have read me of old countries, and to every man's name tacked some ill-omened motto! And so Swallowing Will of Wallingford hath bid us good night?"

"He died the death of a fat buck," said one of the party, "being shot with a cross-bow bolt, by old Thatcham, the duke's stout park-keeper at Donnington Castle."

"Ay, he always loved venison well," replied Michael, "and a cup of claret to boot—and so here's one to his memory. Do me right, my masters."

"When the health of this departed worthy had been duly honoured, Lambourne proceeded to inquire after France of Padworth."

"Pranced off—made immortal ten years since," said the mercer; "marry, sir, Oxford Castle and Goodman Thong, and a tenpenny-worth of cord, best know how."

"What, so they hung poor France high and dry? so much for loving to walk by moonlight—a cup to his memory, my masters—all merry fellows like moonlight. What has become of Hal with the plume?—he who lived near Yattenden, and wore the long feather—I forget his name."

"What, Hal Hempseed?" replied the mercer, "why, you may remember he was a sort of a gentleman, and would meddle in state matters, and so he got in to the mire about the Duke of Norfolk's matter, these two or three years since, fled the country with a pursuivant's warrant at his heels, and has never since been heard of."

"Nay, after these baulks," said Michael Lambourne, "I need hardly inquire after Tony Foster; for when rope, and cross-bow shafts, and pursuivant's warrants, and such like gear, were so rife, Tony could hardly 'scape them.'"

"Which, Tony Foster mean you?" said the inn-keeper.

"Why, he they called Tony Fire-the-Faggot, because he brought a light to kindle the pile round Latimer and Ridley, when the wind blew out Jack Thong's torch, and no man else would give him light for love or money."

"Tony Foster lives and thrives," said the host—"But, kinsman, I would not have you call him Tony Fire-the-Faggot, if you would not brook the stab."

"How! is he grown ashamed on't?" said Lambourne; "why, he was wont to boast of it, and say he liked as well to see a roasted heretic as a roasted ox."

"Ay, but, kinsman, that was in Mary's time," replied the landlord, "when Tony's father was Reeve here to the Abbot of Abingdon. But since that, Tony married a pure precisian, and is as good a Protestant, I warrant you, as the best."

"And looks grave, and holds his head high, and scorns his old companions," said the mercer.

"Then he hath prospered, I warrant him," said Lambourne; "for ever when a man hath got nobles of his own, he keeps out of the way of those whose exchequers lie in other men's purchase."

"Prospered, quotha!" said the mercer, "why, you remember Connor-Place, the old mansion-house beside the church yard."

"By the same token, I robbed the orchard three times—what of that?—it was the old Abbot's residence when there was plague or sickness at Abingdon."

"Ay, said the host, "but that has been long over; and Anthony Foster hath a right in it, and lives there by some grant from a great countier, who had the churchlands from the crown; and there he dwells, and has as little to do with any poor wight in Connor, as if he were himself a belted knight."

"Nay," said the mercer, "it is not altogether pride in Tony neither—that is a fair lady in the case, and Tony will scarce let the light of day look on her."

"How," said Tressilian, who no the first time interfered in their con-tion, "did ye not say this Foster was married, and to a precisian?"

"Married he was, and to as bitter a precisian as ever eat flesh in Lent; and a cat-and-dog life she led with Tony, as men said. But she is dead, rest be with her, and Tony hath but a slip of a daughter; so it is thought he means to wed this stranger, that men keep such a coil about."

"And why so?—I mean, why do they keep a coil about her?" said Tressilian.

"Why, I wot not," answered the host, "except that men say she is as beautiful as an angel, and no one knows whence she comes, and every one wishes to know why she is kept so closely mewed up."

Foster is a man who had been one of Queen Mary's papists and afterwards one of Queen Elizabeth's protestants; he had lighted the faggots for burning Latimer, and, though formerly poor, was now rich, and lived as master of the manor house. Lambourne had made a wager that he would go to Foster's house, and get introduced to the fair guest. Tressilian agreed to accompany him; and while Foster and Michael had retired to talk over old crimes and plan new ones, Tressilian encountered the fair lady Amy Robsart, the heroine of the novel, to whom he had been attached and was now seeking. While he is advising her to quit the place with him, they are interrupted by Lambourne and Foster; Tressilian is ordered to quit the house, in doing which he encounters a cavalier muffled in his riding cloak, who proves to be Varney, an attendant of the Earl of Leicester and an important agent in this drama. Tressilian and Varney fight, and the latter would have received his death blow had not Lambourne come to his aid.

Varney is the bearer of a present from his master and a letter to 'the Queen of his affections', announcing that he will visit her that evening. Varney had been so much the confidant of Leicester in this love affair with Amy, that he had been accused of carrying her off, and was afterwards charged as her seducer. The rooms at Cumnor had been splendidly fitted up for the residence of Amy, who was in fact married to England's proudest earl, Leicester, although it was not publicly known or avowed. The Earl arrived and was received with raptures by his wife; the interview between them is delightfully drawn, particularly where, with childish wonder and rustic simplicity, she mixes the most tender and conjugal affection, and admires from head to foot the noble form and princely attire of her Lord:—

"I wished to see my earl visit this obscure and secret bowyer," said the countess, "in all his princely array; and now, methinks, I long to sit in one of his princely halls, and see him enter dressed in sober russet, as when he won poor Amy Robsart's heart."

"That is a wish easily granted," said the earl—"the sober russet shall be donned to-morrow if you will."

"But shall I," said the lady, "go with you to one of your castles, to see how the richness of your dwelling will correspond with your peasant habit?"

"Why, Amy," said the earl, looking around, "are not these apartments decorated with sufficient splendour? I gave the most unbounded order, and, methinks, it has been indifferently well obeyed—but if thou canst tell me aught which remains to be done, I will instantly give direction."

"Nay, my lord, now you mock me," replied the countess; "the gaiety of this rich lodging exceeds my imagination as much as it does my desert. But shall not your wife, my love—at least one day soon—be surrounded with the honour, which arises neither from the toils of the mechanic who decks her apartment, nor from the silks and jewels with which your generosity adorns her, but which is attached to her place among the matronage, as the avowed wife of England's noblest earl?"

"One day," said her husband,—"Yes, Amy, my love, one day this shall surely happen; and, believe me, thou canst not wish for that day more fondly than I. With what rapture could I retire from labours of state, and cares and toils of ambition, to spend my life in dignity and honour on my own broad domains, with thee, my lovely Amy, for my friend and companion! But, Amy, this cannot yet be; and these dear but stolen intervals are all I can give to the loveliest and the best beloved of her sex."

"But why can it not be?" urged the countess, in the softest tones of persuasion,—"why can it not immediately take place—this more perfect, this uninterrupted union, for which you say you wish, and which the laws of God and man alike command?—Ah! did you but desire it half so much as you say, mighty and favoured as you are, who or what should bar your attaining your wish?"

The earl's brow was overcast. "Amy," he said, "you speak of what you understand not. We that toil in courts are like those who climb a mountain of loose land—we dare make no halt until some projecting rock afford us a secure stance and resting place—if we pause sooner, we slide down by our own weight, an object of universal derision. I stand high, but I stand not secure enough to follow my own inclination. To declare my marriage, were to be the artificer of my own ruin. But, believe me, I will reach a point, and that speedily, when I can do justice to thee and to myself. Meantime, poison not the bliss of the present moment, by desiring that which cannot at present be."

Varney is a strong headed artful knave, capable of any mischief to forward his ambition; he urges Leicester to seek the hand of majesty itself, confident that, however high his master climbs he must drag Richard Varney along with him. The Countess having been informed by Tressilian that her father was ill, entreates the Earl that she might communicate the secret of her marriage to him; the Earl objects to her visiting her father, expressing some jealous fears of Tressilian, her former admirer. The Earl takes his departure for Woodstock next morning, accompanied by Varney and Lambourne, whom he had engaged in his service.

Tressilian, after his interview with the Countess, returned to the inn, but refused all further acquaintance with Lambourne. After he had retired to rest, his host, Giles Gosling, entered his room, and warned him against his nephew. Tressilian, in confidence, told him the tale of the Countess, to whom he had been secretly contracted, but that she had been suddenly carried off from the house of her father, Sir Hugh Robsart, and it was believed by Varney. Tressilian is induced to quit the inn during the night; in traversing along crooked lanes and by-ways, as directed by his host, his horse loses a shoe, and, on inquiring for a smith, he meets with a pedagogue, Master Erasmus Holiday, whose person is thus described:—

A long, lean, shambling, stooping figure, was surmounted by a head thatched with lank black hair somewhat inclining to grey. His features had the cast of habitual authority, which I suppose Dionysius carried with him from the throne to the schoolmaster's pulpit, and bequeathed as a legacy to all of the same profession. A black buckram cassock was gathered at his middle with a belt, at which hung, instead of knife or weapon, a goodly leather pen-and-ink-case. His ferula was stuck on the other side, like harlequin's wooden sword; and he carried in his hand the tattered volume which he had been busily perusing.

The account of himself, as related to Tressilian, is one of those happy sketches in which our author is so successful. Tressilian only wanted to know where he could get his horse and, but the man of letters could not give that information without prefacing it with a full half hour of his own history, and that of a Doctor Doboebe. We can only give the commencement of Magister Holiday's narration:—

He was born at Hogsorton, where, according to popular saying, the pig plays upon the organ; a proverb which is interpreted allegorically, as having reference to the herd of Epicurus, of which Horace confessed himself a partner. His name of Erasmus, he derived partly from his father having been the son of a renowned washerwoman, who held that great scholar in clean linen all the while: he was at Oxford; a task of some difficulty, as he was only possessed of two shirts, "the one," as she expressed herself, "to wash the other." The vestiges of one of these rascals, as Master Holiday boasted, were still in his possession, having fortunately been detained by his grandmother to cover the balance of her bill. But he thought there was a still higher and over-riding cause for his having had the name of Erasmus conferred upon him, namely, the secret prementition of his mother's mind, that, in the babe to be christened, was a hidden genius, which should one day lead him to rival the fame of the great scholar of Amsterdam. The schoolmaster's surname led him as far into dissertation as his Christian appellation. He was inclined to think that he bore the name of Holiday quasi lucus a non lucendo, because he gave such few holidays to his school; "Beware," said he, "the schoolmaster is termed, classically, Ludi Magister, because he deprives boys of their play." And yet, on the other hand, he thought it might bear a very different interpretation, and refer to his own exquisite art in arranging pageants, morris-dances, May-day festivities, and such like holiday delights, for which he assured Tressilian he had positively the purest and the most inventive brain in England; inasmuch that his cunning in framing such pleasures had made him known to many honourable persons, both in country and court, and especially to the noble Earl of Leicester—"And although he may now seem to forget me," he said, "in the multitude of state affairs, yet I am well assured, that had he some pretty pastime to array for entertainment of the Queen's grace, horse and man would be seeking the humble cottage of Erasmus Holiday. Parvo contentus, in the meanwhile, I hear my pupils parse and construe, worshipful sir, and drive away my time with the aid of the Muses. And I have at all times, when in correspondence with foreign scholars, subscribed myself Erasmus ab Die Fausto, and have enjoyed the distinction due to the learned under that title; witness the erudite Diedrich Buckenchockius, who dedicated to me, under that title, his treatise on the letter tau. In fine, sir, I have been a happy and distinguished man."

"Long may it be so, sir," said the traveller; "but permit me to ask, in your own learned phrase, quid hoc ad Iphyci literas, what has all this to do with the shoeing of my poor nag?"

"Pesinna lente," said the man of learning, "we will presently come to that point."

This Dr. Dobocovie, a man of bad character, had a servant, Wayland, who, after the death of his master, turned smith; to him Tressilian was recommended. This Wayland Smith is an uncouth and mysterious personage, who never wishes to see his customers, but exacts from them that they shall lay their groat on a stone, retire at some distance, and never look at him, while he does the necessary work. Tressilian determined on having some conversation with him at all hazards, and follows him into a subterraneous cell, where he learns his history. Smith had been apprentice to a juggler, and told the fortune of Tressilian's favourite, of whom he brought a painful remembrance. He was afterwards on the stage, and performed at the Black Bull, the Globe, and the Fortune, before he became half partner, half domestic, to the 'physician.' Cured of his alchemy, he would fain have returned to his former occupation of smith, but no one would bring a horse to be shod at the devil's post. His debtors would not pay him, and he was afraid of his creditors, which was the cause of his living in concealment. Tressilian agrees to take Wayland along with him to Lidcote Hall, the seat of Sir Hugh Robsart. The good knight has suffered much from the loss of his daughter, particularly as he was unacquainted with her fate. Tressilian approached him:—

"I will ask thee no questions," said the old knight; "no questions—none, Edmund—thou hast not found her, or so found her, that she were better lost."

Tressilian was unable to reply, otherwise than by putting his hands before his face.

"It is enough—it is enough. But do not thou weep for her, Edmund. I have cause to weep, for she was my daughter,—thou hast cause to rejoice, that she did not become thy wife.—Great God! thou knowest best what is good for us.—It was my nightly prayer that I should see Amy and Edmund wedded,—had it been granted, it had now been gall added to bitterness."

"Be comforted, my friend," said the curate, addressing Sir Hugh, "it cannot be that the daughter of all our hopes and affections is the vile creature you would bespeak her."

"O, no," replied Sir Hugh, impatiently, "I were wrong to name broadly the base thing she is become—there is some new court name for it, I warrant me. It is honour enough for the daughter of an old Devonshire clown to be the lemmen of a gay courtier,—of Varney too,—of Varney, whose grandsire was relieved by my father, when his fortune was broken, at the battle of—the battle of—where Richard was slain—out of my memory—and I warrant none of you will help me."

"The battle of Bosworth," said Master Mumblebrazen, "stricken between Richard Crockback and Henry Tudor, grandsire of the Queen that now is, Primo Henrici Septimi; and in the year 1485, post Christum natum."

Wayland, by his skill in medicine, administrators a sedative draught to Sir Hugh, which does him much good. It is then determined, that Tressilian, being invested with sufficient powers, shall repair to Court to claim the lost Amy. While he is preparing for his departure, a messenger arrives from the Earl of Sussex, invites him to repair to him immediately at Say's Court, near Deptford; and he sets off, accompanied by Wayland and the messenger.

We shall not, for the present, pursue the story further, but extract a scene between the artful Varney and the ambitious Leicester, which may be said to lay the ground-work for the catastrophe: viz. the death of the unfortunate Amy, Countess of Leicester, by Varney and the wretch Foster. Queen Elizabeth had been to Say's Court, to reconcile the rival Earls Leicester and Sussex:—

When Leicester returned to his lodging, after a day so important and so harassing, in which, after riding out more than one gale, and touching on more than one shoal, his bark had finally gained the harbour with banner displayed, he seemed to experience as much fatigue as a mariner after a perilous storm. He spoke not a word while his chamberlain exchanged his rich court-mantle for a furred night-robe, and when this officer signified that Master Varney desired to speak with his lordship, he replied only by a sullen nod. Varney, however, entered, accepting this signal as a permission, and the chamberlain withdrew.

The earl remained silent and almost motionless in his chair, his head reclined on his hand, and his elbow resting upon the table which stood beside him, without seeming to be conscious of the entrance or of the presence of his confidant. Varney waited for some minutes until he should speak, desirous to know what was the finally predominant mood of a mind, through which so many powerful emotions had that day taken their course. But he waited in vain, for Leicester continued still silent, and the confidant saw himself under the necessity of being the first to speak. "May I congratulate your lordship," he said, "on the very deserved superiority you have this day attained over your most formidable rival?"

Leicester raised his head, and answered sadly, but without anger, "Thou, Varney, whose ready invention has involved me in a web of most mean and perilous falsehood, knowest best what reason there is for gratulation on the subject."

"Do you blame me, my lord," said Varney, "for not betraying, on the first push, the secret on which your fortunes depended, and which you have so oft and so earnestly recommended to my safe keeping? Your lordship was present in person, and might have contradicted me and ruined myself by an avowal of the truth; but surely it was no part of a faithful servant to have done so without your commands."

"I cannot deny it, Varney," said the earl, rising and walking across the room; "my own ambition has been traitor to my love."

"Say rather, my lord, that your love has been traitor to your greatness, and barred you from such a prospect of honour and power as the world cannot offer to any other. To make my honoured lady a countess, you have missed the chance of being yourself!"

"He paused, and seemed unwilling to complete the sentence."

"Of being myself what?" demanded Leicester; "speak out thy meaning, Varney."

"Of being yourself a KING, my lord," replied Varney; "and King of England to boot!—It is no treason to our Queen to say so. It would have chanced by her, obtaining that which all true subjects wish her—a lusty, noble, and gallant husband."

"Thou ravest, Varney," answered Leicester. "Besides, our times have seen enough to make men loath the crown matrimonial which men take from their wives' lap. There was Darnley in Scotland."

"He!" said Varney; "a gull, a fool, a thrice soddan ass, who suffered himself to be fired off in the air like a rocket on a rejoicing day. Had Mary had the hap to have wedded the noble earl, once destined to share her throne, she had experienced a husband of different metal; and her husband had found in her a wife as complying and loving as the mate of the meanest squire, who follows the hounds a-horseback, and holds her husband's bridle as he mounts."

"It might have been as thou say'st, Varney," said Leicester, a brief smile of self-satisfaction passing over his anxious countenance. "Henry Darnley knew little of women—with Mary, a man who knew her sex, might have had some chance of holding his own. But not with Elizabeth, Varney—for I think, God, when he gave her the heart of a woman, gave her the head of a man to control its follies.—No, I know her.—She will accept love-tokens, ay, and requite them with the like—put sugared sonnets in her bosom—ay, and answer them too—push gallantry to the very verge where it becomes excrement of affection; but she writes nil ultra to all which is to follow, and would not barter one iota of her own supreme power for all the alphabet of both Caph and Hymen."

"The better for you, my lord," said Varney, "that is, in the case supposed, if such be her disposition; since you think you cannot aspire to become her husband. Her favourite you are, and may remain, if the lady at Cumnor Place remains in her present obscurity."

"Poor Amy!" said Leicester, with a deep sigh; "she desired so earnestly to be acknowledged in presence of God and man!"

"Ay, but my lord," said Varney, "is her desire reasonable?—that is the question. Her religious scruples are solved—she is an honoured and beloved wife—enjoying the society of her husband at such times as his weightier duties permit him to afford her his company. What would she more? I am right sure that a lady so gentle and so loving would consent to live her life through in a certain obscurity, which is, after all, not dimmer than when she was at Lidcot Hall,—rather than diminish the least jot of her lord's honours and greatness by a premature attempt to share them."

"There is something in what thou say'st," said Leicester; "and her appearance here were fatal, yet she must be seen at Kenilworth, Elizabeth will not forget that she has so appointed."

"Let me sleep on that hard point," said Varney; "I cannot else perfect the device I have on the stithy, which I trust will satisfy the Queen and please my honoured lady, yet leave this fatal secret where it is now buried.—Has your lordship further commands for the night?"

"I would be alone," said Leicester. "Leave me, and place my steel casket on the table.—Be within summons."

Varney retired; and the earl, opening the window of his apartment, looked out long and anxiously upon the brilliant host of stars which glimmered in the brilliance of a summer firmament. The words burst from him as at unawares—"I had never more need that the heavenly bodies should befriended me, for my earthly path is darkened and confused."

It is well known that the age reposed a deep confidence in the vain predictions of judicial astrology, and Leicester, though exempt from the general control of superstition, was not in this respect superior to his time; but, on the contrary, was remarkable for the encouragement which he gave to the professors of this pretended science. Indeed, the wish to pry into futurity, so general among the human race of every description, is peculiarly to be found amongst those who trade in state mysteries, and the dangerous intrigues and cabals of courts. With heedful precaution to see that it had not been opened, or its locks tampered with, Leicester applied a key to the steel casket, and drew from it, first, a parcel of gold pieces, which he put into a silk purse; then a parchment, inscribed with planetary signs, and the lines and calculations used in framing horoscopes, on which he gazed intently for a few moments; and, lastly, took forth a large key, which, lifting aside the tapestry, he applied to a little concealed door in the corner of the apartment, and, opening it, disclosed a stair constructed in the thickness of the wall.

"Alasco," said the earl, with a voice raised, yet no higher raised than to be heard by the inhabitant of the small turret to which the stair conducted—"Alasco, I say, descend!"

"I come, my lord," answered a voice from above. The foot of an aged man was heard, slowly descending the narrow stair, and Alasco entered the earl's apartment. The astrologer was a little man and seemed much advanced in age, for his beard was long and white, and reached over his black doublet down to his silk girdle. His hair was of the same venerable hue. But his eye-brows were as dark as the keen and piercing black eyes which they shaded, and this peculiarity gave a wild and singular cast to the physiognomy of the old man. His cheek was still fresh and ruddy, and the eyes were had mentioned resembled those of a rat, in acuteness, and even fierceness of expression. His manner was not without a sort of dignity; and the interpreter of the stars, though respectful, seemed altogether at his ease, and even assumed a tone of instruction and command, in conversing with the prime favourite of Elizabeth.

"Your prognostications have failed, Alasco," said the earl, when they had exchanged salutations—"He is recovering."

"My son," replied the astrologer, "let me remind you, I warranted not his death—nor is there any prognostication that can be derived from the heavenly bodies, their aspects, and their conjunctions, which is not liable to be controlled by the will of Heaven. Astrægent homines, sed regit ætra Deus."

"Of what avail, then, is your mystery?" replied the earl.

"Of much, my son," replied the old man, "since it can show the natural and probable course of events, although that course moves in subordination to an higher power. Thus, in reviewing the horoscope which your lordship subjected to my skill, you will observe that Saturn, being in the sixth house in opposition to Mars, retrograde in the house of life, cannot but denote long and dangerous sickness, the issue whereof is in the will of Heaven, though death may, probably, be inferred—Yet if I knew the name of the party, I would erect another scheme."

"His name is a secret," said the earl; "yet, I must own, thy prognostication hath not been unfaithful. He has been sick, and dangerously so, not however to death. But hast thou again cast my horoscope as Varney directed thee, and art thou prepared to say what the stars tell of my present fortune?"

"My heart stands at your command," said the old man: "and here, my son, is the map of thy fortunes, brilliant in aspect as ever beamed from those blessed signs whereby our life is influenced, yet not unchequered with fears, difficulties, and dangers."

"My lot were more than mortal were it otherwise," said the earl; "proceed father, and believe you speak with one ready to undergo his destiny in action and in passion, as may becom a noble of England."

"Thy courage to do and to suffer, must be wound up yet a strain higher," said the old man. "The stars intimate yet a prouder title, yet a higher rank. It is for thee to guess their meaning, not for me to name it."

"Name it, I conjure you—name it, I command you," said the earl, his eyes brightening as he spoke.

"I may not, and I will not," replied the old man. "The ire of princes is as the wrath of the lion. But mark, and judge for thyself. Here Venus, ascending in the House of Life, and conjoined with Sol, showers down that flood of silver light, blent with gold, which promises power, wealth, dignity, all that the proud heart of man desires, and in such abundance, that never the future Augustus of that old and mighty Rome heard from his Haruspices such a tale of glory, as from this rich text, my lore might read to my favourite son."

"Thou doest but jest with me, father," said the earl, astonished at the strain of enthusiasm in which the astrologer delivered his prediction.

"Is it for him to jest who hath his eye on heaven, who hath his foot on the grave?" returned the old man, solemnly.

"The Earl made two or three strides through the apartment, with his hand outstretched, as one who follows the beckoning signal of some phantom, waving him on to deeds of high import. As he turned, however, he caught the eye of the astrologer fixed on him, while an observing glance of the most shrewd penetration shot from under the penthouse of his shaggy white eye-brows. Leicester's haughty and suspicious soul at once caught fire; he darted towards the old man from the further end of the lofty apartment, only standing still when his extended hand was within a foot of the astrologer's body.

"Wretch!" he said, "if you dare to palter with me, I will have your skin stripped from your living flesh!—Confess thou hast been hired to deceive and to betray me—that thou art a cheat, and I thy silly prey and booty!"

"The old man exhibited some symptoms of emotion, but not more than the furious deportment of his patron might have extorted from innocence itself.

"What means this violence, my lord?" he answered, "or in what can I have deserved it at your hand?"

"Give me proof," said the Earl, vehemently, "that you have not tampered with mine enemies."

"My lord," replied the old man, with dignity, "you can have no better proof than that which you yourself elected. In that turret I have spent the last twenty-four hours, under the key which has been in your own custody. The hours of darkness I have spent in gazing on the heavenly bodies with these dim eyes, and during those of light I have toiled this aged brain to complete the calculation arising from their combinations. Earthly food I have not tasted—earthly voice I have not heard—You are yourself aware I had no means of doing so—and yet I tell you—who have been thus shut up in solitude and study—that within these twenty-four hours your star has become predominant in the horizon, and either the bright book of heaven speaks false, or there must have been a proportionate revolution in your fortunes upon earth. If nothing has happened within that space to secure your power, or advance your favour, then am I indeed a cheat, and the divine art, which was first devised in the plains of Chaldeæ, is a foul imposture."

"It is true," said Leicester, after a moment's reflection, "thou wert closely immured—and it is also true that the change has taken place in my situation which thou sayest the horoscope indicates."

"Wherefore this distrust, then, my son," said the astrologer, assuming a tone of admonition; "the celestial intelligences brook not diffidence, even in their favourites."

"Peace, father," answered Leicester, "I erred. Not to mortal man, nor to celestial intelligence—under that which is Supreme—will Dudley's lips say more in condescension or apology. Speak rather to the present purpose—Amid these bright promises thou hast said there was a threatening aspect—Can thy skill tell whence, or by whose means, such danger seems to impend?"

"Thus far only," answered the astrologer, "does my art enable me to answer your query. The infortune is threatened by the malignant and adverse aspect, through means of a youth,—and, as I think, a rival; but whether in love or in prince's favour, I know not; nor can I give farther indication respecting him, save that he comes from the western quarter."

"The western—ha!" replied Leicester, "it is enough—the tempest does indeed brew in that quarter!—Cornwall and Devon—Raleigh and Tressilian—one of them is indicated—I must beware of both.—Father, if I have done thy skill injustice, I will make thee a lordly recompense."

"He took a purse of gold from the strong casket which stood before him—'Have thou double the recompense which Varney promised.—Be faithful—be secret—obey the directions thou shalt receive from my master of the horse, and grudge not a little seclusion or restraint in my cause—it shall be richly considered.—Here, Varney—conduct this venerable man to thine own lodging—tend him heedfully in all things, but see that he holds communication with no one.'"

The Life of Voltaire, with interesting Particulars respecting his Death, and Anecdotes and Characters of his Contemporaries. By Frank Hall Standish, Esq. 8vo. pp. 393. London, 1821.

It is a trite observation, that the life of an author is to be found in his works; but, if the biographer adopts such a maxim, he will only make an article of bibliography: this has been felt by many, who, falling into the opposite extreme, have merely compiled a series of anecdotes. Both these systems are, in our opinion, equally remote from the real nature of biography, which should contain a faithful portrait of its subject in his public and private capacity, as a scholar and as a man. He should be pointed out as an example to follow or avoid; for, if biography have not a moral lesson in view, it is worse than useless. If such be the real character of biography, we are compelled to avow that our author has not come up to the idea. His work is a mass of materials, collected from various sources, which he has neither been at the pains to connect nor harmonize. On no occasion does he identify himself with his subject; he is, by turns, a weak advocate and a feeble adversary: his admiration is tame, and his censure spiritless; the same equivocal character reigns as to his religious opinions; he is a professor of Deism and Christianity by turns;—indeed, he seems to have no fixed principles in either politics or religion, and it is not uncommon to find him begin a digression in one principle and write himself into another before its close: if we add to these, the frequency of bad grammar and the redundancy of false images, with, here and there, real beauties of a superior order, but which lose their merit by being misplaced, we have a pretty correct idea of the life of Voltaire by Frank Hall Standish, Esq. Yet, with all these faults, our author has contrived to make an amusing anecdote work, but which is any thing but a biography of Voltaire.

Mr. Standish commences with an introductory chapter 'on the state of France during the 16th and 17th centuries, to enable the readers more completely to appreciate the miseries under which that nation laboured previous to the appearance of Voltaire.' Such an essay, if properly written, would be a valuable document and a proper vestibule to the monument he proposed to erect to the memory of Voltaire; but, alas, our author has merely selected a few isolated facts, which are far from displaying the state and progress of opinion in France during that period. The head lines of some of the pages shall supply the place of criticism:— 'Reformation,'—'Invention of Printing,'—'Sale of Indulgences,'—'Birth of Luther,'—'Order of the Augustins,'—'Calvin,'—'Progress of Superstition,'—'Profession of Magic,'—'Laws against Duelling,' &c. &c. We will only make one remark on this heterogeneous mass of materials; it is, that our author has discovered that the art of printing was known to the Romans, and cites Cicero de Natura Deorum. We should have been more obliged to him had he cited the passage instead of the title of the work.

We now enter upon the life of Voltaire: the author's account of his youth is very fairly related, but he seems anxious, at every moment, to fly off at a tangent: at every proper name he abandons his subject to tell you some particulars of the person named; thus, he cannot refrain from giving us 'the life of Moliere, his literary productions, &c. to his death;' next follows a digression upon the Jesuits, inserted, apparently, to inculcate the doctrines that, 'if even the deadliness of envy or malice entirely occupied the human breast, its excess has been found among the clergy—and priests, like women, are seldom satisfied but with the extermination of the object of their hatred.'

Mr. Standish is a bold man thus, in one sacrificing clause, to declare war against the representatives of the divinity in heaven and our divinities on earth; for our part, we had rather quarrel with all the world beside than with those two classes; but, as Rabelais said to his lawyer, retournons à nos moutons, where is Voltaire? be patient, reader, our author has first to make the following remarks on satire:—

'A libel is the natural offspring of a weak head and corrupt heart, and is sometimes to be found still emanating even from a christian teacher, or protestant clergyman of the present century.'

'High birth, unattended by riches or by talents much as it may adorn a drawing-room or add to the splendour of a court, and conduce to the good reception of the possessor among persons of the same rank, attracts little notice and little envy from others: but money or wit pays heavier tribute to censure, than the social qualities of the owner, whoever he may be, can redeem. He who occupies a situation independent of the world, is regarded with distrust both by his superiors and inferiors; they hate because they envy him; and the flps that flatter his foibles, proclaim to the world the follies of his unguarded confidence. Eminence of every description has this cup of bitterness; history relates that the head of Jesus was crowned with thorns. Yet, while we bow to the rod of fate, we must hesitate to what divinity to ascribe the attributes of our existence. The fire of youth, like the freedom of an impetuous horse, may spring indignant from the spur of injustice; even that is less felt the longer we live, and the more it is used; and, at last, we fall into a quiet and indifferent scepticism as to what others say, or feel, or think. The clergy may boast that insensibility is the precious fruit of piety and devotion,—the unprotected can tell envy, malice, and persecution, to be evils incident to humanity.'

We confess we do not see what the passion of our Saviour and the new fact, that insensibility is the precious fruit of piety and devotion, have to do with either Voltaire or satire; but, perhaps, in the next edition, our author will tell us.

Our author now condescends to return to Voltaire; but, in an instant, he flies off to give us the lives of the Duke de Richelieu, Baron Goertz, and the Marquise de Villars: this would all be amusing enough if we were not anxiously expecting a life of Voltaire. We presume Mr. Standish has not been to court, as he would then have learnt that a superior is not presented to an inferior; but vice versa.

In 1736, Voltaire published his Epistle to Urania: 'the persecutions of the time rendered subterfuge necessary; the author was obliged to disavow his work, and attribute it to the Abbé de Chanlieu;' how does the biographer vindicate this conduct of Voltaire? Why, he tells us that this species of concealment (is this the right word?) may be allowed in literary compositions, and that this work, of pure deistical principles, 'could not have the tendency of hurting the Abbé's character as a Christian or a scholar.' We apprehend that neither of the parties would feel flattered by this apology and explanation. A layman writes against revealed religion and attributes it to a priest, as it cannot hurt his character! for, says he,—

'The clergy were, and always have been, more eager for the temporal punishment of a heretic than his eternal damnation. Those who discussed the opinions which they maintained, and were alone supposed able to defend them, were persecuted with all the bitterness of insatiable malice and perverted zeal; and thus the pure stream of unity and brotherly love, which springs from the Gospel, like the waters from a high mountain whose head is concealed by clouds, becomes disturbed and contaminated in its course through the human heart. It is rather singular, that, among those men, the practice of moderation should fall so far short of the precept, and that they should be so desirous of mingling together divine and human things,—a practice from which every good Christian ought to abstain.'

We may here take occasion to reprobate the author's propensity to gross and indelicate ideas clad in similar expressions. We are not now in the age of Moliere and Dryden, and if our morals be not improved, at least, the sense of shame is more acute; and few but Mr. Standish would venture to offend the ear of delicacy either in writing or conversation, which, to say the least of it, is bad taste.

We turn with pleasure to a passage which displays our author in a more advantageous point of view; it is on the feelings of a person returning from exile:—

'After a residence of three years in England, the voice of friendship, or perhaps of the minister, recalled Voltaire to Paris. He yielded to its entreaties, and more especially to that natural and spontaneous instinct which always recalls us with pleasure to the place of our birth, and which has its charms, in spite of whatever injustice or inconveniences we may have there experienced. The theorist may speculate in his closet, or the politician may devise schemes for the more perfect government of the kingdom from which he is an exile; but the heart of the father and the friend will overflow at the mention of the welfare of that land, in which he spent the earlier part of a life, which may have been subsequently varied by good or evil; where he first estimated the blessings of those to whom he looked up with gratitude and with awe, before he could comprehend the attributes of a superior Being, and to those early recollections which promised bright days of future happiness with those who have been subsequently separated by distance or by death.'

This passage is not devoid of the general faults of the author, but were his general sentiments as unexceptionable, our task would be less painful; and we cannot but deprecate the idea, taken as a general thesis, that 'the death of a father is the most secret and sincere wish of an expectant son;' and placed, as it is, in relation with that event happening to Voltaire's father, it implies a slander on Voltaire which we know to be unfounded; but this is the mischief of our author's constant effort at moralizing, and giving 'opinions exclusively his own,' and some of them are whisical enough: 'when a prosecuted man forgets his injuries, the state ought to remit the cause of complaint,' p. 136; 'this Dehose, whose name has since ended as it began,' p. 137; there is, doubtless, some wit intended here, if we had wit enough to find it out. 'The representations of the stage form a means of communication between men who labour after the acquirement of knowledge, or are engaged in the pursuit of pleasure,' p. 145; 'the feelings of affection die away with those of indifference,' p. 145; 'a rod may be prepared for the back of fools, even by an inferior pea,' p. 151; cum multis aliis.

Voltaire's disgust for the world and the consequent change of his conduct forms an admirable contrast with the silly nonsense we have just quoted; we give it with pleasure:—

'Wearied with the persecutions which his works excited; disgusted with the insolence and vanity of other writers; disappointed, perhaps, in his intercourse with the great; and smarting under the criticism of his contemporaries; he thought it necessary to change his mode of life. The fortune which descended to him from his father, and which had been subsequently increased, was ample. Thus, to the advantages of possessing wealth, he added that of being indebted for it to himself, and its use, although it could not defeat envy, secured him the means of escaping from unjust oppression. Ancient philosophers praised poverty, because they made a merit of necessity; or because riches led to confiscation; and their limited intercourse with foreign countries rendered the secret conveyance of property dangerous and uncertain. Their dealings were mostly confined to their own cities and their own countrymen; and the transfer of money was attended with trouble and inconvenience. Their climate also subjected them to fewer real wants, and the luxury of the wealthy approached more to riot and debauchery, than to convenience and comfort.'

The portrait of the Marquise de Chatelet is one of our author's happiest sketches, but too long for quotation, and besides, it is not free from immorality; who that ever tasted the sweets of wedded love, will agree with the author, that 'secret and stolen pleasures are remembered with ferrency and devotion,' when the others are obliterated and forgotten? We do not condemn but pity the man possessed of such depraved ideas. The account of Voltaire's connections with the royal poet of Prussia, will be read with interest; the burning of Voltaire's satire against Maupertuis, is curious, and merits our selection, as being well told:—

had, under the title of Le Docteur Akakia, written a most severe satire against Maupertuis, which he was about to send to the press, the author was invited, in a very polite note, to the palace; and the moment he arrived, his Majesty told him, in a very friendly manner,—“They say you have written a satire against Maupertuis, which is as witty as it is malicious: I am going to speak to you on that subject with freedom, and as I think I ought to speak to a friend. It is not my intention to argue, that Maupertuis has not done you any injury, or that you have not caused him any. I agree, on the contrary, that you both have a right to complain; and, in short, I feel and acquiesce in the opinion, that you are in the right to complain, and I should deliver him up to you without difficulty, if I were to take his case only into consideration; but I beg you will observe, that I have called that man into my service; that I have placed him at the head of my academy; that I have granted to him the same treatment as to my ministers of state; that I have admitted him into my most familiar society; and that I have permitted him to marry one of the ladies of honour of the Queen, the daughter of one of my ministers, a Lady de Bredow, belonging to one of the most ancient and most considerable families of my kingdom. I have done so much for him, to the knowledge of all Europe, that I cannot consent to his being held up to ridicule without being compromised myself. If you cover him with disgrace, I shall certainly be ridiculed; and, if I suffer that, I cause a real scandal: I shall be blamed for it, and all the nobility of this country will experience a mortification, which will be imputed to my forbearance. I beg you will consider these circumstances, and see what I can expect from your friendship, and what you owe to mine, and to reason. I know what it costs an author to sacrifice one of his works,—above all, when it is filled with happy ideas, and when the details are as agreeable as they are ingenious; but who ought to care less than yourself for a sacrifice of this sort? A thing which would be irreparable for any other person, is nothing to Voltaire,—a man who, above all others in the world, has the most fruitful and the finest genius. You are so rich, both in ideas and talents. Your glory is established by so many more important productions! And what do you want besides, but the wish to make as many more worthy of yourself? You must not doubt, nevertheless, that, in sacrificing the work in question, you will give me a proof of friendship, which, according to the circumstances, I shall so much the more appreciate. I do not hesitate in telling you, that you will render me one of the greatest services. Depend upon it, I shall never forget it. You may, on your side, expect every thing from my friendship.”—“Well,” answered Voltaire, “I will bring the manuscript of my Doctor Akakia, and place it in the hands and at the disposal of your Majesty. I have always been too much devoted to your Majesty, not to sacrifice, to the assurance of your kindness, that little revenge which had appeared to me just, moderate, and consequently innocent. I should certainly make greater sacrifices, if they were required from me by your wishes.”—“Lose no time,” said the King, “I shall wait for you; such noble designs must not be postponed.” Voltaire went out, and came back immediately with his manuscript in his hand. “Sire,” he exclaimed smiling, “here is the innocent going to perish for the people! I put it into your hands, order its condemnation.”—“Ah, my friend, what fate is mine! to order a punishment for that which deserves to be crowned with glory. Well! let us submit to fate with dignity; let us be as just as possible; let us revenge the victim by its sacrifice. Read; I shall save what I can, and it will be a precious remainder, which my memory will keep with care; read, and may the pages devoured by the flames claim my just admiration. O Vulcan! never was a more memorable thing done, or a greater tribute paid to your honour.” Voltaire read the whole satire; he was every moment interrupted by the applauses of the monarch, who found all the attacks as lively as they were well applied; they were bursting into roars of laughter, and as they were going to throw it into the fire, the lamentations again burst forth: “Come, my friend, cheer up, since it is necessary, O Vulcan, cruel and devouring god, receive thy prey!” and while the book was burning, they performed fantastic dances round the fire. It was in this way that Doctor Akakia was read to the end, and burnt!

From the selections we have already made, it is evident that the work before us is not entitled to the character of a biography of Voltaire. The author, indeed, seems to be acquainted with little more of Voltaire's works than the title-pages; for out of seventy volumes, he cannot find one page worth quoting, to give us an idea either of the excellencies or the faults of his author; there is not a single criticism on any of his numerous productions. Voltaire has been highly praised and severely censured, and Mr. Standish leaves the question where he found it. He neither tells us the object nor the results of the works of Voltaire, though they have had a more powerful effect on public opinion on the continent, than all the works published in the 18th century. Is Voltaire to be condemned or praised? Do his principles lead to the support or the dissolution of society? Were they instrumental in producing the French revolution, or is such an effect falsely attributed to them? On all these points, Mr. Standish leaves us totally in the dark;—he does not even consider them connected with his subject.

Even in what he does, his esteem for Voltaire is very equivocal, as he frequently cites M. Lépau, whose falsehoods and ridiculous commentaries on Voltaire, have rendered him the laughing-stock of all France. Besides, from a biographer of Voltaire, we might have expected more interesting details of the noble moral acts and courageous humanity which distinguished him; but the defence of Calas, of Sirven, of the serfs of Mont Jura, occupy no more space than the most trivial anecdote. Did Belle et Bonne merit no other notice than that Voltaire married her to the Marquis de Villette? Why have concealed the fact so honourable to Voltaire, of his having given her six thousand guineas as a marriage portion, (160,000 francs.) This distinguished lady is still alive, and enjoys excellent health; and we have seen her shed tears of gratitude and affection at the bare mention of the name of her benefactor.

Odes and other Poems. By Henry Neele. Second Edition, with Additions. 12mo. pp. 228. London, 1821.

The first edition of Mr. Neele's Poems appeared before the commencement of the Literary Chronicle, and we have now only to add our testimony of their merits to that of the critics and the public in general. Mr. Neele, we believe, is still a youthful bard, and many of his productions were written at a very early age. He possesses great energy of feeling and a vigorous conception, but a deep melancholy pervades, we had almost said tinges, most of his effusions. In this respect, he will remind the reader very much of Collins, and that early blasted blossom of the muse, Henry Kirk White. His odes strongly resemble the celebrated one of Collins, to whom he is second only in this species of writing. We select, as a first extract, his second ode, which is addressed—

TO HOPE.

Sun of another world, whose rays
At distance gladdens ours;
Soul of a happier sphere, whose praise
Surpasses mortal powers;
Mysterious feeling, taught to roll
Restless o'er the breast,
Beyond ambience, above controul,
The strangest, sweetest of the soul,
Possessing, not possess.

Deceiver, bail! around whose throne
Such numerous votaries bend;

The form to all but thee unknown,
The wretch without a friend:
Youth, when his cherish'd best is dead,
Makes what is living thine;
Age, hoping when his all is fled,
Still totters on with eager tread,
And dies before thy shrine.

Yet what art thou? a tott'ring ball
That crumbles while we walk;
A flower so soon decreed to fall,
And wither on its stalk;
A gather'd rose-bud, but that pride
Of crimson o'er it spread,
Thine own life-blood's precious tide,
That as we pluck'd it, gushing wide,
Has dyed the pale flower red.

'Tis all a dream! the forms we love
Eldre the eager clasp;
The pleasures that we long to prove Vanish within the grasp;
They're disappointment, death, despair,
Aught but the good they seem;
We love, we hate, we joy, we care,
And hope is sweet, and life is fair,
And yet — 'tis all a dream!

A fiend is sitting on our heart,
We slumber thro' the night,
And every heave, and every start,
He marks with fierce delight:
'Tis death: he loves his watch to keep
By life's decreasing stream,
And soon in thrilling accents deep,
His potent call shall burst our sleep,
And prove it all a dream!

Yet wherefore mourn? since Hope at best,
Thou' fair, was always vain;
Her promises were ever rest,
Her guerdons ever pain:
Why mourn the absence of that light,
That only led astray?
It lur'd the steps, perplex'd the sight,
And yet 'twas bright, 'twas wondrous bright,
And gilded all the way.

Yes; he who roams in deserts bare,
That were not always wide,
Will sigh to think how sweetly there
Full many a flow'ret smil'd;
Will pause to mark th' uncherish'd beam,
The tree uprooted torn,
And sit, immers'd in pensive dream,
By many a now deserted stream,
To meditate and mourn.

The odes to Time, to Memory, to Horror, to Despair, to Pity, to the Moon, and to the Harp, though varied in their imagery and their style, are not less beautiful, and we fully agree in the compliment paid to the author by an individual whose name is dear to English literature,—that Mr. Neele 'sacrifices at the shrines both of pity and terror, and his notes awakening fear are not less potent than those which call forth the tears of sympathy and sorrow.' The ode to the Moon strikes us as singularly happy. It is in blank verse, a species of metre in which our author is peculiarly successful. We quote it at length:—

TO THE MOON.

How beautiful on yonder casement pane
The mild Moon gazes! Mark
With what a lonely and majestic step
She treads the heavenly hills;

And oh! how soft, how silently, she pours
Her chausten'd radiance on the scene below,
And hill, and dale, and tow'r,
Drink the pure flood of light.

Roll on, roll thou, Queen of the midnight hour,
For ever beautiful!
And ill befall the Demon of the Storm,
When he would seize on thee;
When he would lay a hand unbidden here,
Breathe pestilential darkness in thy face,
And read those lucid robes,
And touch that silvery hair.

Thou shinest on a world of wretchedness,
On one vast sepulchre,
Where man is dancing on his father's grave,
And of the creeping worms,
That crawl innumerable from his father's mould;
The fool is forming rings to deck himself,
And round his fingers twines
The coiling slinky brood.

Yes, man is wasting life and hope away,
To add a wig to time;
(Whom nature gave but one, of small avail),
And when the work's complete,
When his well-dressed companion soars away,
O then man gazes wild and vacantly,
With idiot stare around,
And wonders how he flew!

Although thou lookest on such misery,
All has not dimm'd thy ray,
Or torn one silver ringle from thy brow;
And yet thy peaceful light
Beaming such beauty on a world of woe,
Is like the bloom upon Consumption's cheek,
All loveliness without,
While ruin gnaws within.

What art thou? from thy orbit come those hordes
Of wild fantastic forms,
(Their crowns of pearly evening dew, their robes Wrought by the gossamer),
Who sport beneath thy beam? or is it there
That angels strike their silver harps, and call
The listening spheres around,
To join the mazy dance?

Perhaps thou art the future residence
Of genius, wretched here:
Perhaps the poet and the minstrel who
Have suffer'd, sunk, and died,
Released from mortal shackles, flee to thee,
And warbling soft spirit melodies,
Their gentle serics rove
At peace in thy mild sphere.

If so, O for some lunar paradise
Where I may think no more
Of earth and earthliness, unless, perchance,
When evening glooms below,
Sometimes to wander downward on thy beam
To fit across the scenes I once admird,
And hover and protect
The heads of those I lov'd!

Mr. Neele's sonnets partake of the character of the odes; but, as sonnets, they are of a very superior description. The following appears, to us, to possess much beauty, and the idea to be perfectly original:—

'Traveller, as roaming o'er vales and steep,
Thou hast, perchance, beheld in foliage fair,
A willow bending o'er a brook—it weeps
Leaf after leaf into the stream, till bare Are the best boughs, the loveliest and the highest;
Oh! sigh, for well thou mayest; yet, as thou sighest,

Think not 'tis o'er imaginary woe;
I tell thee, traveller, such is mortal man,
And so he hangs o'er fancied bliss, and so
While life is verging to its shortest span,
Drop one by one his dearest joys away,
Till hope is but the ghost of something fair,
Till joy is mockery, till life is care,
Till be himself is unreflecting clay.'

The additional poems, which have been written since the first edition, fully justify the high poetical character which the author had obtained; we shall, therefore, without further comment, transfer three or four of them to our pages.—

• SONG.

Love, like a bird born in a cage,
In bondage gaily sings,
Nor sighs to rove, but prizes more
His fetters than his wings.
Then do not strive those chains to break,
Tho' lighter than a feather—
They're twined so closely round the heart,
That both must break together.'

The following stanzas, written soon after the death of Portier, the gallant Spaniard, who attempted that reform which his country has since so gloriously obtained, possess peculiar interest at the present moment:—

'And think they, then, in blood to quench
Freedom's a mortal life!
Furn, pour on, with torrents drench,
It blazes fiercer, higher!
Think they that cease, with vigour rise,
Fleets with the patriot's breath?
That cease, unaided love by his life,
Grows holy in his death.'

Think they that when the spirit leaves,
Its power o'er earth is past?
Of all the spells that spirit weaves,
The mightiest is the last.

Nay, hearts with strength before unknown
At that last hour awake,
Like waves that roll in darkness on,
Yet sparkle when they break.

But liberty, the child of truth,
Dies not with mortal man;
She, eagle-like, renews her youth,
And scorns life's narrow span:
And when the world's blind tyrants deem
The princely bird no more,
She soars tow'rd's light's supernal beam,
Undimmed as before.

Still Hope survives—the tyrant's chain
Has many a link unbroken:
Tears are not always shed in vain,
But blood appeals to heaven.

Still there are hearts by honour nursed,
And Freedom soon shall find them,
Hunts whose indignant throbs will burst
The galling bonds that bind them.'

'Oliver Cromwell's last intercourse with his daughter,' a dramatic fragment, proves the varied talents of the author; but we have already drawn so freely on his little work, that we must conclude with a shorter extract. The lines:—

• TO THE RIVER WYE.

Sweet stream! twelve lingering moons have waded
Since last thy lovely shores I gained;

And now once more I hear thee sound
Thy summons to the hills around;
And see thee rushing proudly by
In all thy mountain majesty,
And scent those gales which o'er thee play
A life of fragrant way;
And mark the rack by zephyr driven,
And listen to the voice of heaven.

Hail thy green pastures, queen of floods,
Thy rocky steeps, thy waving woods!
The mountain-ash, in glittering ranks,
With autumn berries decks thy banks;
There the aspiring fir distils
His balmy sweetness o'er the hills;
There weeps the lovely birch, and keeps
The eye delighted as she weeps;
While by thy mirror, bright and fair,
The willow trims her tangled hair.

Nature and art combine to grace
Thy green and gorgeous dwelling-place.
Thou rich clad hills, earth's fairest birth,
Yet seem to scorn thy mother earth,
And search the breast of heaven to woo
Its brightness down to grace thee too;
And ivied fane and shattered pile
Even in their ruin o'er thee smile,
While with the spoils of time they dress
Thy own immortal loveliness.

How softly now frail vessel glides
Between thy rich and fertile meads!
Earth's fairest scenes are round her spread,
Heaven's brightest glories o'er her shed;
While gloves in the transparent Wye
Another earth, another sky,
And turrets frown, and villas gleam,
Making that lovely vessel seem
Some fast isthmus, placed to join
Two worlds of splendour so divine.

While Morning from her tresses grey
Still shakes her dewy drops away;
Or Noon's or Evening's steps I see,
Sweet Wye! I'll still remember thee:
Nor less when Night her empire boasts,
And glories in those glittering hosts,
Not gems as mortals idly deem,
Which on her sable mantle gleam,
But portals bright, thro' which is given
A glimpse of the full blaze of heaven.'

We should not add a single remark to what we have already said, but to express our gratification, that neither the consciousness of his own talents, nor the public approbation, have tainted Mr. Neele with the poet's failing,—vanity; but that he is as modest and unassuming as when he first ventured his frail bark on the ocean of public opinion.

The Substance of a Discourse preached in St. Mark's Church, Liverpool, with additional Notes and an Appendix. By the Rev. Richard Blacow, A.M. 8vo. pp. 32. Liverpool and London, 1820.

As this Discourse is professed to have been delivered 'on the Aspect of the Times,' we hastily separated its pages, promising ourselves an hour's improvement in our closet, and afterwards to distribute it round our fireside for the consolation of our better selves—the feminine part of our family; but we were disappointed, and we are sorry that we cannot even venture to make an extract, though from a sermon, to instruct our readers. We are not told whether the ladies of Liverpool relished this Discourse at its delivery; but of this we are sure,—the dissenters, the socinians, and the methodists, who are so violently abused from the pulpit, and afterwards from the press, by this political and prophetic divine,—are either very dangerous persons or undeserving of Sunday evening lectures, which ought to disseminate, by practical doctrines, wholesome precepts and zealous examples. A preacher of the Gospel is never more out of his element than when he writes, preaches, and publishes his sermons, with the view of circulating his political and anti-religious creed*, and, whatever temporal honours he may hope to gain by his efforts, they are but temporal, and 'as the sounding brass or tinkling cymbal.' While we would give every writer an opportunity of presenting his particular opinions through the press, we do think it injurious to the cause of real religion, and unworthy of her advocates, to deliver them from the pulpit.

Commodus. A Tragedy, in Five Acts. With Biographical Memoirs of that accomplished Tyrant. 8vo. pp. 62. London, 1820.

We have seldom approached the last page of a work with such a feeling of utter despair, as we experienced when we found our fingers playing with the last leaves of this (to us serious) tragedy. In vain had we toiled through a tract flat and barren, in the hope of catching sight of something worth making a remark upon, and to find, that at last we should have nothing to recompense our readers for the time we had lost in the task (we say to recompense our readers, for our time is their's) was pushing critical desperation to its utmost stretch.

The tragedy of Commodus, we (not the public, for the information is in MS. on the fly-leaf) are told, was 'presented and approved by one of the theatres royal, but it was not allowed to be performed.' It may be so; we cannot contradict it; but, to find it true would give us a much more contemptible opinion of theatrical management than we are willing to entertain.

* The violent doctrines of the Discourse under notice, have induced the Times, Morning Chronicle, and other popular newspapers, to hold forth the reverend author as a fit subject for criminal prosecution.

The tragedy, whether considered as to the choice of the subject, the plot, incident, or language, is not entitled to the slightest praise. What motive the author had in publishing it we know not. As he has concealed his name his reputation cannot suffer; but, as the tragedy is said to be 'printed for the author, we will not answer for his purse. We should be sorry to be severe on any writer, but particularly on a young one, yet we cannot avoid censuring the vanity of those who attempt an effort so noble as that of writing a tragedy, without the slightest qualification for the task.

Foreign Literature.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE

ARTS AND SCIENCES IN FRANCE.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—I do not know whether the great difference between the English and the French Governments has been stated relative to the encouragement afforded to whatever can conduce to the interest or fame of the country. In England, the government throws a damp on every effort of genius; and, not proposed by one of its own creatures, the greatest discovery may remain dormant for want of the slightest encouragement. In France, on the contrary, the King, the royal Family, and the ministry, each in his department, not only encourage but invite the efforts of genius: and if a person has conceived a happy idea, likely to be of public utility, he has only to communicate it to the Minister, who refers to a Secret Committee, not appointed ad hoc, but a permanent one charged with the examination of all projects for the public good, and composed of men the most eminent for their learning and practical knowledge in every art and science. If the project be found useful, government affords the means of carrying it into execution. M. De Cazes, if not the founder of this system, was at least the great encourager of it; he nominated several committees for commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, with salaries, and the system has been continued by his successors.

The liberality of the government does not rest here: it is anxious the public should be in possession of every thing relative to the glory of the country. You know the grand work in Egypt, on which the most learned men and the most able artists in Europe have been employed so many years. A copy of this work cost nearly 400 guineas, and was, consequently, beyond the reach of most purchasers. Government had furnished all the funds for it, and, to enable others to possess the most splendid work in existence, it has granted to the famous printer, M. Panckoucke, the privilege of publishing a second edition, which will only come to eighty guineas. An octavo volume of text, with twenty-eight plates, will be sold for 6s. and the grand Atlas, in numbers of five immense folio plates, at 8s. 6d.—the mere cost of paper and printing. I will, with your permission, send you an account of the contents of this important work as the volumes appear. Z.

Paris, Jan. 10th, 1821.

WELSH LANGUAGE.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—An article appears in your last number, under the head of 'English Language,' which is so inaccurate on one point, that I hope you will permit me to offer a few observations respecting it. And this I shall do with the less reluctance, as I am aware, that the mis-statement does not originate with myself.

The part of the article to which I particularly allude, is that relating to the Welsh tongue, upon which subject I feel myself qualified to speak with some degree of confidence, from having, for some years past, paid considerable attention to it.

In the first place, the number of English words derived from the Welsh, stated to be 111 only, is exceedingly under-rated, perhaps by some hundreds. The fact seems to be, that numerous words, traced by English lexicographers to the Saxon tongue, originated in reality with the Welsh, from whom the Saxons not only received their alphabet, but, most probably, also some part of their language. But this does not rest upon mere conjecture, since a competent knowledge of Welsh enables us to discover the roots of many Saxon words in that tongue; and, had Johnson and others possessed even a moderate acquaintance with Welsh, they would not have committed the flagrant etymological errors, which at present disfigure their works.

I agree with that part of the article in question, which states, that the Welsh tongue is 'the most uncorrupted in Europe.' Of this there can be no doubt; and the circumstance may be ascribed both to the isolated situation of Wales and to the character of the language itself, which is of a principle so different from that of other modern tongues, as hardly to admit of the least intermixture with it. But, when the article proceeds to assert, that Welsh, because the most uncorrupted, is therefore the worst, I beg leave to deny the conclusion, as most 'lame and impotent,' inasmuch as the converse of the same proposition would prove the most corrupted to be the best. But the assumption, in this case, can only have been founded in a total ignorance of the Welsh language, which, whether for its copiousness, its expressiveness, or its poetical capabilities, has no rival in any living European tongue, with which I am acquainted.

After what I have now said, it is hardly necessary for me to notice the assertion, immediately following the last, which charges the Welsh with being 'harsh and guttural, and of a very limited range.' The truth is, that it is by no means a harsh language, and possesses fewer guttural sounds than most others. The sounds, most generally prevailing, are the lingual, labial, and palatal: even the dental, which are really harsh sounds, are not at all of frequent occurrence in it. And to this I may add, that it possesses an unusual proportion of vowels and diphthongs. With respect to its 'limited range,' I am quite at a loss to conceive upon what the writer of the article could found his assertion. The language comprises some thousand words more than the English, as a reference to Owen's Dictionary will sufficiently prove: and the faculty it possesses, of forming compound terms on the principle of the Greek, is illimitable.

I beg, in conclusion, to notice, that the Welsh is presumed by the best scholars to be, in fact, the ancient Cimbric, or, at least, to form the most perfect remains of that venerable tongue now in existence. And it is rather a singular confirmation of this hypothesis, that the Welsh call their language Cymraeg, and themselves Cymry, a name, that is clearly to be identified with the Cimbri and Commeri of former times, all which terms imply, according to the etymology still preserved in the Welsh name, a primitive or aboriginal people.

ORDOVEX.

SOCIETY FOR RECOVERING ESTATES.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Two or three letters having appeared in a daily print, in reference to 'the formation of a society with the view of assisting individuals by legal process to recover their estates which have been enjoyed by others not entitled to them,' I would call the attention of your readers and correspondents to the subject, and, through your respectable pages, suggest an eligible plan, in which I am desirous to unite; for I could enumerate several instances of families who have lived in a state of poverty, when, if they had had legal assistance, they might have shared the comforts of independence.

Your's, respectfully,

ARTIFICIAL COALS.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Although the present winter, so far as it has advanced, has not been so severe as to require any extraordinary demand of fuel, yet as some of the daily papers have, during the last week, given an account of a substitute for coals, I beg leave, through the medium of the Literary Chronicle, to make known to the public, a similar plan which was published nearly two centuries ago. In the course of my researches at the British Museum, for a very different purpose, I met with a tract entitled, 'Artificial Fire, or Coals for Rich and Poore. This being the offer of an excellent new Invention, by Mr. Richard Gesling, Engineer, (late deceased,) but now fit to be put in practice. London, 1644.'

This tract, which is printed on an open sheet, laments the want of fuel among the lower orders in winter, which it stated to be so great, as 'to make some turne thieves that never stole before, steal posts, seats, benches from doores, rails, nay, the very stocks that should punish them, and all to keep cold winter away.' The remedy proposed is as follows:—

'First provide a piece of ground where the sun lies upon it, and for the better ordering, take a brickmaker or a labourer to do it: do thus:—

'Take three loads of red mortar, such as you make bricks with, double loads, half a chaldron of good sea coals, of the smallest and best, three sackfuls of the best small coal, four bushels of sawdust, four trusses of straw chopped; work all these together with water, stiff as bricks, then, when it is worked all together very well, take four sacks of the dust of small coal, and with that used as they do the sand for casting of brick; then cast the ingredient as you cast brick, but half so thick, and dry it as brick is dried; or you may make it up in round balls, not so big, with charcoal or small coal dust on the outside, and so lay to dry; when they be thoroughly dry, burn them with a little Scotch coal or wood, or any combustible matter to fire it; or with two or three wooden chips to kindle your fire withall, and to keep in the life of the fire, and these cast a most excellent heat, and keep fire for any use, to roast, boil, or bake, for the richer sort; but be sure you lay them not too close on the fire, but as you see your pattern* upon this paper, mingled with a Scotch coale of two.

*For the poorer sort, cow-dung, mingled with sawdust and small coal, made up into balls, or in a square, like a tile, not too thick, and dried, make a very good fuel, but something noisome. Also that which comes out of the paunches of beasts killed, it being dried, is excellent fire.

'Horse-dung in balls with sawdust, or the dust of small coal or charcoal dust, dried, is good fuel, but the smell is offensive.

'Greenwich Heath or Hounslow Heath turf, well dried, is very good fuel, with a little Scotch coal burnt with it.

'Peat, if well dried, but well fattened with seggy or flag roots, from fenny places, is a very good firing mingled with coals when it is burnt.'

I am very far, Mr. Editor, from thinking this plan of service to your general readers, but in Lincolnshire, and some counties where coals are dear, and beyond the reach of the poor for general consumption, these hints may be of some service.

I am, &c. B. T.

THE SALUTATIONS OF THE JEWS AT THEIR FEASTS. (FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

'Come kiss me sweet and twenty.'—Shakespeare.

The salutations of the Jews were testified either by words or some humble gesture of the body. When by words, these were the usual forms: 'The Lord be with you!' or, 'the Lord bless you!' From the last of these, blessing is often taken for saluting: 'If thou meet any, bless him not; or if any bless thee, answer him not again.' Sometimes they said, 'Peace be unto thee!' 'Peace be upon thee!' 'Go in peace,' and such like. 'When ye come into a house, salute the same; and, 'if the house be worthy, let your peace come upon it, but if it be not worthy, let your peace return to you.'

* An engraved diagram of a grate, with the bricks and balls piled up, in which there is nothing remarkable, but that the bars of the grate are perpendicular, and not transverse, as in the present day.

By Gesture.—Their salutations were signified, sometimes, by prostrating the whole body; sometimes, by kissing the feet; commonly, by an ordinary kiss. Moses went out to meet his father-in-law, and did obeisance and kissed him. Moreover, Joseph kissed all his brethren, and wept upon them. This Saint Paul calls an holy kiss; Peter, a kiss of charity; Tertullian, osculum pacis, a kiss of peace. These were kisses a Cato might give and a Vestal receive. Of this sort, the Jews had three kinds,—a kiss of salutation, a kiss of valediction, and a kiss of homage; or, as the Hebrew signifies, a kiss of state or dignity, to testify their homage and acknowledgment of their king's sovereignty. Samuel took a vial of oil and poured it upon Saul's head and kissed him, which is referred to in the second psalm, 'kiss thy son, lest he be angry.'

THE NOSE.

A TALE.

'Twas evening, and the setting sun
His farewell glance was giving,
When Hal and Joe, quite ripe for fun,
And eager to observe the living,
Tripping fast the pathway o'er—
Seated themselves outside the door,
And soon began
To mark each man
That nature had mark'd before.
Each took his pipe, and whiff'd away,
Moistening well, with ale, his clay,
Then talk'd of ladies' lovely eyes,
And then of cheeks of roses;—
Till, at the last,
Their converse past
To what, indeed, must all surprise,—
Of large and little noses!

Now Joe, a curious one had got,
A nose without a bridge; and so
The tip cock'd up, as if, I wot,
To view his eyes roll to and fro,
Spurning the mouth that laugh'd below.

Cried Hal to Joe,
What think you now of that one's nose?
He look'd and laugh'd—for you must know,
It from his eye-brow stately rose

Round as sickle. Then came one Who caus'd the 'gay ones' greater fun:
'Twas round and ruddy—cover'd o'er
With fifty little bills or more,
And look'd just like an artichoke,
When people say—'tis full of eyes.'—
And O! they deem'd it was a joke
Philosophers could not despise.

'Come tell me now,' said Hal to Joe,
'Before I go,—
(And my house is from, this a long way!)—
What sort of nose do you prefer?
For, were I to choose, I tell you, sir,
A hook'd one would, methinks, be best.'
'Indeed!' cried Joe, quite full of jest—
'A hook'd one, ay!—Then I am blest!
For look ye mine is hook'd you know:—
But then, ha! ha!—'tis hook'd the wrong way.' WILFORD.

TO THE SUN.

O! thou that from Heav'n's azure field,
Dispelst all the mists of night,
Round as the warrior's ample shield,
Whence is thy everlasting light?
When, from the portals of the east,
Thou comest in all thy majesty,
The trembling planets sink to rest,
The stars before thy splendour fly,
The moon, herself, grows cold and pale,
And sinks beneath the western wave.
But thou—O Sun!—shalt never fail,
Till Nature sinks into her grave.
Lo! when the winds of Heav'n are loud,
When lightning flies in awful form,
Thou lookest from behind a cloud
And laughest at the empty storm;
But thou, O Sun! perhaps, like me,
Art lent but for a season here,
The sleep of Death may come on thee,
No more the voice of morn to hear.
Exult! resplendent orb of light!
While yet thy youth knows no decay;
Age is unlovely—dark as night—
And youth returns not, when away.

KINGS OF THE BEAN*.

(A FREE TRANSLATION.)

THE day is auspicious to me,
On the throne I am borne with delight;
Come, my friends, and rejoice in that glie
Which my royalty gives me to-night:
My reign's but a dream that is gay;
Prolong happy sleep so serene;
For soon you'll awake me from pleasure, and say,—
'Thou wast only a King of the Bean!'
We may often behold on the scene,
Historical heroes of fame;
But Melpomene's children are e'en
Of these kings but the shadow and name:
When the pictures are perfect and just,
The allusion disperses in shewn,
And kings, though exalted to greatness and trust,
Are no more than as Kings of the Bean.
If the blessing is found on the throne,
I will play in these moments so free;
But, if glory about me have shone,
To conceal the true picture from me,
When I look to the skies I exclaim,—
'These king who in pride I have seen,
To the kings of the universe vanish in fame:
What are they?—of the Kings of the Bean.'

Fine Arts.

ESSAY I.

'Whatever adorns
The princely dome, the column and the arch,
The breathing marbles and the sculptured gold.' ARENSIDE.
'Do you imagine that what is good is not beautiful?' 'Have you not observed that these appearances always coincide?' Such are the questions which Xenophon has recorded as those of his master, the divine Socrates; such too are the questions which we may be allowed to put to those, who would degrade the Fine Arts to the base office of the panders of luxury and licentiousness, though they are in reality the graces who attire in fresh and attractive charms, the Venus of Virtue, and who, by the extraneous ornaments which they lend her, afford new motives to prompt the mind of man 'to high heroic deeds and fair desires.'
They have, at times, indeed, been seduced from their allegiance; they have been bribed, to paint in more glowing beauty, the mask that conceals the de-formity of vice; they have, by their siren strains and angel forms, lured the unsuspecting voyager of life over the ocean of excess to the rocks of misery and guilt. But let him, who, on this account, would discard them from polished life, shew us the human good that has never been abused, and we will acquiesce in his opinions.—Let the enemy of the polished elegancies of life, prove to us that the greatest gift of God to man, religion, has not been perverted to the anomalies of superstition and the cruelties of bigotry; and, if in spite of history and fact, he shall be able to prove this, then he may be at liberty to discard the arts of civilization, as liable to be turned aside to purposes for which they never were intended; then let the καλοκαγαθία of the At-tican philosopher be thrown aside, and the barbarous bigotry and ignorance of an Omar be planted in its stead.
Then, too, let the palm be torn from the brow of our great delineator of human nature; for he has declared that 'he who hath not music in his soul, and is not pleased with concord of 'sweet sounds, is fit for murders, stratagems, and spoils.' But the world is not doomed to gaze with terror on the death-struggle of the arts, or the destruction of the Corinthian capital of society. The age of Cromwell is passed away—our country is not destined again to behold the softer elegancies of life crumble beneath the rude touch of prejudice and fanaticism;

nor all the fairy frost-work of polished refinement to melt at the glare of the red torch of Gothic superstition and intolerance. The world seems rather to be inclining to the opposite extreme of infidelity. At any rate, the arts, we may venture to hope, will have nothing to fear; unless it is the perversion of their excellencies to purposes unworthy of their divine origin. The liberty of our own glorious constitution will not withhold its enlivening influence from those accomplishments of life which dignify, support, and adorn the national character of a powerful empire. We will indulge in the hope that she will spread her protecting wings over the germs of art, and the diffidence of genius; and that our country, which has already gained the wreath of naval glory, which was once the crown of Athens, may hereafter rival her in the developings of genius and the encouragements of art. The nautical fame, the warlike achievements of Athens have passed away, and
'like the baseless fabric of a vision, leave not a wreck behind,' save the narration 'that they were.' Her arts, her sculpture, her architecture, still exist, 'in spite of cormorant devouring time.' The nations still send forth their pilgrims to the shrine of her Minerva; with patient assiduity they trace each record of skill, each bright animated relique of genius; where the marble still breathes life and vigour from each mutilated limb, justifying the application of Horace's remark on a sister art;—

'In venias etiam disiecti membra poeta.'

Her 'painted Stoa,' her sculptured temples, glowing with the heroic deeds of a Theseus, a Codrus, a Miltiades, were the means which

'Raised
To height of noblest temper heroes old
Arming to battle; and, instead of rage,
Deliberate valour breathed firm and unmoved,
With dread of death to fight and foul retreat.'

In Athens, the sculpture and the painter were employed to perpetuate the memory of illustrious men and illustrious feats; and the representation of whatever had been achieved for the service of the public by heroic virtue, was preserved in the public buildings and the monuments of the dead; and the encouragement of these arts, in the metropolis of Greece, with the effects which they naturally produced, fully indicate the necessity, or at least the utility which accrues to the state from the cultivation and fostering of taste and genius in its individual members.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—Miss WILSON.—'Old Drury,' had its triumph on Thursday, in one of the most crowded and elegant audiences we ever witnessed; and in the debut of a young lady who is one of the greatest acquisitions that the musical world has received for many years. Miss Wilson, for that is the name of the young lady, came forward with a royal imprimatur: his present Majesty, whose knowledge of music is, perhaps, equal to that of any of his subjects, having spoken in the highest terms of her talents. Ever since she was announced, public expectation had been on the tiptoe, and we never saw an audience look so anxiously for the rising of the curtain as on Thursday night, when Miss Wilson made her first appearance in the character of Mandane, in the opera of Artaxerxes. Independent of this novelty, the opera presented great attractions: Braham in Arbaces, Horn in Artabanus, and Madame Vestris in Artaxerxes. An opera thus cast gave a powerful aid to the fair debutante, who, on her entrance, was welcomed with a burst of applause which overwhelmed her; and her trepidation was, for some time, evident. Miss Wilson, in person, is rather tall, but graceful and elegant; her countenance is agreeable and expressive; her voice is powerful, and, in compass, nearly equal to Catalini, of whom she often reminded us, as she did, in other respects, of Mrs. Billington. The character of Mandane is one in which the passions alternately swell in disdain, and melt into tenderness, touching, occasionally, on both extremes, and requiring a power of expression suitable to these vicissitudes. When she sung, 'If o'er the cruel Tyrant love,' she electrified the audience, who testified how they had been enraptured by an universal encore. In the beautiful airs of 'Fly soft ideas' and 'Let not rage,' she was equally happy, but her greatest triumph was her bravura singing in 'The soldier tired of war's alarms,' in which great power, rapidity of execution, and precision were delightfully combined. Although power is the predominant characteristic of Miss Wilson's voice, it possesses much softness and delicacy. She sometimes struck a low chord which was quite melodious, and soon after raised her voice to a key where, permitting it to rest awhile, it died away like an echo. She has also, in a remarkable degree, the power of ascending or descending the scale with rapidity and great distinctness; and, occasionally, she passed from one part of the scale to another, omitting the intermediate notes, with quickness and accuracy.

Mr. Braham, whom we have often seen and admired in Arbaces, never appeared to greater advantage. A collision of talent is always favourable to the best performers, and it was evident on the present occasion. Madame Vestris sang charmingly in Artaxerxes, and Miss Povey was a sweet Semira. We must not, however, forget Mr. Horn, who deserves much praise for the spirited style in which he acquitted himself in Artabanus: it was his first appearance in that character, and was marked by the audience as a very successful one. On the conclusion of the opera, the pit waved their hats amidst the loudest cheers of the whole audience. Miss Wilson's success was so great that Mr. Elliston has announced operas three nights a-week.

Sheridan's truly inimitable comedy of the School for Scandal, was performed at this theatre, on Tuesday night, with the novelty of two first appearances. Miss Chester, a young lady who, we believe, once played Portia at this house, was the Lady Teazle of the evening, and sustained the character with much judgment and discrimination. She was most successful in scenes which were serious and pathetic. Mr. Cooper was the Joseph Surface, and although, in some scenes, he acquitted himself well, yet we must confess that he is not a good hypocrite. Elliston's Charles Surface and Munden's Sir Peter Teazle are too familiar to the public to need any remark.

COVENT GARDEN.—Mr. Barry Cornwall's new tragedy of Mirandola has been frequently repeated since our last with increased success, and may be fairly said to be fully established in public favour.

COBURG THEATRE.—On Monday evening, a new melo-dramatic romance was produced, entitled—Who owns the Hand? or, The Monk, the Mask, and the Murderer. The piece has been got up with great splendour; the incidents are striking and well-announced, the scenery very good and appropriate, and the piece is interesting throughout. Mr. T. P. Cooke and Miss Watson performed the parts allotted them admirably well, and, indeed, the whole of the performers played with much spirit and effect.

MR. KEAN, IN AMERICA:

[Although we have no very exalted opinion of the critical acumen of our transatlantic brethren, yet to gratify those of our readers, who, like ourselves, are admirers of Mr. Kean's talents, we insert from a New York paper, entitled the American, a critical notice of two of that distinguished actor's best characters, those of Richard III. and Othello.—Ed.]

RICHARD III.—The character of Richard, we might readily imagine from his history, must be extremely difficult to be represented in any manner coming up to the peculiar traits that distinguished it; and though Shakespeare found in the groundwork of his character certain leading marks, in the delineation of which he particularly excelled, yet 'that mixture of intellectual vigour with moral depravity,' so conspicuous in the features of his life, and the different passions that actuated him at times, must ever make the part extremely difficult for a perfect execution, although the character has been most ably and happily portrayed. Many performers, who were at the height of their profession, and who excelled in characters in which it might be supposed success was more unattainable, have entirely failed in that of Richard. The part of Macbeth has been successfully personated by those who have entirely misconceived that of the crooked-backed tyrant. It was one of those characters the late Mr. Cooke particularly excelled in; it was that in which Garrick first appeared, and that which laid the foundation of the high standing which Mr. Kean has acquired in his own country, and the first in which he has appeared in our's. That Mr. Kean's performance of the character is original, is indisputable; it was so in England when he first appeared in it, and is clearly so to us. It is right, therefore, that we should throw aside any dislike we might have, on the ground of our being unaccustomed to the execution of the character as done in the manner of Mr. Kean. Indeed, in England, on his first appearance in Richard, there were considerable doubts as to his merits, for no other reason than that his performance was original. It is but justice to Mr. Kean, therefore, that, if he has hit upon a happier conception, according to his own belief, we should judge and criticise it with candour and fairness. Full of curiosity and anticipated pleasure, we went to witness Mr. Kean's first appearance on the American boards, and the following is the result of our observations: to speak generally, his figure and looks were well adapted to our ideas of the tyrannical Richard; his voice is not good, especially when he elevates it, when it breaks in the most disagreeable manner; and his delivery is new: every word comes forth as if it were measured in a slow method of speech he uses, which, as it was continued through all those scenes where it was possible to employ it, rendered it at length very tiresome, and by no means agreeable. We really thought, at times, that he was reading the part in his own closet, deep ly intent on the study of it, preparatory to his performance.

We agree with a London critic, that the 'courtship scene, with Lady Ann, is an admirable exhibition of smooth and smiling villainy;' but we witnessed not only in that scene attempts at stage effect, but repeatedly in the denouement of the plot. The apparent uneasy delivery of the sentences, if original, is certainly not pleasing, notwithstanding each word is expressed with great precision and distinctness; and although an English writer, (Mr. Haslitt,) 'cannot imagine,' as he observes, 'any character represented with greater distinctness and precision, more perfectly articulated in every part,' yet this 'perfect articulation,' distinctness, and precision, appear to us to be attended with a most uneasy way of delivery, there being too much an appearance of artificial manner. In repeated sentences, too, we observed a pause at the end of the word preceding the last, and after stopping a few seconds or so, pronouncing the last word. This was done, doubtless, in order to give effect to the whole. We took notice of this, we were about to say, in almost every scene he appeared. Another circumstance struck us, which more fully evinced the aim of the performer; it was those sudden transitions which were so strikingly displayed. It cannot be denied that some of them were powerfully and ably executed, where they were required; but in the words of one of his own critics, 'his delineation of it should have somewhat less brilliancy, fewer glancing lights, pointed transitions, and pantomimic evolutions, with more solidity, depth, sustained and impassioned feeling;' or, in other words, he seems to have at his command a variety of resources, in order to give a continual eclat to his performance, and he necessarily employed them, as in making those long pauses, quick transitions, and, among other things, as Mr. Haslitt, in his lectures, calls it, his 'exuberance of manner.' He gave a new reading to several passages, which much pleased us; and the manner of his bidding his friend 'good night,' was very striking, although we cannot but believe the long pause was more intended by Mr. Kean for effect, than for the display of any real talent he thought the idea possessed; we could mention several scenes in which he appeared to effect, and several in which effect was partially destroyed.—The American, Dec. 1, 1830.

Othello.—One of the peculiar traits in Mr. Kean's acting is seizing on the imagination by frequent, sudden, and striking changes; as from the highest key to which his voice is elevated, when in an ebullition of passion, down in a moment to either a soft or familiar tone, according as Mr. Kean conceives the particular passage requires. This, it is true, is very often applicable and conformable to the true spirit of the author, but that it is proper to make those 'pointed transitions' in all the particular places Mr. Kean has thought right to employ them, can scarcely be allowed, when we once come to consider the propriety or correctness of it. Two instances of misapplication in this respect, we observed in Mr. Kean's performance of Othello. The first, when Othello is before the senate, on the charge of Brabantio, that his daughter had been stolen, and 'corrupted by spells and medicines bought of mountebanks;' Othello requests the duke to send for Desdemona, and the duke gives orders to that effect; immediately after, indeed the words 'fetch Desdemona hither' had scarcely escaped the duke's lips, before Mr. Kean (Othello) says to Iago, in a hurried, quick, and unnatural tone and manner,—

'Ancient, conduct them; you best know the way.'

Othello, without doubt, was desirous of the immediate attendance of his wife, to clear him from the charge of Brabantio; but the tone he had employed before his judges in a preceding speech, being so dissimilar, could not at all reconcile us to the unsuitable effect the manner exercised in delivering the above words produced. This quick transition may force an applause from the sudden way in which they were spoken, and the tone and manner above mentioned, but never can be quoted as a specimen of fine acting. The other instance occurred in the same scene. After the conclusion of his defence before the senate, he observes,—

'Here comes the lady, let her witness it.'

The tone here used, was nearly similar to that before mentioned, and appeared to strike us more as if it were delivered tauntingly, or so spoken from malicious delight at Brabantio's certain defeat and his own sure acquittal, than the observation of the dignified Othello, who, though sure of success from Desdemona's presence, yet does not manifest any eager anticipation, which would leave an inference, that if the decision of the senate were in his favour, he would evince more malicious pleasure at it than proud satisfaction. From not only the different passions that take possession of the Moor, but from their constant collision, the character of Othello becomes one wherein the power of an actor can have full display. In the onset, we find him all fondness for the beautiful Desdemona; then the seeds of distrust are sown by the villain Iago; Iago's continual feeding of the fire he had kindled follows next; his surmise concerning Cassio, his infernal scheme with the handkerchief, and the warring conflicts between doating fondness and supposed dishonour, are imitatively delineated. Although the character of Othello possesses these great advantages for the display of the talents and genius of an actor, yet none can claim a perfect infallibility in an accurate conception of it; and that Mr. Kean does not enjoy this infallibility, and that he is by no means exempt from error, and those not unimportant or accidental, has appeared to us on a critical investigation of his merits and faults, and that, too, without any nice acumen or determination to pick out every little mistake or inaccuracy that may have been casually committed.

In the third scene of act third, Othello and Iago enter immediately after Cassio had been impugning Desdemona to procure of the Moor the restitution of his lieutenantcy. Desdemona begs of her husband to call back Cassio, and says,—

'Shall't be to-night at supper?

Oth. No; not to-night.

Des. To-morrow dinner, then?

Oth. I shall not dine at home;

I meet the captains at the citadel.'

The tone in which these answers were given, would lead to the belief that the previous exclamation of Iago, on seeing Cassio in entering the room, 'Ha! I like not that,' had already instilled into the mind of the Moor a distrustful feeling towards his wife. Any thing conducive to such belief, or that would in the least leave any suspicion of the sort, should be particularly avoided; for it is not until Desdemona has left the room in this same scene, when the Moor and Iago are left alone, that the former first receives an intimation of any thing to rouse his jealousy. But when Othello discovers the meaning of the ambiguous sentences of Iago, Mr. Kean gave an effect both striking and impressive; his looks, his action, and the wild stare of his countenance, were a splendid picture of the effects of jealousy on the heart of a Moor. The shock was electric, and Mr. Kean gave it full force. Indeed, the whole scene with Iago was ably executed, although we should not be displeased to see omitted those specimens of 'pantomimical evolutions,' performed not only in that scene, but frequently in other parts of the play, as we conceive that the effects from the supposed faithless conduct of a beautiful wife on a loving husband, can well be shown without them. When Iago observes to him, that she deceived her father marrying him, the reply, was uttered in a tone that evinced the anguish of his heart, and was feelingly and appropriately delivered. We felt a sympathetic thrill for his own unhappy situation. In the chamber scene we were much disappointed; it was a lame performance, and though, here and there, we could witness specimens of fine acting, we decidedly think we have seen that part of Othello at least as ably, if not better, executed. —The American, Dec. 1, 1820.

'And so she did.'

Literature and Science.

(From the National Intelligencer.)

Of the North-western region of the United States.—We were yesterday gratified with a few minutes conversation with Capt. J. R. Bell, who arrived in this city on Tuesday, from Cape Girardeau, in Missouri; which place he left on the 13th October last. The information derived from him was so interesting to us, that we believe our readers will be pleased with some account of it.

Capt. Bell was second in rank of an exploring expedition, under the command of Major Long, the objects of which were topographical and scientific information respecting the vast wilderness of country which stretches from the Council Bluffs, on the Missouri, to the foot of the Rocky Mountains, of which but little is yet known. The expedition, being wholly pacific in its objects, consisted of some 50 soldiers only, and the following officers and artists, besides the two officers already mentioned: Lieut. Graham, Lieut. Smith, Dr. Say, Dr. James, and Messrs. Seymour and Peale, designers and painters.

The expedition set out from the Council Bluffs, on the 6th of June, directing their course first to the Pawnee villages, on a Fork of the La Platte, distant about one hundred and twenty miles from the Council Bluffs, and thence proceeded to the Rocky Mountains, distant about four hundred miles from the Pawnee Villages. The interval is a rolling prairie country, of course destitute of hills and wood, so that the mountains are visible at the distance of one hundred and twenty miles. Time has not yet allowed a calculation of the observations, which were made as accurately as circumstances would allow, but it is supposed the greatest height of the ridge does not exceed the elevation of four thousand feet above the base of the mountain.

The expedition separated into two parties near the point on the Arkansas, designated on the maps as Pike's block house.

The one party, under the command of Maj. Long, proceeded thence with a view to strike the head waters of Red River. But, it appears, the maps which we have are very defective, the courses of the rivers being almost wholly conjectural, and often entirely fabulous. The expedition did not attain the object sought, because it was not to be found where it is laid down on the maps, and fell upon the waters of the Canadian fork of the Arkansas, which it pursued, and terminated its tour at Belle Point, on the Arkansas, the post mentioned in the late message of the President to Congress, as being the advanced post of our cordon in that direction.

The other party, under the command of Captain Bell, proceeded down the Arkansas to Belle Point, which place they reached on the 9th of Sept, after an absence of three months from the haunts of civilization.

Below the first fork of the Arkansas, which was named by Pike, they met several hunting parties of strange Indians, whose names even have rarely, if ever, been heard of before, belonging to the tribes of the Arrapahoes, the Kaakayas, the Kiawas, and the Chayennes. They are frequently, and perhaps at present, engaged in war with the Pawnees, Osages, and other tribes of whom we have some knowledge. Of the Indians met by our party none have ever been into our settlements. They appeared to be wholly ignorant of the existence of such a people as those of the United States, or indeed of the existence of any people of a fairer complexion than the inhabitants of Mexico, or the adjacent Spanish provinces, of whom, it appeared, they had some knowledge. Being made to understand the existence of such a government, its power, and its humane policy, as exemplified in its treatment of other Indian tribes, they expressed a great desire to be taken by the hand by the United States, and to place themselves under our protection.

The topographers, medical gentlemen, and painters, attached to this expedition, have collected abundant materials for correcting some of the gross errors in the received geography of this part of our country, for making important additions to medical botany, and to the stock of our geological knowledge of our own territory; and the painters have many interesting and valuable sketches of the prominent features of the country. Besides possessing the government of such information as was indispensable to judicious arrangements for the support and protection of the American population penetrating into that country, this expedition ought, and we hope will, form the subject of one of the most attractive works ever published in this country.

What struck us most impressively in this brief narrative was, that some thousand miles on this side of our utmost western boundary, or, in other words, about half way between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean, an exploring party has met with several tribes of men, the aborigines and proprietors of the soil of the country, who were ignorant, not only of the existence of the people of the United States, but of the existence of a race of white people! It gives us an awful idea of the magnificent extent of the domain of the republic.

LUCRETIUS.

Cornwall Coin.—At the sale of Dr. Disney's collection of coins, in 1817, a fifty-five shilling piece of Oliver Cromwell, and known by the name of Oliver's Broad, sold for 109l.

A potatoe merchant, in the neighbourhood of Corent Garden, a few years ago, found means of increasing his customers, through the dispersion of a printed handbill, in which he enumerated the different names of potatoes in different countries, such as Dr. Anthony's pills, Munster plums, Irish apricots, Dugarron almonds, Hibernian mandrake, Eastham Ginning, Windsor nutmegs, &c. and concluding with these lines, addressed to his countrymen:—

Vos Hiberni collocatis, Summum bonum in potatoes.

Bon Mot of his present Majesty.—His Majesty, when Prince of Wales, being present at a piquet party, in which Mr. Stepney and Mr. Church were opponents, the former gentleman went out for a king, but meeting with a disappointment, exclaimed with considerable warmth, 'By Jove, the King is against me;' to which his royal highness immediately replied, 'truly, Mr. Stepney, your case is piteable in the extreme, to have the King and Church against you; you cannot, therefore, hope to escape, but must suffer without benefit of clergy.'

Hogarth once entreated his friend Garrick to sit for his portrait, with which he complied; but while the painter was proceeding with his task, he mischievously altered his face, in a gradual change of features, so as to render the portrait perfectly unlike. Hogarth blamed the unlucky effort of his art, and began a second time, but with the same success. After getting out of temper, he essayed a third time, and did not discover the trick for some time. He then broke out into a most violent passion, and would have thrown his palette and pencils at the head of Garrick, if he had not made his escape from the variegated storm of colours that pursued him.

DOLBY'S PARLIAMENTARY REGISTER, Printed and Published at No. 299, Strand, will be resumed on the Meeting of Parliament, with entirely New Printing Materials; new cast-iron (Stanhope) Presses, New Type, &c. and worked on Fine Paper. Published, as heretofore, in Sixpenny Numbers, each Number Thirty-two Pages, closely Printed, and Stitched in a Wrapper; containing the fullest and most impartial Report of all the SPEECHES and PROCEEDINGS in Parliament. The Subscribers to this Work, and the Public, will recollect the violent termination of the late Session, and are fully aware of the peculiar circumstances under which the Legislature is about to resume its labours; to point out, therefore, the utility of this cheap and convenient record of its proceedings, is unnecessary.

MEDICAL RECORD.

This day is published,

THE THIRD NUMBER of the MEDICAL RECORD, containing communications, from Mons. Girard, on the use of the Volatile Alkali in curing drunkenness; and Dr. Weatherhead, on the Cæsarian operation; Review of Mr. Brodie's Introductory Lecture; cases of dropsy cured by the Meadow Saffron, &c. &c.

The object of this weekly publication is, to convey the earliest intelligence on whatever relates to the Profession.

It is printed in 4to. for the convenience of binding, containing sixteen columns, closely printed in a small neat type, and is conducted by a member of the Royal College of Physicians of London, assisted by several others, eminent in the Profession.

The Proprietors may be permitted to say, that this periodical Work offers to the Faculty all the advantages of a medical journal, by recording what is important in the different departments of medical science. Arrangements are made with several eminent foreign correspondents to furnish whatever occurs in the schools abroad; and no expense will be spared in town, to render this work as useful and interesting as possible.

As a vague schedule of contents, the following are a few of the subjects which this journal purposes, as occasion presents, to embrace:

A Critical Review of all New Medical Works.—Account of New Inventions, Theories, &c.—Original Cases and Communications.—Medical Metaphysics.—Detached Reviews of the Doctrines of the Ancients.—Excerpts from some of the most interesting articles in the foreign journals.—Medical Biography and Anecdotes.—Cases, &c. from the old writers, whose works, from their scarcity, do not find a place in every library.—Medical Botany, Chemical Discoveries, &c. &c. &c.

Amongst other advantages more especially peculiar to this undertaking, is, that it presents a select and appropriate opportunity to advertise medical books, published, preparing for, and in the press: courses of lectures as delivered at the different schools; partnerships or apprenticeships, practices to be disposed of, &c.—In this place the Proprietors beg to intimate that nothing relating to Empiricism shall ever disgrace the pages of their journal.

Printed and Published by C. Kerwood, at the Medical Record Office, John Street, Edgware Road, where, and at 355, Strand (two doors East of Exeter Change), and No. 8, King-street, Borough, Advertisements and Communications, post paid, are received.

Price, unstamped, 6d. Stamped, for the Country, 8d. or 9s. per quarter.

THE HISTORY OF NORTH WALES. By W. CATHRAL, assisted by several Gentlemen of Literary Distinction, Quarto, price 3s. Two Vols. will be published in Paris, every Six Weeks, and will be completed in Twenty-six Weeks. Each Part will be embellished with a Plate; the one now published, contains an accurate and well executed Engraving of Flint Castle.—Part II. embellished with a View of the Town of Denbigh. Large Paper Copies may likewise be had, price 4s. 6d. Part IV. will be published in a few days.

On the First of every Month, Price 1s.

THE CAMBIO-BRITON, a Monthly Miscellany, dedicated to the Interests of WALES, and more particularly designed to disseminate amongst strangers a correct knowledge of the History, Language, Antiquities, Manners, Poetry, and general Literature of that interesting portion of Great Britain.

The Numbers, already published, will be found to contain, amongst other matter, much rare information on the subjects above mentioned, and especially with reference to the ancient LITERARY REMAINS OF WALES, which are so little known, and are yet of a nature so interesting and so valuable.

It forms a principal object of The Cambio-Briton to furnish accurate translations of these, accompanied by illustrative remarks; and too much cannot be said of their importance, as they tend to elucidate the early History of this Island.

TO READERS & CORRESPONDENTS.

The favours of Eliza and J. R. P. in an early number.

Several communications, intended for insertion this week, have been displaced by our extended review of the new Romance of Kenilworth.

We hesitate in deciding on the 'Loves of O'Rourke and Miss Dyer,' unless we had the whole poem before us; but we fear it would not exactly suit us.

We cannot serve Don Saltero, but if he possesses any share of the spirit of the Knight of La Mancha, he will rescue his Dulcinea from the intrusions of the reverend sexagenarian.

We wish the Literary Chronicle to be distinguished by the variety as well as the interest of its pages; it is on this account that we must close the correspondence on 'Clerical Dandies.'

Review of New Books.

An Inquiry concerning the Power of Increase in the Numbers of Mankind, being an Answer to Mr. Malthus's Essay on that subject. By Wm. Godwin. London, 1820.

ONE of the most important questions which have occupied the attention of politicians within the last five and twenty years, is that which relates to the power of increase in the numbers of mankind. The question itself is by no means new, but its immediate importance originated with Mr. Malthus's Essay on Population. Few of our readers can stand in need of being reminded of the frightful doctrine there inculcated, and, unfortunately, too generally received, that no reform, moral or political, ought to be or can be introduced into society, on account of the premising tendency of mankind to increase beyond the limits of the means of subsistence; that against these limits mankind would ever be pressing hard, and that the reign of vice and misery must and would be universal and eternal. When it is considered what effect Mr. Malthus has produced in all parliamentary and social regulations, changing the very principles of political economy; and that an important revolution in these respects must follow upon his total discomfiture, the importance of the volume before us will be easily conceived. It is from the pen of one of the first moral philosophers of this age, and, in taking it up, few persons, however satisfied of the impossibility of their being shaken in their faith in Malthus, can doubt of receiving a considerable portion of instruction and delight from a production of the author of Political Justice.

Our limits do not admit of our entering very fully into the question at issue, or doing justice in our extracts, to the book before us. But it may be proper, though it is certainly painful to remark, with what facility the doctrines of Mr. Malthus found their way into the minds of a great portion of those persons who have an influence in the direction of our national concerns.

If an author, observes Mr. Godwin, in the beginning of the nineteenth century of the Christian era, comes forward to teach us a new creed, and to persuade us to abandon that which the concurrent wisdom of ages had taught us, he should surely not attempt to do this by the sole aid of a few dogmatical maxims, but should have gone through the annals of antiquity, and have shewn us where, in all famous nations and states, the evil crept in. The fact is completely against him. The fact is according to the evidence of all history, that population does not require the vigilance of governments to keep it down.

It was sufficient, however, for Mr. Malthus to assert, that population would increase if unchecked in a geometrical ratio, while the means of subsistence could not possibly be increased more rapidly than in an arithmetical ratio; it was sufficient for Mr. Malthus to assert this, for the assertion, to be credited by the class of persons to whom we have alluded. The ratios of increase were taken for granted, and there followed of course. Surely one might have supposed that a doctrine so new and so pregnant with important consequences, so disgusting by its selfishness, and so appalling by its cruelty; so lamentable if true, and so impious if false, would not have found a very hasty reception; on the contrary, that if it had not been sustained throughout by the most irrefragable proofs, so that not a part should exhibit the least sign of rottenness, it would have been promptly and utterly rejected, or at least, that it would not have caused us to swerve, in the slightest degree, from the old and established principles of charity and benevolence.

Such, however, was not the case, and hence, in a scientific contest like this, no man is bound to refute that which is not supported, any more than in law a defendant is compelled to prove a negative; and an assumption like that which formed the basis of Mr. Malthus's doctrine might have been suffered to stand for what it was worth, or at best have been met by counter-assumption.—Mr. Godwin, however, appears to have published his Enquiry purely in consideration of the effect which Mr. Malthus's doctrine, while uncontradicted, has had and continues to have upon our political regulations, affording, as it does, a plea for many of those oppressive measures to which our rulers are unhappily too prone.

The ground-work of Mr. Malthus is simply this; that in the United States of North America, the population has gone on doubling itself every twenty-five years for the last century and a half, and, as Mr. Malthus states, by procreation only. From this he concludes, that mankind have the power of increasing at this rate, and would every where so increase were they not restrained by vice and misery, whose operation is rendered necessary and unceasing by the slow rate at which the means of subsistence can be increased. Mr. Godwin takes up his pen to refute all this, but chiefly to shew that the authentic history of mankind in all ages add in all nations, as well as the principal laws with which we are acquainted relative to the propagation of the human species, go to prove the utter impossibility of such a regular and constant increase of population as that of the United States by procreation only. The author of the Enquiry shews, that in ancient times, under circumstances the most favourable to population that can be conceived, mankind never did increase at any thing like that rate, and in the first book takes an enlarged view of the population of Europe, Asia, Africa, and South America. Perhaps the strongest argument against Mr. Malthus's doctrine is afforded by the examples of Paraguay and Sparta. We give the following extract from this part of the book:—

Paraguay was a settlement formed by the Jesuits, in the interior of South America, on the banks of the Rio de la Plata. They were shocked, as it was natural that religious men, and men separated from the contagion of the world should be, at the atrocities acted by the Spaniards in this part of the world; and they formed a strenuous resolution to endeavour by an experiment of the utmost gentleness and humanity, to atone to the unhappy natives for the cruelties acted upon their countrymen in other parts of the continent. They took for their model the history of the happy constitution of Peru, under the rule of her Incas, and the whole transaction will redound to their immortal honour. Their establishment began about the year 1610, and the Jesuits were finally expelled from it, by authority of the King of Spain, in 1767.

“What Abbé Raynal says on the subject is so much to my purpose, that I shall do little more than transcribe it.

“It might be expected that mankind would have most extraordinarily multiplied themselves under a government where no individual was idle, and none were destroyed by excessive labour; where the nourishment was wholesome, abundant, and equally distributed to all; where all were fully supplied with necessary clothing; where old men, widows, orphans, and the sick, were attended with a care unknown to the rest of the world; where every one married of choice and without motives of interest; where a numerous family of children was a consolation without the possibility of being a burthen; where a debauchery inseparable from idleness, and which assails equally the rich and the poor, never hastened the approach of infirmities or old age; where nothing occurred to excite the artificial passions or to oppose those which are conformable to nature and reason; where the advantages of commerce were reaped without bringing in their train the vices of luxury; where abundant magazines and succours, mutually communicated from tribe to tribe, insured them against famine and the inconstancy of the seasons; where the administrators of justice between man and man were never reduced to the sad necessity of condemning one individual to death, to disgrace, or to any punishment but what was monetary; where taxes and law suits, two of the greatest sources of affliction to the human race, were utterly unknown: such a country, I say, might have been expected to prove the most populous on the face of the earth. It was not so.”

Various causes have been assigned for the decrease in the numbers of this establishment, none of which causes are substantial, and Paraguay remains accordingly an incontestible proof, not only that there is not in mankind an abstract and certain power of increasing their numbers, but that, in an experiment made on a particular portion of mankind, there has sometimes appeared to be a positive absence of the power of supplying even a succession of generations of the same numerical magnitude; and, judging by facts rather than pursuing the consequences of an unwarranted assumption, it seems that there is much less reason to provide, as Mr. Malthus would have us do, against the tendency in mankind to increase beyond the limits of the means of subsistence, than to fear with Montesquieu that population every day grows thinner, and that if it goes on at the same rate, in one thousand years more the race of man will be extinct.

The argument afforded by Paraguay is strongly borne out by that of Sparta:—

“Lycurgus employed every means he could devise to insure a numerous and healthy population. He encouraged marriage, he fixed a stigma on celibacy, and he provided for the support and education of the children that should be born, from the funds of the republic. His institution continued unimpaired for the space of five hundred years. Yet it is apparent that the state perished through the diminution of its numbers. During the interval in which Sparta makes the most splendid figure in the page of history, it was reduced to employ various expedients for the purpose of increasing the amount of its citizens by extrinsic accessions. In the period of which Aristotle treats, the free inhabitants of the capital were reduced from ten thousand to one thousand men; and in the reign of the latter Agis, about one hundred years later than Aristotle, they counted no more than seven hundred citizens. These are phenomena, which I conceive to be utterly incompatible with any hypothesis that affirms the rapid multiplication of the human species.”

Having taken a view of the population of Europe, Asia, Africa, and South America, in ancient and modern times, Mr. Godwin indulges in some deep and finely toned sentiments on the state of man and society, and makes the following truly manly reflection on some of the effects of Mr. Malthus's book:—

“For twenty years the heart of man in this island has been hardening, through the theories of Mr. Malthus. What permanent effect this may have upon the English character I know not, but I am sure it was high time that it should be stopped. We were learning, at least as many of us as studied the questions of political economy, and these are by no means the most despicable part of the community, to look askance and with a suspicious eye upon a human being, particularly on a little child. A woman walking the streets in a state of pregnancy was an unavoidable subject of alarm. A man who was the father of a numerous family, if in the lower orders of society, was the object of our anger. We could not look upon a human being with the eye of a painter as a delicious subject of contemplation, with the eye of a moral philosopher as a machine capable of adorning the earth with magnificence and beauty, or with the eye of a divine as a creature with a soul to be saved, and destined to the happiness of an immortal existence. Our first question, and that regarded as a most difficult one, was, how he was to be maintained? It was not enough that he was born with the implements and the limbs, by which exuberant subsistence is to be produced. It was not enough that there was room for many millions of human beings more than now exist on the face of the earth. We were reduced, (oh, miserable slavery!) to inquire whether he was born among the easier orders of society, whether he was the son of a father who had a fair prospect of being able to support a family. We were learning fast to calumniate the system of the universe, and to believe that the first duty it required of us, was to prevent too many human beings, (that last work of God, that sole ornament and true consumption of the orb we dwell in) from being born into the world.”

Mr. Godwin next proceeds to examine very rigidly, the authorities of Mr. Malthus, which, to say the truth, are miserably slight and insignificant, and to bring the inquirer more closely to the consideration of the principles respecting the increase or decrease of the numbers of mankind. On this subject, his reasoning, which is both lucid and profound, is illustrated by an excellent tabular digest of the Swedish accounts of population, the best documents of their kind in existence. From these, it is attempted to be shown, and, we think, with perfect success, that the human species, abstractedly considered, has very small power of increase, and that, practically, its numbers do not increase, that nearly all the children are born that can be born; and that the American increase cannot have been by procreation only. This branch of the inquiry leads to an investigation of the causes, by which the amount of the numbers of mankind is reduced or restrained. We regret, that we cannot make such extracts from this part of the volume, in which the very pith of the question is contained, as will do ample justice to the author, but the following passages place the fallacy of Mr. Malthus's hypothesis in so clear a light, that we feel compelled to give them:—

“If Mr. Malthus's doctrine were sound, and his novelties constituted a real discovery, the history of the population of the earth would be very different from the thing that it is. But his theory sustains the common fate of every mere hypothesis ingeniously contrived to account for the phenomena around us. It may look in some degree plausible in itself, but it will never truly tally with the facts it is brought to explain. It pays us with words, but it does not clear up a single difficulty.

'The population of every old country, according to Mr. Malthus, is kept down by pressing hard against the limits of the means of subsistence. If this were true, what would be the real state of the case in the history of all the nations of the earth. A periodical fluctuation.—That there is a change, I admit, and that nations from time to time increase and decrease in the numbers of their people. But, the cause of these changes has never yet been fully explained; and least of all do they square with Mr. Malthus's hypothesis. To proceed in the statement and refutation of the views exhibited in the Essay on Population: Every country, as well as North America, in the proportion of its area and its soil, is capable of subsisting a given number of its inhabitants; when this capacity has been used, and the country has been replenished with men, that district, a portion of the globe, will refuse to receive a greater number. But, it is perhaps the nature of every check or reaction to operate somewhat beyond the extent of the impulse that gave it birth. Hence, we will say, comes the depopulation which forms so memorable a portion of the records of universal history. That we may not fall into the error, so incident to the limited faculties of man, of confounding ourselves amidst the complication of very large numbers, let us take a district, or island fully competent to the subsistence of one thousand human inhabitants. The power of procreation, we will assume, continually tends to increase the numbers of mankind. The population of this district, therefore, having arrived at one thousand, has an abstract tendency to extend itself further. But here it is stopped by the most powerful of all causes. Calamity invades this devoted race of men, poverty, examples of terrible distress, and the want of the means of subsistence. Hereupon, follows, we will suppose, depopulation. No man need look far for the most impressive examples of depopulation. We will imagine the number of inhabitants reduced to five hundred. What will be the consequence of this? The area and the soil were fully competent to subsist ten thousand. Ships and acres of land now seem to call loudly for the hand of an adventurer. The whole country is idle, and is sick for the ploughshare and the spade. Nothing, therefore, is more evident upon Mr. Malthus's scheme, than that this region will speedily recover its lost population. Want of the means of subsistence, put it down; that want being removed, the principle of increase inherent in the human species will raise it up again.

But is this really the case in the history of the earth? Let us look through all the depopulated countries enumerated by Montesquieu.* They have been amply blessed in the remedy prescribed by Mr. Malthus, the reduction of the number of those who cried out for the means of subsistence. Why are they at present unconscious of their happiness, and why do they not diligently apply themselves to increase their numbers? I think, I may venture to say, that in no one instance has the thing happened as Mr. Malthus's theory requires.

* Italy, Sicily, Greece, Spain, France, the whole North of Europe, Turkey, America, Asia Minor, Persia, Egypt, &c. &c.

Having thus arrayed against the theories of Mr. Malthus, whatever knowledge on this subject the authentic history of population in past and present times affords, together with a very powerful train of close reasoning on the principles which relate to this part of the moral system of the world, Mr. Godwin enters directly on the subject of the alleged increase of the United States of North America, from which alleged increase alone, Mr. Malthus drew his portentous and calamitous doctrine of the geometrical ratio. We must confess, that we do not look upon this division of the book as the most important, because, had we never heard of the United States of America as a place peopled entirely, and at various times, literally from year to year, by settlers from Europe,—as a portion of the globe, which was looked to at all times, and more particularly within the last fifty years, by the discontented, the unhappy, and the destitute of every kingdom of Europe, as the land of promise, the last retreat of independence, the happy soil on which they might dwell and be at peace, we should have been perfectly satisfied, before our arrival at this part of the Enquiry, of the absolute impossibility of such an increase, as a doubling every twenty-five years, for a century and a half, having been produced by the principle of procreation. To satisfy, however, such persons as desire to see that proved to be false, which it has already been proved cannot be true, this division of the book is, we think, perfectly competent. Mr. Godwin gives a history of emigration from Europe to North America, in the seventeenth century, and likewise from 1700 to the present time, beginning with the Brownists and Puritans, flying from the intolerance of James the First, to the radicals (if that term is meant to be used in so comprehensive a sense) who are escaping from the taxation and restrictions of the reign of George the Fourth. Now, without proceeding further with this part of the question, can any person, except Mr. Malthus, who casts his eye over the history of Europe for the last century and a half, have the hardihood to assert that the increase in the population of the United States of America has been ascertained to have proceeded from procreation only? We would recommend it to Mr. Malthus, if he has an opportunity, to ask any intelligent American how many of the families of his native country, with whom he is acquainted, can trace back their ancestors for a century and a half, without finding them on this side of the Atlantic. Mr. Godwin has, however, with most exemplary diligence and his usual acuteness, proceeded farther with this inquiry, and, in our opinion, perfectly succeeded in establishing the fact from the documents which form the only true means of judging of the state of any given population, that the same laws regulate the progress of the human species in North America, as apply to it in every other part of the world, and that the principle of procreation operates there with precisely the same effect as it does every where else.

The fifth book, which treats of the present state of the globe, as it relates to human subsistence, and the sixth, on the moral and political maxims inculcated in the Essay on Population, though engaging in themselves, and highly valuable for the enlarged views which they contain of the state of society and its possible improvement, are by no means essential to the determination of the grand question; for, with respect to the one, Mr. Malthus never professed to do more than assume the arithmetical ratio to be the ratio of increase of the means of subsistence, and, with respect to the other, the correction of the fundamental mischief of Mr. Malthus's book was, we should have thought, a sufficiently useful occupation to satisfy the beneficent yearnings of the author of the Enquiry. Be that as it may, we cannot but be pleased with the reflections contained in the last book. The Essay on Population was first suggested by a paper in Mr. Godwin's Enquirer, and Mr. Malthus, in a subsequent edition of his Essay, expressly declared the motive to his publication to be, that 'he really thought that there should be somewhere on record an answer to systems of equality founded on the principle of population.' On this account, Mr. Godwin seems to feel it peculiarly incumbent on him to refute every part of the theory of Mr. Malthus which appears to be opposed to the improvement and happiness of mankind, and to furnish an antidote to the poison of the appearance of which he has innocently been the cause.

For our own parts, we are satisfied. We are fully persuaded, that to remove the existing portion of vice and misery from the world, by means of a reform in our political institutions, would not be attended with any of those fatal results of which Mr. Malthus so confidently warns us. Relaxing a little from gravity in the tone of our review, we heartily congratulate our readers and mankind in general, on the signal and final overthrow of vice and misery, those two furious dragons, stationed by Mr. Malthus to guard the entrance to Nature's mighty banquet hall, that the feast might be enjoyed by a select and comfortable party. In truth, these alarming monsters have proved to be no better than a couple of noisy curs, whose silence has been effectually obtained by a good stroke from the cudgel of Mr. Godwin. For Mr. Malthus himself, we have bid adieu to him. He is no longer a being of this world. He has been fairly carried off upon the back of high-flying geometrical ratio. This incomparable animal, by its sleekness and its fair proportions, in evil hour tempted the wandering essayist to trust himself in its stirrups. From that time to this, has he been borne along with a velocity which baffles the utmost effort of human imagination. He has long since 'put a girdle round about the earth.' By the last account of his progress, we heard that he was cauterizing over the planets at a prodigious rate, and had nearly, if not quite, accomplished a tour of the solar system. Mr. Malthus, in his late publication, Principles of Political Economy, p. 227, says, 'If any person will take the trouble to make the calculation, he will see, that if the necessities of life could be obtained without limit, and the number of people could be doubled every twenty-five years, the population which might have been produced from a single pair since the Christian era, would have been sufficient not only to fill the earth quite full of people, so that four should stand upon every square yard, but to fill all the planets of our solar system in the same way, and not only them, but all the planets revolving round the stars which are visible to the naked eye, supposing each of them to be a sun, and to have as many planets belonging to it as our sun has.' Perhaps, at this moment, from some spot in that inconceivable expanse, where 'other planets circle other suns,' he looks down on this terrestrial speck, and, like Sancho Panza, from the enchanted steed Clavileno Aligero, sees beneath him this earth and all its alimentary productions no bigger than a grain of mustard, and population like a hazel nut, strutting about upon its surface. We most sincerely hope that this volume may restore him to reason and his friends, and shall be very happy to announce the circumstance to the world.

We have only further to add, that had we not felt in the intense importance of the question, an irresistible impulse to call the attention of our readers to the book before us, we should have been deterred from noticing it, by the consciousness of not being able, in our limited space, to give an adequate account of a work in which every thing is so necessary, so connected, and so admirably arranged, that it is not easy to determine where to begin or where to close an extract. We can only refer our readers to the volume itself, claiming for ourselves no more than the merit of recommending to their serious consideration a question, which, at first, may, perhaps, be thought somewhat repulsive, but which, on account of the influence which it has had in our political regulation for several years past, and may possibly continue to have, yields, in point of importance, to none with which we are acquainted.

(Concluded from p. 37.)

We are happy to find that the plan we adopted in our last, of detailing the story of the romance of Kenilworth, in preference to giving half a dozen pages of unconnected extracts, has been approved by the public, and we now, therefore, proceed in the narrative. We left Tressilian and his attendant, Wayland Smith, on their way to Say's Court, where the Earl of Sussex was then confined of an illness, suspected justly to have been occasioned by poison administered by Alasco, at the instigation of the Earl of Leicester, or his party. Arrived in London, Wayland purchased several drugs of as many different chemists; and, on reaching Say's Court, was fortunate enough to prevail on the earl to take an electuary he had prepared, which was of signal service. In the mean time, the Queen sent her own physician, Dr. Masters, to Say's Court; but Wayland having undertaken to cure the earl, only on condition that he should adhere to his directions, and having given orders that he should not be disturbed, Dr. Masters, on his arrival, was met by a young Devonshire gentleman, in the service of the earl, who refused him admittance. This gentleman is Raleigh, to whom we are now, for the first time, introduced.

The Earl of Sussex, on being acquainted with the repulse the physician had met with from his zealous young follower, commanded Blount, his master of horse, to go instantly to Greenwich, and taking young Walter and Tracy with him, to make a suitable apology to the Queen, for refusing her physician. Here the author introduces the well-known story of Raleigh, spreading his cloak for the Queen to walk upon, and which laid the foundation of his success at court. Raleigh is described as possessing a countenance which, 'besides being regularly handsome and accompanied by a fine person, was animated and striking in a degree that seemed to speak at once the firmness of a decided and the fire of an enterprising character—the power of reflection, and the promptitude of determination.' The incident of the cloak, and the manner in which Raleigh conducted himself in the consequent audience of the Queen, pleased the Queen so much, that she not only overlooked the refusal of her physician, but determined on an immediate visit to Say's Court, to reconcile the Earls of Sussex and Leicester, whose relative situations in the Queen's favour are stated in a line: 'Sussex had been most servicable to the Queen, while Leicester was most dear to the woman.'

While at Say's Court, the petition of Sir Hugh Robsart to the Queen, for restitution of his daughter, is presented; when Varney, to exculpate his master, declares that she is married to himself. The scene in which Sussex and Leicester are reconciled, is finely drawn. The Queen had given Leicester a severe reproof for his interfering with Bowyer, one of Sussex's followers.

'What I say to my Lord of Leicester,' she said, 'after a moment's pause, "I say also to you, my Lord of Sussex. You also must needs ruffle in the court of England, at the head of a faction of your own?"'

'My followers, gracious princess,' said Sussex, 'have indeed ruffled in your cause, in Ireland, in Scotland, and against your rebellious earls in the north. I am ignorant that—'

'Do you bandy looks and words with me, my lord?' said the Queen, interrupting him; 'methinks you might learn of my Lord of Leicester the modesty to beseech—' lent at least, under our censure. I say, my lord, that my grandfather and my father, in their wisdom, debarred the nobles of this civilized land from travelling with such disorderly retinues; and think you, that because I wear a coif, their sceptre has in my hand been changed into a staff? I tell you no king in Christendom will less brook his court to be cumbered, his people oppressed, and his kingdom's peace disturbed by the arrogance of overgrown power, than she who now speaks with you.—My Lord of Leicester, and you, my Lord of Sussex, I command you both to be friends with each other; or by the crown I wear, you shall find an enemy who will be too strong for both of you."

"Madam," said the Earl of Leicester, "you who are yourself the fountain of honour, know best what is due to mine. I place it at your disposal, and only say, that the terms on which I have stood with my Lord of Sussex, have not been of my seeking; nor had he cause to think me his enemy, until he had done me gross wrong."

"For me, madam," said the Earl of Sussex, "I cannot appeal from your sovereign pleasure; but I were well content my Lord of Leicester should say in what I have, as he terms it, wronged him, since my tongue never spoke the word that I would not willingly justify either on foot or horseback."

"And for me," said Leicester, "always under my gracious sovereign's pleasure, my hand shall be as ready to make good my words, as that of any man who ever wrote himself Ratcliffe."

"My lords," said the Queen, "these are no terms for this presence; and if you cannot keep your temper, we will find means to keep both that and you close enough. Let me see you join hands, my lords, and forget your idle animosities."

The two rivals looked at each other with reluctant eyes, each unwilling to take the first advance to execute the Queen's will.

"Sussex," said Elizabeth, "I entreat, Leicester, I command you."

Yet, so were her words accented, that the entreaty sounded like command, and the command like entreaty. They remained still and stubborn, until she raised her voice to a height which argued at once impudence and absolute command.

"Sir Henry Lee," she said, to an officer in attendance, "have a guard in present readiness, and man a barge instantly.—My Lords of Sussex and Leicester, I bid you once more to join hands—and, God's death! he that refuses shall lose of our tower fare ere he see our face again. I will lower your proud hearts ere we part, and that I promise, on the word of a Queen."

"The prison," said Leicester, "might be borne, but to lose your grace's presence, were to lose light and life at once.—Here, Sussex, is my hand."

"And here," said Sussex, "is mine, in truth and honesty; but,——"

"Nay, under favour, you shall add no more," said the Queen. "Why, this is as it should be," she added, looking on them more favourably, "and when you, the shepherds of the people, unite to protect them, it shall be well with the flock we rule over. For, my lords, I tell you plainly, your follies and your brawls lead to strange disorder among your servants."

After Leicester had the interview with Alasco, it was determined to send the astrologer and Michael Lambourne to Cumnor Place, there to await the orders of Varney. In the mean time, Wayland Smith is despatched by Tresilian, and notwithstanding the vigilance of Foster, under the disguise of a pedlar he gets an interview with the Countess of Leicester, whom he makes acquainted with the Queen's intended visit to Kenilworth, and hints the probability, that 'England will have a King, and England's Elizabeth, God save her, a husband, ere the progress be over.' The Queen had ordered Varney to bring his wife to Kenilworth, and he was, therefore, despatched to Cumnor Place to endeavour to persuade the countess to appear there as his wife. He has an interview with her alone, and makes the degrading proposal; the countess revolting at the idea, insists on being let out of the room; the door is unlocked, and Foster and his daughter Janet enter. The countess, pointing to Varney, says,——

"Look at him, Janet. He is fairly dressed, hath the outside of a gentleman, and hither he came to persuade me it was my lord's pleasure—nay, more, my wedded lord's commands, that I should go with him to Kenilworth, and before the Queen and nobles, and in presence of my own wedded lord, that I should acknowledge him—him there—that very cloak-brushing, shoe cleaning fellow—him there, my lord's lacquey, for my liege lord and husband; furnishing against myself, great God! whenever I was to claim my right and my rank, such weapons as would lew my just claim from the root, and destroy my character to be regarded as an honourable matron of the English nobility!"

"You hear her, Foster, and you, young maiden, hear this lady," answered Varney, taking advantage of the pause which the countess had made in her charge, more for lack of breath than for lack of matter—"You hear that her heat only objects to me the course which our good lord, for the purpose to keep certain matters secret, suggests in the very letter which she holds in her hands."

Foster here attempted to interfere with a face of authority, which he thought became the charge entrusted to him,

"Nay, lady, I must needs say you are hasty in this. Such deceit is not utterly to be condemned when practised for a righteous end; and thus even the patriarch Abraham feigned Sarah to be his sister when they went down to Egypt."

"Ay, Sir," answered the countess, "but God rebuked that deceit even in the father of his chosen people, by the mouth of the heathen Pharaoh. Out upon you, that will read Scripture only to copy those things, which are held out to us as warnings, not as examples!"

"But Sarah disputed not the will of her husband, as it be your pleasure," said Foster, in reply; "but did as Abraham commanded, calling herself his sister, that it might be well with her husband for her sake, and that his soul might live because of her beauty."

"Now, so heaven pardon me my useless anger," answered the countess, "thou art as daring a hypocrite as yonder fellow is an impudent deceiver. Never will I believe that the noble Dudley gave countenance to so dastardly, so dishonourable a plan. Thus I tread on his infamy, if his indeed it be, and thus destroy its remembrance for ever!"

So saying, she tore in pieces Leicester's letter, and stamped, in the extremity of impatience, as if she would have annihilated the minute fragments into which she had rent it.

"Bear witness," said Varney, collecting himself, "she has torn my lord's letter, in order to burthen me with the scheme of his devising; and although it promises nought but danger and trouble to me, she would lay it to my charge, as if I had any purpose of mine own in it."

"Thou liest, thou treacherous slave!" said Countess Amy, in spite of Janet's attempts to keep her silent, in the sad foresight that her vehemence might only furnish arms against herself. "Thou liest," she continued—"Let me go, Janet—were it the last word I have to speak, he lies—he had his own foul ends to seek; and broader he would have displayed them, had my passion permitted me to preserve the silence which at first encouraged him to unfold his vile projects."

"Madam," said Varney, overwhelmed in spite of his effrontery, "I entreat you to believe yourself mistaken."

"As soon will I believe light darkness. Have I drank of oblivion? Do I not remember former passages, which, known to Leicester, had given thee the preference of a gallows, instead of the honour of his intimacy.—I would I were a man but for five minutes! It were space enough to make a craven like thee confess his villainy. But go—begone—tell thy master, that when I take the foul course to which such scandalous deceptions thou hast recommended on his behalf, must necessarily lead me, I will give him a rival something worthy of the name. He shall not be supplanted by an ignominious lacquey, whose best fortune is to catch his master's last suit of clothes ere it is thread-bare, and who is only fit to seduce a suburb-wench by the bravery of new roses in his mother's old pantofles. Go, begone, sir—I scorn thee so much, that I am ashamed to have been angry with thee."

Varney gets Alasco to prepare a potion, which he hoped would either poison the countess, or at least render her unable to appear at Kenilworth. Compelled by the threats of the wretch, she drinks it, without the dire effect. The countess quits Cunnor in disguise, under the protection of Wayland, who had arranged the escape with Janet; and, after encountering Varney, who mistakes them for revelers, and meeting with other interesting adventures, they reach Kenilworth, where, with some difficulty, they get admission.

The countess was appointed an apartment in Mervyn's Tower, where she found materials for writing. She immediately wrote a letter to the Earl of Leicester; and, 'in lieu of a seal and silken thread, she secured it with a braid of her own beautiful tresses, secured by what is called a true-love knot.' The letter was given to Wayland, but he determined to see Tressilian before he had it delivered. By a singular fatality, allowable in romance, the apartment occupied by the countess had been assigned to Tressilian, who entered by means of a master-key, [we were not aware that lock-making had reached such perfection in those days,] and saw his long-lost Amy. She started with surprise on seeing him, and the paleness of her cheeks gave way to a deep blush:—

"'Tressilian," she said, at length, "why come you here?"

"'Nay, why come you here, Amy," returned Tressilian, "unless it be at length to claim that aid, which, as far as one man's heart and arm can extend, shall instantly be rendered to you?"

"She was silent a moment, and then answered in a sorrowful, rather an angry tone,—"I require no aid, Tressilian, and would rather be injured than benefited by any which your kindness can offer me. Believe me, I am near one whom law and love oblige to protect me."

"'The villain, then, hath done you the poor justice which remained in his power," said Tressilian; "and I behold before me the wife of Varney!"

"'The wife of Varney!" she replied, with all the emphasis of scorn; "with what base name, sir, does your boldness stigmatize the—the—the—" She hesitated, dropped her tone of scorn, looked down, and was confused and silent, for she recollected what fatal consequences might attend her completing the sentence with

'the Countess of Leicester,' which were the words that had naturally suggested themselves. It would have been a betrayal of the secret, on which her husband had assured her that his fortunes depended, to Tressilian, to Sussex, to the Queen, and to the whole assembled court. "Never," she thought, "will I break my promised silence. I will submit to every suspicion rather than that."

The tears rose to her eyes, as she stood silent before Tressilian; while, looking on her with mingled grief and pity, he said, "Alas! Amy, your eyes contradict your tongue. That speaks of a protector, willing and able to watch over you; but these tell me you are ruined and deserted by the wretch to whom you have attached yourself."

She looked on him, with eyes in which anger sparkled through her tears, but only repeated the word "wretch!" with a scornful emphasis.

"'Yes, wretch!" said Tressilian; "for were he aught better, why are you here, and alone in my apartment? why was not fitting provisions made for your honourable reception?"

"'In your apartment?" repeated Amy; "in your apartment? It shall instantly be relieved of my presence." She hastened towards the door; but the sad recollection of her deserted state at once pressed on her mind, and, pausing on the threshold, she added, in a tone unutterably pathetic, "Alas! I had forgot—I know not where to go."

"I see—I see it all," said Tressilian, springing to her side, and leading her back to the seat, on which she sunk down—"you do need aid—you do need protection, though you will not own it; and you shall not need it in vain. Leaning on my arm, as the representative of your excellent and broken-hearted father, on the very threshold of the castle-gate, you shall meet Elizabeth; and the first deed she shall do in the halls of Kenilworth, shall be an act of justice to her sex and her subjects. Strong in my good cause, and in the Queen's justice, the power of her minion shall not shake my resolution. I will instantly seek Sussex."

"'Not for that is under heaven!" said the countess, much alarmed, and feeling the absolute necessity of obtaining time, at least, for consideration. "Tressilian, you were wont to be generous—grant me one request, and believe, if it be your wish to save me from misery, and from madness, you will do more by making me the promise I ask of you, than Elizabeth can do for me with all her power."

"Ask me any thing for which you can allege reason," said Tressilian; "but demand not of me!"

"O limit not your boon, dear Edmund!" exclaimed the countess, "you once loved that I should call you so—limit not your boon to reason! for my case is all madness, and phrenzy must guide the counsels which alone can aid me."

"If you speak thus wildly," said

Tressilian, astonishment again overpowering both his grief and his resolution, "I must believe you, indeed, incapable of thinking or acting for yourself."

"Oh no!" she exclaimed, sinking on one knee before him, "I am not mad—I am but a creature unutterably miserable, and, from circumstances the most singular, dragged on to a precipice by the arm of him who thinks he is keeping me from it—even by your's Tressilian,—by your's, whom I have honoured, respected—all but loved—and yet loved too—loved too, Tressilian—though not as you wished me."

"There was an energy—a self-possession—an abandonment in her voice and manner—a total resignation of herself to his generosity, which, together with the kindness of her expressions to himself, moved him deeply. He raised her, and, in broken accents, entreated her to be comforted.

"I cannot," she said, "I will not be comforted, till you grant me my request! I will speak as plainly as I dare—I am now awaiting the commands of one who has a right to issue them; the interference of a third person—of you in especial, Tressilian, will be ruin—utter ruin to me. Wait but four-and-twenty-hours, and it may be that the poor Amy may have the means to shew that she values, and can reward, your disinterested friendship—that she is happy herself, and has the means to make you so. It is surely yours your patience, for so short a space!"

Tressilian promises to keep the secret for twenty-four hours; he meets Wayland, who has lost the countess's letter, and in going back to her chamber, he encounters Lambourne, who has him turned out of the castle. The Queen now arrives at Kenilworth, when the festivities commence; the description of these is passed over rather slightly by the author, who refers to Laneham's account in Mr. Nicholl's [improperly called Nicholas's] Progresses and Processions of Queen Elizabeth.

Varney had procured certificates, that the countess, his supposed wife, was so ill, as to be unable to attend at Kenilworth; these are shown to Tressilian by the Queen; and he declares they speak not the truth. The Queen declares he shall have a fair hearing; and several noblemen and ladies present speak in praise of Alasco, who had signed the certificate as physician. Tressilian entreated twenty-four hours, in which time, if he did not prove that the certificates spoke falsely, he would lay his head on the block. Varney and Nicholas Blount, and, at the request of the Duchess of Rutland, Raleigh, are all knighted by the Queen. Varney urges Leicester to aim at the 'crown matrimonial,' and the better to persuade him, endeavours to make him suspect the countess's honour, accusing her of passing some time in Tressilian's chamber. — The countess passes her time with great anxiety, and while she is in hopes of seeing her lord, Lambourne enters, muffled up in a cloak, and offers violence to her. The countess shrieks, which brings to her aid Lawrence Staples, the tower-keeper, who threatens to knock Lambourne down with the keys. In the struggle that takes place between them, the countess escapes into the garden, which is soon afterwards entered by the Queen, in a hunting-dress, and Leicester, who on this occasion addressed her Majesty with an importunity which 'became the language of love itself.' The Queen requested to be alone, and while ruminating on the earl's suit, she saw the unhappy countess, whom she at first mistook for a performer in one of the various theatrical pageants which had been placed in different situations, to surprise her with their homage. The Queen was soon undeceived, when the countess approached and claimed her protection:—

"I request—I implore," stammered forth the unfortunate countess,—"I beseech your gracious protection—against—against one Varney." She choked well nigh as she uttered the fatal word, which was instantly caught up by the Queen.

"What Varney—Sir Richard Varney—the servant of Lord Leicester!—What, damsel, are you to him, or he to you?"

"I—I—was his prisoner—and he practised on my life—and I broke forth to—"

"To throw thyself on my protection, doubtless," said Elizabeth. "Thou shalt have it—that is, if thou art worthy; for we will sift this matter to the uttermost.—Thou art," she said, bending on the countess an eye, which seemed designed to pierce her very inmost soul,—"thou art Amy, daughter of Sir Hugh Robart, of Lidcote Hall?"

"Forgive me—forgive me—most gracious princess!" said Amy, dropping once more on her knee, from which she had arisen.

"For what should I forgive thee, silly wench?" said Elizabeth; "for being the daughter of thine own father? Thou art brain-sick, surely. Well, I see I must wing the story from thee by inches—thou didst deceive thine old and honoured father—thy look confesses it—cheated master Tressilian—thy blush avouches it—and married this same Varney."

"Amy sprung on her feet, and interrupted the Queen eagerly, with, "No, madam, no—as there is a God above us, I am not the sordid wretch you would take me! I am not the wife of that contemptible slave—of that most deliberate villain! I am not the wife of Varney! I would rather be the bride of Destruction!"

The Queen, overwhelmed in her turn by Amy's vehemence, stood silent for an instant, and then replied, "Why, God ha' mercy! woman—I see thou canst talk fast enough when the theme likes thee. Nay, tell me, woman," she continued, for to the impulse of curiosity was now added that of an undefined jealousy that some deception had been practised on her,—"tell me, woman—for by God's day, I will know—whose wife, or whose paramour art thou? Speak out, and be speedy; thou wert better dally with a lioness than with Elizabeth."

Urged to this extremity, dragged as it were by irresistible force to the verge of the precipice, which she saw but could not avoid,—permitted not a moment's respite by the eager words, and menacing gestures of the offended Queen, Amy at length uttered in despair, "The Earl of Leicester knows it all."

"The Earl of Leicester!" said Elizabeth, in utter astonishment—"The Earl of Leicester!" she repeated, with kindling anger.—"Woman, thou art set on to this—thou dost belie him—he takes no keep of such things as thou art. Thou art suborned to slander the noble lord, and the truest-hearted gentleman, in England! But were he the right hand of our trust, or something yet dearer to us, thou shalt have thy hearing, and that in his presence. Come with me—come with me instantly!"

As Amy shrunk back with terror, which the incensed Queen interpreted as that of conscious guilt, Elizabeth hastily advanced, seized on her arm, and hastened with swift and long steps out of the grotto, and along the principal alley of the pleasure, dragging with her the terrified countess, whom she still held by the arm, and whose utmost exertions could but just keep pace with those of the indignant Queen.

Leicester was at this time in the midst of a splendid group of lords and ladies, assembled under an arcade, when his ears were assailed by the well known voice of majesty, 'where is my Lord of Leicester?'—stand forth my Lord of Leicester." The Queen darted into the circle, and pointing to the countess, whom she supported with one hand, inquired of the astonished earl, 'knowest thou this woman?'—

As at the blast of that last trumpet, the guilty shall call upon the mountains to cover them, Leicester's inward thoughts invoked the stately arch which he had built in his pride, to burst its strong conjunction, and overwhelm them in its ruins. But the cemented stones, architrave, and battlement, stood fast; and it was the proud master himself, who, as if some actual pressure had bent him to the earth, kneeled down before Elizabeth, and prostrated his brow to the marble flag-stones on which she stood.

"Leicester," said Elizabeth, in a voice which trembled with passion, "could I think thou hadst practised on me—on me thy sovereign—on me thy confiding, thy too partial mistress, the base and ingrateful deception which thy present confusion surmises—by all that is holy, false lord, that head of thine were in as great peril as ever was thy father's!"

Leicester had not conscious innocence, but he had pride to support him. He raised slowly his brow and features, which were black and swollen with contending emotions, and only replied, "My head cannot fall but by the sentence of my peers—to them I will plead, and not to a princess who thus requites my faithful service."

"What! my lords," said Elizabeth, looking around, "we are defied, I think—defied in the castle we have ourselves bestowed on this proud man!—My Lord Shrewsbury, you are marshal of England, attach him of high treason."

"Whom does your grace mean?" said Shrewsbury, much surprised, for he had that instant joined the astonished circle.

"Whom should I mean, but that traitor, Dudley, Earl of Leicester!—Cousin of Hunsdon, order out your band of gentlemen pensioners, and take him into instant custody.—I say, villain, make haste!"

Hunsdon, a rough old noble, who, from his relationship to the Boyleys, was accustomed to use more freedom with the Queen than almost any others, replied bluntly, "And it is like your grace might order me to the Tower to-morrow, for making too much haste. I do beseech you to be patient."

"Patient—God's life!" exclaimed the Queen,—"name not the word to me; thou knowest not of what he is guilty!"

Amy, who had by this time in some degree recovered herself, and who saw her husband, as she conceived, in the utmost danger from the rage of an offended sovereign, instantly, (and, alas! how many women have done the same,) forgot her own wrongs, and her own danger, in her apprehensions for him, and throwing himself before the Queen, embraced her knees, while she exclaimed, "He is guiltless, madam—he is guiltless—no one can lay ought to the charge of the noble Leicester."

"Why, minion," answered the Queen, "didst not thou, thyself, say that the Earl of Leicester was privy to thy whole history?"

"Did I say so," repeated the unhappy Amy, laying aside every consideration of consistency, and of self interest; "O, if I did, I foolishly belied him. May God so judge me, as I believe he was never privy to a thought that would harm me!"

"Woman!" said Elizabeth, "I will know who has moved thee to this; or my wrath—and the wrath of kings is a flaming fire—shall wither and consume thee like a weed in the furnace."

"As the Queen uttered this threat, Leicester's better angel called his pride to his aid, and reproached him with the utter extremity of meanness which would overwhelm him for ever, if he stooped to take shelter under the generous interposition of his wife, and abandon her, in return for her kindness, to the resentment of the Queen. He had already raised his head, with the dignity of a man of honour, to avow his marriage, and proclaim himself the protector of his countess, when Varney, born, as it appeared, to be his master's evil genius, rushed into the presence, with every mark of disorder on his face and apparel.

"What means this saucy intrusion?" said Elizabeth.

"Varney, with the air of a man altogether overwhelmed with grief and confusion, prostrated himself before her feet, exclaiming, 'Pardon, my liege, pardon!—or at least let your justice avenge itself on me, where it is due; but spare my noble, my generous, my innocent patron and master!'"

"Any, who was yet kneeling, started up as she saw the man whom she deemed most odious, place himself so near her, and was about to fly towards Leicester, when, checked at once by the uncertainty and even timidity which his looks had re-assumed, as soon as the appearance of his confidant seemed to open a new scene, she hung back, and, uttering a faint scream, besought of her Majesty to cause her to be imprisoned in the lowest dungeon of the castle—to deal with her as the worst of criminals—"but spare," she exclaimed, "my sight and hearing, what will destroy the little judgment I have left—the sight of that unutterable and most shameless villain!"

"And why, sweetheart?" said the Queen, moved by a new impulse; "what hat he, this false knight, since such thou accountest him, done to thee?"

"Oh, worse than sorrow, madam, and worse than injury—he hath sown dissension where most there should be peace. I shall go mad if I look longer on him."

"Beshrew me, but I think thou art distraught already," answered the Queen.—"My Lord Hunsdon, look to this poor distressed young woman, and let her be safely bestowed, and in honest keeping, till we require her to be forthcoming."

An affecting interview takes place between the earl and the countess, in which she entreats that he will do justice to her and to his own honour, by avowing himself her husband; and that then, if law or power require that he should part from her, she will oppose no objection. Leicester hesitates and talks of defiance. On returning with Varney to his chamber, he calculates on his supposed strength, which he conceives to be 'a tree so deep rooted as not easily to be torn up by the tempest.' Varney turns the conversation to the subject of the countess, whom he accuses of being in continued connivance with Tressilian, and mentions his meeting him at Cumnor Hall. Leicester, being wrought upon, vows the destruction of the countess. Varney obtains authority to take her to Cumnor Place, and rid his master of her for ever. Leicester swears to reserve Tressilian for his own revenge. Varney carries off the countess, and Leicester, fearing he might be too hasty in executing his purpose, writes a counter-order, which he despatches by Lambourne to Varney. Leicester and Tressilian encounter, but are interrupted. They retire, but renew the combat next day, when Tressilian would have received the fatal blow, had not his arm been arrested by the boy, Dickie Sludge, who produced the lost letter from the countess to the earl:—

"The letter dropped from Leicester's hand when he had perused it. 'Take my sword,' he said, 'Tressilian, and pierce my heart, as I would but now have pierced your's!'"

"My lord," said Tressilian, "you have done me great wrong; but something within my breast ever whispered that it was by egregious error."

"Error, indeed!" said Leicester, and handed him the letter; "I have been made to believe a man of honour a villain, and the best and purest of creatures a false profligate.—Wretched boy, why comes this letter now, and where has the bearer lingered?"

"I dare not tell you, my lord," said the boy, withdrawing, as if to keep beyond his reach;—"but here comes one who was the messenger."

Wayland at the same moment came up; and, interrogated by Leicester, hastily detailed all the circumstances of his escape with Amy, the fatal practices which had driven her to flight, and her anxious desire to throw herself under the instant protection of her husband,—pointing out the evidence of the domestics of Kenilworth, "who could not," he observed, "but remember her eager inquiries after the Earl of Leicester on her first arrival."

"The villains!" exclaimed Leicester;—"but O, that worst of villains, Varney!—and she is even now in his power!"

"But not, I trust in God," said Tressilian, "with any commands of fatal import?"

"No, no, no!" exclaimed the earl hastily.—"I said something in madness—but it was recalled, fully recalled, by a hasty messenger; and she is now—she must now be safe."

"Yes," said Tressilian, "she must be safe, and I must be assured of her safety. My own quarrel with you is ended, my lord; but there is another, to begin with the seducer of Amy Robarts, who has screened his guilt under the cloak of the infamous Varney."

"The seducer of Amy!" replied Leicester, with a voice like thunder; "say her husband!—her misguided, blinded, most unworthy husband!—She is as surely Countess of Leicester, as I am belted earl. Nor can you, sir, point out that manner of justice which I will not render her at my own free will. I need scarce say, I fear not your compulsion."

"The generous nature of Tressilian was instantly turned from consideration of any thing personal to himself, and entered at once upon Amy's welfare. He had by no means undoubting confidence in the fluctuating resolutions of Leicester, whose mind seemed to him agitated beyond the government of calm reason; neither did he, notwithstanding the assurances he had received, think Amy safe in the hands of his dependants. "My lord," he said, calmly, "I mean you no offence, and am far from seeking a quarrel. But my duty to Sir Hugh Robarts compels me to carry this matter instantly to the Queen, that the Countess's rank may be acknowledged in her person."

"You shall not need, sir," replied the earl, haughtily; "do not dare to interfere. No voice but Dudley's shall proclaim Dudley's infamy.—To Elizabeth herself will I tell it, and then for Cumnor-Place with the speed of life and death!"

"So saying, he unbound his horse from the tree, threw himself into the saddle, and rode at full gallop towards the castle."

The Queen learns from Tressilian the whole of Amy's unhappy story, and reproaches Leicester with great severity:—

"At length, however, the haughty lord, like a deer that turns to bay, gave intimation that his patience was failing. "Madam," he said, "I have been much to blame—more than even your just resentment has expressed. Yet, Madam, let me say, that my guilt, if it be unpardonable, was not unprovoked; and that if beauty and condescending dignity could seduce the frail heart of a human being, I might plead both, as the causes of my concealing this secret from your Majesty."

"The Queen was so much struck by this reply, which Leicester took care should be heard by no one but herself, that she was for the moment silenced, and the earl had the temerity to pursue his advantage. "Your Grace, who has pardoned so much, will excuse my throwing myself on your royal mercy for those expressions, which were yesterday morning accounted but a light offence."

"The queen fixed her eyes on him while she replied, "Now, by heaven, my lord, thy effrontery passes the bounds of belief, as well as patience! But it shall avail thee nothing.—What, ho! my lords, come all and hear the news—My Lord of Leicester's stolen marriage has cost me a husband, and England a king. His lordship is patriarchal in his tastes—one wife at a time was insufficient, and he designed us the honour of his left hand. Now, is not this too insolent,—that I could not grace him with a few marks of court-favour, but he must presume to think my hand and crown at his disposal?—You, however, think better of me; and I can pity this ambitious man, as I could a child, whose bubble of soap has burst between his hands. We go to the presence-chamber—My lord of Leicester, we command your close attendance on us.”

“All was eager expectation in the hall, and what was the universal astonishment, when the Queen said to those next her, ‘The revels of Kenilworth are not yet exhausted, my lords and ladies—we are to solemnize the noble owner's marriage.’”

“There was an universal expression of surprise.

“‘It is true, on our royal word,’ said the Queen; ‘he hath kept this a secret even from us, that he might surprise us with it at this very place and time. I see you are dying of curiosity to know the happy bride.—It is Amy Robsart, the same who, to make up the May-game yesterday, figured in the pageant as the wife of his servant Varney.’”

“‘For God's sake, madam,’ said the earl, approaching her with a mixture of humility, vexation, and shame in his countenance, and speaking so low as to be heard by no one else, ‘take my head, as you threatened in your anger, and spare me these taunts! Urge not a falling man—tread not on a crushed worm.’”

“‘A woman, my lord?’ said the Queen, in the same tone; ‘nay, a snake is the nobler reptile, and the more exact similitude—the frozen snake you wot of, which was warmed in a certain bosom!’—”

“‘For your own sake—for mine, madam,’ said the earl—‘while there is yet some reason left in me!’—”

“‘Speak aloud, my lord,’ said Elizabeth, ‘and at farther distance, so please you—your breath thaws our ruff. What have you to ask of us?’”

“‘Permission,’ said the unfortunate earl, humbly, ‘to travel to Cumnor Place.’”

The Queen refuses, and orders Tressilian, accompanied by Raleigh, to be despatched to Cumnor. On their way they find Lambourne, who had been shot by Varney, lest he should no longer conceal his villainies. Varney rushes Cumnor with the countess:—

“On the next day, when evening approached, Varney summoned Foster to the execution of their plan. Tider and Foster's old man-servant were sent on a feigned errand down to the village, and

Anthony himself, as if anxious to see that the countess suffered no want of accommodation, visited her place of confinement. He was so much staggered at the mildness and patience with which she seemed to endure her confinement, that he could not help earnestly recommending to her not to cross the threshold of her room on any account whatsoever, until Lord Leicester should come, “Which,” he added, “I trust in God, will be very soon.” Amy patiently promised that she would resign herself to her fate, and Foster returned to his hardened companion with his conscience half-eased of the perilous load that weighed on it. “I have warned her,” he said; “surely in vain is the snare set in the sight of any bird.”

“He left, therefore, the countess's door unsecured on the outside, and under the eye of Varney, withdrew the supports which sustained the falling trap, which, therefore, kept its level position merely by a slight adhesion. They withdrew to wait the issue on the ground-floor adjoining, but they waited long in vain. At length Varney, after walking long to and fro, with his face muffled in his cloak, threw it suddenly back, and said, “Surely never was a woman fool enough to neglect so fair an opportunity of escape!”

“‘Perhaps she is resolved,’ said Foster, ‘to await her husband's return.’”

“‘True!—most true,’ said Varney, rushing out, ‘I had not thought of that before.’”

“In less than two minutes, Foster, who remained behind, heard the tread of a horse in the court-yard, and then a whistle similar to that which was the earl's usual signal; the instant after, the door of the countess's chamber opened, and, in the same moment the trap-door gave way. There was a rushing sound—a heavy fall—a faint groan—and all was over.

“At the same instant, Varney called in at the window, in an accent and tone which was an indescribable mixture between horror and rallery, ‘Is the bird caught?—Is the deed done?’”

“‘O God, forgive us!’ replied Anthony Foster.

“‘Why, thou fool,’ said Varney, ‘thy toil is ended, and thy reward secure. Look down into the vault—what seest thou?’”

“‘I see only a heap of white clothes, like a snow-drift,’ said Foster. ‘O God, she moves her arm!’”

“‘Hurl something down on her.—Thy gold chest, Tony—it is an heavy one.’”

“‘Varney, thou art an incarnate fiend!’ replied Foster:—‘There needs nothing more—she is gone!’”

“‘So pass our troubles,’ said Varney, entering the room; ‘I dreamed not I could have mimicked the earl's call so well.’”

“‘Oh, if there be judgment in heaven, thou hast deserved it,’ said Foster, ‘and wilt meet it!—Thou hast destroyed her by means of her best affections.—It is a seething of the kid in the mother's milk.’”

Tressilian and Raleigh arrived; when Varney ‘seemed to take a fiendish pleasure in pointing out to them the remains of the murdered countess, while he, at the same time, defied them to shew that he had had any share in her death.’ Varney took poison, and Foster betaking him to a place of concealment in his own house, locked the door on himself, and, being unable to escape, miserably perished. Sir Hugh Robsart died very soon after his daughter, having left his estate to Tressilian, who embarked with Raleigh for Virginia, and ‘young in years but old in griefs, died, before his day, in that foreign land.’

We have entered so fully into the story of Kenilworth, and given such copious extracts, that we might commit the work to our readers without a single comment. We cannot, however, but observe, that, notwithstanding its many beauties, it falls short of the former productions of the same author, and is even inferior to Ivanhoe. The character of Raleigh is feebly drawn, and Shakespeare has had less attention devoted to him than we could have wished. Although there is ‘no scandal about Queen Elizabeth,’ yet her character is not delineated with that skill we had expected. The catastrophe is excessively abrupt, and the death of the heroine, whose name has been prominent in three volumes, is dismissed in a single sentence. But, notwithstanding these defects, Kenilworth is a delightful romance. Many of the characters are drawn with a master hand, particularly that of Varney, which is second only to the Iago of our immortal bard.

A Day in Autumn; a Poem. By Bernard Barton. 4to. pp. 31. Woodbridge, 1820.

We have already expressed so favourable an opinion of Mr. Barton's poetical talents,* that we need only to add that the ‘Day in Autumn’ is marked by the same beauties, the same moral feeling, and the same fine toned poetic fancy and love of nature which we observed in his first volume of Poems, while we think it displays more genius. The ‘Invocation to Autumn’ is a very pleasing poetical description of that season of the year:—

‘Autumn! soul soothing season, thou who spreadest

Thy lavish feast for every living thing,—
Around whose leaf-strew'd path, as on thou treadest,

* See Literary Chronicle for 1820, p. 371.

The year its dying odours loves to fling,
Their last faint fragrance sweetly scattering :—
O ! let thy influence, meek, majestic, holy,
So consciously around my spirit cling,
That its fix'd frame may be remote from folly,
Of sober thought combin'd with gentle melancholy.

If, in the morning of my life, to Spring
I paid my homage with a heart elate ;
And with each fluttering insect on the wing,
Or small bird singing to his happy mate,
And Flora's festival then held in state :—
If joyous sympathy with these was mine,
O ! still allow me now to dedicate
To thee a loftier song :—that tone assign Unto my murr'ing lyre, which Nature gives to thee.

A tone of thrilling softness, now as caught
From light winds sweeping o'er a stubble field :—
And now and then be with those breezes brought
A murmur musical, of winds conceal'd
In coy recesses, by escape reveal'd :—
And ever and anon, still deeper tone
Of winter's gath'ring dirge, at distance peal'd,
By harps and bands unceasing ; and only known
To some enthusiast's ear when worshipping alone.

No more of invocation ! Bright the day
Arose ; as if the glorious sun were bent, (Like some proud monarch, whose decline sway
Is still majestic and magnificent.)
On once more filling his own firmament
With undiminish'd splendour :

Mr. Barton is a member of the Society of Friends ; and, although we are far from thinking that the members of that respectable body are now generally inimical to poetry, yet, perhaps, a consciousness that some are not very friendly to it, has induced the author to vindicate 'gentle poesy' in the following stanzas :—

'The Muses are not innately oppos'd
To pure religion :—witness Cowper's lyre,
And those more awful visions once disclos'd
To him, the loftiest of our tuneful choir,
Seraphic Milton, whose lips felt the fire Caught from the altar's live coal ; prompted whence,
In verse which, although numerous, could not tire,
He sang of themes beyond our finite sense,
And pour'd his heavenly song with holy eloquence.

Not that a poet by his craft is bound
To be for ever hasting heavenly thoughts ;
Though palms unfading grow on holy grounds,
And at their feet are everlastingly strewn,
And many a spot with holiest vision teems,
Replete with inspiration ; still we may
Be more familiar with them than besems
True reverence, and unguardedly betray
The cause we wish to serve by our unworthy lay.
Yet he who scans aright the end for which
The gift of song, if genuine, was bestow'd,
Will ever strain its most commanding pitch
In virtue's praise ; and seek to strew the road
That leads to her immortal blest abode,
With amaranthine flowers ; even when he plays
With lighter theme, in seeming misanthropic mode,
Or nature's loveliness in song portrays,
His end and aim through all should be the Giver's praise.

And inexhaustible the beauties are
Of this fair universe. The boundless main ; Heaven's outstretch'd cope, begemmed with many a star ;
And earth's rich loveliness,—the ample plain,
And stream which marks it like a silver vein ;
Mountain and forest—lake and water-fall ;
Can minstrel ere want subject for his strain
While such display their charms so prodigal ?
Or how, while singing them, forget who form'd them all !
O poesy ! thou dear delightful art !
Of sciences by far the most sublime ;
Who acting rightly thy immortal part,
Art virtue's handmaid,—censor stern of crime,—
Nature's high priest, and chronicler of time ;
The nurse of feeling, the interpreter
Of pure passion ;—who, in manhood's prime,
In age or infancy alike can't stir
The heart's most secret thoughts !

The strong religious feeling which breathes throughout the whole poem, is very fervidly expressed in the following stanza :—

'One topic more :—still Night will yet intrude Upon my serious thoughts while hymning
thee :
Thou art the emblem, type, similitude,
Of silence yet more awful ! although we Are loath the approach of Death's dark night to see !
Father of mercies ! thou whose goodness gave Thy son below'd, man's sacrifice to be,
Grant that in life's last hour my soul may crave,
Nor crave in vain, His love to light me through the grave.'

We will not borrow farther from a poem of thirty pages, having quoted sufficient to shew the poetical genius, the amiable character, and the strong religious feelings of the author.

Such is the World. A Novel. 3 vols.
12mo. pp. 946. London, 1821.

A PRETTY extensive field our author has taken, when he attempts to shew us what the world is. Its varieties, however, are too great to be all developed even in a novel of three volumes. It is too much the character of modern productions of this class, that they are either tame in language, destitute of incident, or too romantic in the story. All these errors the author of 'Such is the World,' has avoided. His style is far above mediocrity : the incidents of his novel are highly interesting, and the story does not encroach too much on improbability. The characters in the novel, which embrace 'all ranks and degrees of men,' from a duke down to the hostler of an inn, are drawn with a fidelity and correctness, which none but a person who has mixed much in the world could have sketched. Another merit this novel possesses, in which we should be happy to see every work of the kind resemble it ;—we mean, that of having a good moral tendency. There are no coarse ribaldries—no indecent allusions—no double entendres, to raise a blush on the cheek of youthful innocence. Virtue and vice are so faithfully portrayed, that we do not fear our juvenile friends choosing the former for the model of their future conduct in life.

The heroine of the novel is a Miss Isabella Templeton, the daughter of Lord Murray, by Miss Etheridge, the daughter of a clergyman. Lord Murray is the only son of the Earl of Annandale, and did not happen to be born until an elder sister, Lady Margaret, had attained sufficient age to entertain the hope of perpetuating in her own person, the title of the family. The enmity of this lady to her brother, on being thus put aside from the succession, was insatiable. Lord Murray dies suddenly, soon after the birth of our heroine. Lady Margaret administers opium to the child ; and its mother and all around believe it dead. The child, however, recovers, and is sent by the lady to a Dr. Neville, in Wales, in a mysterious way, as Isabella Templeton. The doctor and his lady bring the child up with parental fondness, until she attains the age of eighteen or twenty, when she is seen by Lord Murray, the son of Lady Margaret, by a Mr. Irving. He loves her, but his mother, who, on the death of her father, assumed the title of Countess of Annandale, has Isabella kidnapped by some smugglers, and conveyed to London. Here she is first placed with a former servant of the countess, and afterwards as companion to lady Susan Violet. Isabella's charms excite universal admiration. Lord Murray discovers her, and vows unalterable love ; the countess, however, in order to thwart it, sends him abroad. Isabella attends the ladies to a masquerade, where an artful villain, Count le Grand, who paid her particular attentions, is seen with her by Lord Murray, who was also in mask. A deep laid plot, to ruin the young innocent, makes his lordship jealous of her affection, and he hastens back to Paris, and marries the daughter of the Duke of Weobly,—a match brought about by the artifices of her mother. Isabella escapes from her persecutors, and is met by Dr. Neville, and his friend Mr. Lindley : her true history is discovered, and she is declared, by incontestible evidence, the heir of the noble House of Annandale. Lord Murray's mother, on finding her plot discovered, dies of grief and remorse; his lordship nearly frantic enters a monastery, but afterwards returns to the world and lives happily with his wife. Our heroine, Isabella, now Countess of Anandale, marries a worthy gentleman, a Mr. Sterling, and all the subordinate characters in the drama are disposed of according to their deserts.

Such is a very hasty sketch of the plot, which possesses considerable interest, and is throughout very well managed. There are several scenes, both of a serious and comic cast, which give a favourable opinion of the author, but we select one at the commencement which contains both. Dr. Neville has just received the mysterious letter, announcing the infant charge consigned to his care.

"As soon as Mrs. Neville had read this singular epistle, she exclaimed, 'I hope, doctor, you do not intend to take in this child belonging to nobody knows who.—You may do as you please—but I shall never consent to it—I dare say, it is the —'"

"What can I do?" interrupted her husband. "The child is already on the road, and surely, Mary, you will not shut your door against helpless, friendless, innocence?"

"Dear me, Doctor Neville," resumed his wife, "I am not really equal to the fatigue of taking charge of so young a child: we must have an extra servant for it—a nurse—a girl at least we must have—we cannot afford it—besides, what will the villagers say of me—ay, of us both?—Is not our parish reckoned the most orderly of any for miles round? And has it not been my pride that it should contain none but honest women, and orderly young men? Will they not say, ah! Madam Neville can harbour a love child when it belongs to great folks; she will be well paid for it, no doubt.—I tell you, husband, I never can consent to such a thing."

"How can you not? Mrs. Neville, you are too warm; and your warmth leads you to suspect that for which you have no foundation. Now I should have thought, since it has pleased heaven to depute you of your own cherubs, that this poor forsaken little one would, in some degree, have replaced those you loved so well. Think, Mary, if perchance your own child had laid claim to the protection of a stranger, how you would have felt, had that stranger shut his door against your offspring?"

"Doctor," interrupted his wife, "the case is quite different.—Here is a child, of nobody knows who, absolutely forced upon us. We might have been asked whether or not an addition to our family would have been agreeable."

"I ask you to receive it," replied Dr. Neville. "I ask you to take compassion on Isabella Templeton."

"Just as the doctor pronounced these words, the servant-maid entered the breakfast parlour, to say, that a sick parishioner begged his presence immediately. The good man accordingly hastened to the bed of sickness, where he passed some time administering those consolations with which religion soothes the last hours of the dying Christian. The doctor did not return home till dinner-time; and, when the cloth was drawn, the expected child became again the subject of conversation. Mrs. Neville was not to be convinced; and her husband's arguments were on the point of being changed into commands, when the servant came in, saying that Jenkins was come with a message, that a lady had arrived at the Llewellyn's Head, and desired Doctor Neville would attend her as soon as possible. The doctor rose hastily, and quit the room without uttering one word.

"What sort of a woman, Betty?" inquired Mrs. Neville, as her husband closed the door after him.

"Ma'am, 'a lady,' Jenkins said:—he didn't say what sort of lady; but he said, 'La! Betty, what a sweet baby she has with her!'"

"Baby!" exclaimed Mrs. Neville, colouring deeply. "Fetch me my bonnet and cloak directly, Betty, and make haste. Sweet baby, indeed!" rejoined she. "Bless me, how long Betty is!—Betty—Betty, I say, make haste!"

"Coming, ma'am; but I can't find your gloves."

"O, never mind the gloves!" replied Mrs. Neville. But the maid, though astonished at the impatience of her mistress, still lingered to look for them, till a second call obliged her to descend without them.

Hastily putting on her bonnet and cloak, Mrs. Neville sallied forth from her own house for the inn. Dr. Neville, in the mean time, had made the best of his way thither, preceded by Jenkins, who, though advanced in years, had all the agility of youth, and more of its vivacity than remains when wit exercises its playfulness under the guardianship of experience. But with Jenkins there was "a time to speak, and a time to keep silence;" and at present the latter seemed dictated either by prudence, or the old man's desire to leave the doctor's mind in its best state of preparation for an unexpected surprise.

As soon as they arrived at the inn door, Dr. Neville was told by the hostess, that "a lady waited for him in the best bed-room." Thither the doctor proceeded: and, eagerly ascending the stair, he was followed by the very significant smiles of the landlady and her attendants. Upon entering the room, the door of which Jenkins opened, Dr. Neville bowed to a tall and neatly dressed female, who wore a thick and long veil. She curtsied, and, pointing to the bed, said, in an under tone, which appeared tremulous from suppressed emotion, "There, sir, lies Isabella Templeton, your future ward."

The good man turned towards the bed, and stood wrapped in meditation as he gazed upon the sleeping infant before him. A pearly tear bedewed its rosy cheek, while an occasional sob further betrayed that the babe had been hushed to sleep after a violent fit of crying.

"Poor babe!" exclaimed the doctor; "poor little forsaken child! if I at the first sight of thee feel thus, what must thy mother have felt at parting with thee! Madam," continued he, turning round to address the unknown female, "madam, you may rest——" He stopped short, for the woman was gone! "This is very strange," resumed he; "but she is no doubt below." Thither the doctor bent his steps; but just as he reached the bottom of the stairs, a post-chaise and four drove rapidly from the inn door, containing, as he was informed by Jenkins, the "veiled lady."

"And," said the landlady, who seemed breathless at the disappointment to which the sudden departure of her guest subjected her, "and the lady, sir, desired I would tell you this trunk contained the baby's wardrobe; but she did not mention this small bundle, which, I think, she left by mistake. I took hold of it while she was fumbling for her purse to pay us; and she hurried into the chaise so fast, and was off so soon——"

"Give it me, ma'am," said Jenkins, who had by this time put the trunk on his shoulder; "it is an ill wind that blows nobody any good."

"Poor baby!" continued Mrs. Apshenkins, "it cried sadly when 'twas undressed, and the lady cried too. Shall I open the bundle, sir?"

The doctor, more amazed than ever, eagerly seized the bundle, which the hostess declined giving up to Jenkins. It had occurred to the vicar, that it might contain a clue to the mystery in which this whole day's work seemed enveloped; and, again ascending the stairs, he gently raised the sleeping infant. The doctor had been a parent; and, pressing his lips softly upon the little innocent's cheek, he repeated, "I will be a father to thee, thou poor deserted little one! Bring the portmanteau after me," said he to Jenkins.

The old man obeyed; and following the doctor, who was absorbed in the contemplation of his beautiful and innocent charge, passed on unconscious of the nods and significant looks of the villagers, who had been drawn together at the novel spectacle of a post-chaise in Oldenwood. Dr. Neville had scarcely passed through the inn-yard, when he was met by his wife, who coloured up as she approached him. He was rocking the infant, for it appeared to be waking; indeed, at this moment it opened its soft blue eyes; and fixing them on the doctor, it put up its lip, but turning its head, it caught sight of the softened features of Mrs. Neville, and stretched out its little arms to her, when the good woman, (she really was a good woman,) burst into tears as the doctor, holding the infant to her, said, "For my sake, Mary, be a mother to it."

"My own sweet Mary had blue eyes," said Mrs. Neville, as she pressed the baby to her breast. Oh, nature! thou powerful pleader! who can resist thee? One single look of thine has pierced the hardest hearts; no wonder, then, that Mrs. Neville's prejudices should be subdued at thy appeal.

Betty's surprise, as her master and mistress and old Jenkins entered the house, was beyond description. It is true that this country girl had had some intimation of the doctor's errand to the inn; but the babe Mrs. Neville carried in her arms was presented so suddenly, and so unexpectedly, to poor Betty's view, as to create the liveliest impression; and there was, besides, something of mystery in the appearance of the infant. In short, if Betty had studied the most learned disquisition on the passions, she could not have had a better incident to illustrate the law of excitement on which wonder is principally grounded.

"Put down the portmanteau, Jenkins," said the doctor; and the old man did so and departed.

"And Betty," said Mrs. Neville,—"Betty, run to Sally Meadows, and say I want her eldest girl to come here immediately."

Betty, beckoning to Jenkins to stop, she soon joined him; and her curiosity instantly led her to inquire into this very extraordinary affair. As, however, Mrs. Neville was an exceedingly particular mistress, whose disposition Betty had well studied, the girl could carry no time to question or argue with Jenkins. She was thence obliged to be content for the present with mere facts, so few and brief as to be very unsatisfactory to her mind. Onward she hastened to Sally Meadows's cottage, while Jenkins struck off in an opposite direction, to regain the inn.

The case was different at the porch of the Llewellyn's Head. There opinions were various. The appearance of a chaise and four, driving with rapidity into the village of Oldenwood, had roused from their hearths all the gossips of the place; and the dust, put in motion by the horses' feet and the wheels of the vehicle, was not more evanescent in its action than the ideas which now floated in the brains of Dr. Neville's female parishioners. As, however, a short space only elapsed ere the same machine gilded again past their eyes, there occurred to some one's mind a vague idea, that more might be learned at the Llewellyn's Head, from the servants, than by conjecture. Accordingly, by the time Jenkins reached the inn gate, a motley group had assembled, to terminate their curiosity by the acquisition of knowledge. All were inquisitive, for the sight was strange to every one; each had her peculiar question, for it was rarely such a sight was seen in Oldenwood; and many were the significant and penetrating suppositions as to the origin of Isabella Templeton.

Mrs. Apshenkins, the landlady, was in general the first to give her opinion on all subjects; but, in the present instance, she yielded to the torrent of speculative guesses which were thrown out by the gossips. Though habit had taught our hostess to play the servant to her customers, when her judgment was appealed to, in matters which concerned not her immediate calling, no woman in Oldenwood evinced more vanity than Mrs. Apshenkins.

"But it may not be out of place to account for this woman's self-love."

Mrs. Apshenkins was a native of London, with whom Mr. Apshenkins had become enamoured while he put up at an inn in West Smithfield, whither he had driven some Welsh cattle for sale. At that period, Mrs. Apshenkins was barmaid; and Mr. Apshenkins having preferred his suit with much devotion, the young woman smiled on it with approving condescension. She had put by a few pounds while in this situation; and with that sum, and what other pence Mr. Apshenkins had hoarded while a drover's man, they came to Oldenwood, his native village, and bought the good-will of the Llewellyn's Head, the then landlord having preferred the wilds of Louisiana to the comforts of Wales.

Mrs. Apshenkins's opinion was in general a flat from which little or no appeal was ever made in the village. There were, indeed, a few old women who maintained that the comfortable looking landlady had been occasionally mistaken in her decision; but the majority of the villagers believed that "a Lunnun lady must be wiser in some matters than poor women who had never been twenty miles from home."

The smile which played round her saffron lips was, therefore, eagerly scrutinised; but it was not until all had decided upon the birth and parentage of Isabella Templeton, that Mrs. Apshenkins deigned to hazard an opinion upon the subject in discussion.

"You are all far from the point," said she; "for I do confidently believe that this child is of noble, nay, of royal parentage. You may well stare, that know no better; but has not she blue eyes? and has not she a long nose?—I mean one that will belong. And had not the Queen of France blue eyes, and a long nose?—Yes, she had; and I do verily believe," said Mrs. Apshenkins, when pressed for her opinion as to the baby's origin,—"I do verily believe, that it is the child of the Queen of France, born in the prison just before her death."

"Dead!" exclaimed twenty voices, at one and the same time.

"Yes," rejoined Mrs. Apshenkins; "wasn't I reading about the jacobins beheading her?"

"At this part of Mrs. Apshenkins's speech, an involuntary shudder seized the ignorant, but virtuous women, who had gathered around her. Thus, in one instant, the mere reference to an act of wanton cruelty, excited a passion the very opposite of what had tickled the fancy of these lowly Welsh women. Mrs. Apshenkins had put her apron to her eye; the rest followed her example. The mental agony of an allusion is but momentary—the description, in detail, of scenes from which our natures recoil, is durable. So it was at the porch of the Llewellyn's Head. The experienced landlady had been appealed to.

"I do believe," continued she, "this infant has been brought over to Madam Neville." And the conclaves, whose mind possessed sufficient elasticity to revivify to the tune it had been amused with but a few seconds back, stared with astonishment at the penetration Mrs. Apshenkins discovered by this speech.

Jenkins had, at this moment, reached the skirts of the group, and he was assailed by many voices communicating the discovery which had so lately and so wisely been made. The oddity of the assembly, and the absurdity of the conjecture, overbalanced the old man's gravity. He burst into "a horse laugh," as they say, who know how that quadruped displays its joy in violent convulsions of merriment. But Jenkins, one of those who have few wants, and still fewer cares, could be whirled into cheerfulness by any very trivial circumstances of a joyful kind, and when things facetious or ludicrous augmented the social sympathy of the old man's lively disposition, his gladness became noisy and boisterous. In its zeal to communicate itself to all who could participate in its pleasures, it not unfrequently broke out in that invincible ha! ha! ha! which the poet calls, "laughter holding both his sides."

"Queen of France, indeed!" cried he—"Noa, noa; I knows better than all that. Didn't I carry the portmanteau 'ter the doctor? And didn't I see him hug the little un, and kiss it? And didn't I hear him say to Madam Neville, 'be a mother to it, Mary, for my sake?' Now, who talks of the Queen of France? Noa, noa,—this here bantling is no stich great things, depend on't. Why it's as clear as my name's Jenkins whose cub it is. Ay, ay, some folks should look at home a bit."

A lifting up of hands and eyes followed this sagacious harangue.

"Well! who would have thought it?" said one.

"Why, you might have guessed as much," said another. In short, Mrs. Apshenkins herself was struck with this evidence of the doctor's frailty; and, after many wise observations upon people seeing the mote in their brother's eye, and being insensible to the beam in their own, the party separated, fully convinced, that the little stranger was the illegitimate offspring of spring of Dr. Neville and nobody knew who.

'The doctor's sermon, on the following Sunday, confirmed the suspicion of his parishioners, for he chose the following text: "Judge not, lest ye be judged."

'Nod and winks, and sarcastic sippers, accompanied his exit from the churchyard; but it was not until Madam Neville's back was turned that these became evident. The buzz of many voices followed the departure of the doctor and his wife; and amongst the idle and dissipated, for such are to be found in most places, the innocent and unconscious Isabella Templeton was the vehicle by means of which scandal diffused the vague and thence more readily believed tale, of the guilt of one of the best of men.

'Thus we have discovered among the poor people of Oldenwood, all the elements of painful suspicion—that comfortable state of doubt, which leaves the mind embarrassed concerning the conduct and character of another. But what was the accusation? The appearance of an infant babe, of whose parentage Dr. Neville himself was ignorant. What was the evidence to support the accusation the poor people preferred against their vicar? The friendly language, "be a mother to it, Mary, for my sake." Yet were these incidents sufficient to trouble the repose of confidence these poor people placed in Dr. Neville; and their esteem lowered towards the good man, as from Sally Meadows's eldest girl the gossips learned, that, with time, his attachment to Isabella Templeton suggested.

We have devoted more room to this novel than we are accustomed to do in general, but we think our readers, on reading, will find it to justify our remarks, and will say 'Such is the World.'

A Holiday Letter for a Young Lady, expressive of her Duties when absent from School. By Mrs. J. A. Sargent. pp. 44. London, 1821.

The motto multum in parvo has seldom received a happier or more appropriate application than in speaking of the elegant bison, the 'Holiday Letter.' It breathes the pure spirit of Christianity, and inculcates the most excellent precepts for the guidance of those early blossoms of nature's fairest work, for whose use it is intended.

ORIGINAL STORY

ON WHICH

THE ROMANCE OF KENILWORTH IS FOUNDED.

At the west end of the Church of Camoor, (says Ashmole, in his Antiquities of Berkshire) are the ruins of a manor, anciently belonging as a cell or place of removal, as some report, to the monks of Abingdon. There is, also, in the said house, a chamber, called Dudley's Chamber, where the Earl of Leicester's wife was murdered, of which this is the story following:—

Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, a very goodly personage, and singularly well featured, being a great favourite to Queen Elizabeth, it was thought, and commonly reported, that had he been a bachelor or widower, the queen would have made him her husband; to this end, to free himself of all obstacles, he commands, or perhaps with fair flattering intreaties desires, his wife to repose herself here, at his servant Anthony Forster's house, who then lived in the aforesaid manor-house; and also prescribed to Sir Richard Varney, (a prompter to his design) at his coming hither, that he should first attempt to poison her, and if that did not take effect, then by any other way whatever to dispatch her. This, it seems, was proved by the report of Dr. Walter Bayly, sometime Fellow of New College, then living at Oxford, and professor of physic in that university, who, because he would not consent to take away her life by poison, the earl endeavoured to displace from the court. This man, it seems, reported for most certain; that there was a practice in Cumoor among the conspirators to have poisoned this young lady, a little before she was killed, which was attempted after this manner. They seeing the good lady sad and heavy, (as one that well knew by her other handling that her death was not far off,) began to persuade her that the present disease was abundance of melancholy and other humours, &c. and, therefore, would needs counsel her to take some potion, which she absolutely refused to do, as still suspecting the worst; whereupon they sent a messenger on a day (unaware to her) for Dr. Bayly, and intreated him to persuade her to take some little potion by his direction, and they would fetch the same at Oxford, meaning to have added something of their own for her comfort, as the doctor upon just cause and consideration did suspect, seeing their great importunity, and the small need the lady had of a physician, and therefore, he peremptorily denied their request, misdoubting, (as he afterwards reported,) least if they had poisoned her under the name of his potion, he might have been hanged for a colour of their sin; and the doctor remained still well assured, that this way taking no effect, she would not escape their violence, which afterwards happened thus:—For Richard Varney, above said, (the chief projector in this design,) who, by the earl's order, remained that day of her death alone with her, with one man only, and Forster, who had that day forcibly sent away all her servants to Abingdon market, about three miles distant from this place, (they I say, whether first stifling her, or else strangling her) afterwards flung her down a pair of stairs, and broke her neck, using much violence upon her; but, however, though it was vulgarly reported that she by chance fell down stairs, (but yet without hurting her hood that was upon her head,) yet the inhabitants will tell you there, that she was conveyed from her usual chamber where she lay, to another where the bed's head of the chamber stood close to a privy postern door, where they in the night came and stifled her in the bed, bruised her head very much, broke her neck, and at length flung her down stairs, thereby believing the world would have thought it a mischance, and so have blinded their villainy. But behold the mercy and justice of God in revenging and discovering this lady's murder; for one of the persons that was a coadjutor in this murder, was afterwards taken for a felony in the marshes of Wales, and offering to publish the manner of the aforesaid murder, was privately made away in the prison by the earl's appointment. And Sir Richard Varney, the other dying about the same time in London, cried miserably, and blasphemed God, and said to a person of note (who hath related the same to others since) not long before his death, that all the devils in hell did tear him to pieces. Forster, likewise, after this fact, being a man formerly addicted to hospitality, company, mirth, and music, was afterwards observed to forsake all this with much melancholy and pensiveness (some say with madness) pined and drooped away. The wife also of Bald Butter, kinsman to the earl, gave out the whole fact a little before his death. Neither are these following passages to be forgotten, that as soon as ever she was murdered, they made great haste to bury her, before the coroner had given in his inquest, (which the earl himself condemned as not done advisedly,) which her father or Sir John Robertsett, (as I suppose,) hearing of, came with all speed thither, caused her corpse to be taken up, the coroner to sit upon her, and for inquiry to be made concerning this business to the full, but it was generally thought that the earl stopped his mouth, and made up the business between them; and the good earl, to make plain to the world the great love he bore to her when alive, what a grief the loss of so virtuous a lady was to his tender heart, caused (though the thing by these and other means was beaten into the heads of the principal men of the University of Oxford) her body to be re-buried in St. Mary's Church, in Oxford, with great pomp and solemnity. It is remarkable, when Dr. Babington, the earl's chaplain, did preach the funeral sermon, he tript once or twice in his speech, by recommending to their memories that virtuous lady so pitifully murdered, instead of saying pitifully slain. This earl, after all his murders and poisonings, was himself poisoned by that which was prepared for others, (some say by his wife), at Corburey Lodge, before mentioned, though Baker, in his Chronicle, would have it at Killingworth, Anno 1588.

Original Criticisms

ON
The Principal Performers of the Theatres
Royal Drury Lane & Covent Garden.

No. IX.—Mrs. W. WEST.

Divine perfection of a woman.—SHAKESPEARE.

It must be confessed that all, but more especially female dramatic talent, is at a very low ebb. Still we have some clever performers among the softer sex; none of them however, in the tragic department at least, possess half the genius or cultivation of the lady before us:—although Mrs. West is much inferior to Miss O'Neil, she undoubtedly possesses much merit; her whole appearance is admirably adapted for tragic expression, and, 'Her fair large front, and eye sublime, declare absolute rule.'—In this lady, we recollect a very pretty girl, of the name of Cooke, who performed some years ago, in rather subordinate characters, at Covent Garden; time, however, has considerably improved her powers, and on her appearance at Drury Lane, in Desdemona, we hailed her as a very promising actress. The character has usually been played by any pretty puppet; our heroine, however, raised it to its proper rank, and gave it that interest, which it so justly requires. But if we were much pleased with her in Desdemona, in Belvidera she proved herself the possessor of talents which we had no idea belonged to her. She presented us with a picture of the sorrows of the virtuous wife, in which vigour and delicacy were felicitously blended. There was sometimes a redundancy of action, but the performance on the whole inspired universal interest. Her alarm and distraction, on being delivered to the conspirators, were expressed with energy and nature, and, in the scene, in which she is deserted by Jaffier, she was entitled to the same praise. The manner in which she replied to the charge, 'Would she have e'er betrayed her Brutus?' 'No.—For Brutus trusted her,' was most just and forcible; her sudden start and exclamation at, 'How parting, parting!' the exquisite tenderness of her supplications, and the despairing look and tone with which she utters, 'Oh my poor heart, when wilt thou break!' and the rapturous joy, with which she turns, on hearing her husband return, and rushes into his arms, were excellent; and in her mad scene, she was, if possible, greater. The manner in which she repeated the words, 'For ever,' thrilled the whole house; nor was the last scene less effective, particularly during the recital of the death of Jaffier: the frantic vagueness of her attention, the wildness of her look, the quivering of her lip, and the scream of horror, when the light broke in upon her mind, carried tragic horror to its highest pitch. The dying scene which followed was likewise terribly faithful. We did not expect, that her Lady Macbeth would be successful, nor were we in the result, agreeably disappointed. She gave us a correct, but very feeble outline of the character, merely the declamation of the part correct—as to tones and attitudes only; she did not enter into or express the feelings, which belong to the several variations of the character, as it proceeds through its different gradations. We have not, however, a single actress who can perform Lady Macbeth, even tolerably; Mrs. West's performance therefore, making due allowance for the difficulty of a faithful representation, is entitled to a lenient consideration. She performed Hermione with increased claims to public approbation, and produced some good points in the insignificant character of Tarquinia. In Lady Anne, she was extremely successful, though the part is quite unworthy of her genius. In Lady Towney, she delighted us; an interesting countenance, a fine figure, and harmonious voice, are great qualifications for this character; Mrs. West possesses these in an eminent degree, and adds to them grace, ease, sprightliness, elegance, and feeling; in the playful scenes with her husband, she was highly successful; indeed, we think that few can surpass her in the higher walks of comedy. In Mrs. Beverley, (particularly in the third act,) she is highly interesting; it is one of those exquisite touches of pathos, that insinuates itself through the throbbing pulses of every heart, and entirely subdues an auditory. Her Mrs. Haller, though much inferior to Mrs. Siddons, or Miss O'Neil's, deserves great commendation, especially in her interview with her husband, in which she displayed workings of a very superior genius. She plays Portia very elegantly, and recites the celebrated apostrophe to mercy, exquisitely.

It is a glaring act of injustice to this lady, to fix her in such characters as Angelina, in 'Love makes a Man;' Pocatontas, or the Indian Princess; Miss Anagon, in the comedy of 'Wanted a Wife,' &c. &c., and to make her the heroine of such melo-dramas as the 'Jew of Lubek,' 'The Heroine, or a Daughter's Courage,' and fifty others of the same nature, which have been in themselves too contemptible to run more than two or three nights at the utmost. To our certain knowledge, she has been put into at least twenty characters which a second-rate actress would have disdained; into feeble paltry parts, utterly unworthy of her unquestionably great talents; we again repeat, that our first tragic actress should not appear too frequently, and yet scarcely a night elapses but we see her name in the play-bills, and too frequently in mediocre characters. Her Jane Shore is extremely affecting; nothing can exceed her excellence in the last scene. She is rather too vehement in some parts of Juliet; but, as a whole, it is a fine performance; the acknowledgment of her love, in the first garden scene, was not only fraught with fervent feeling, but with that delicacy of tone and manner, which forms one of its greatest charms. Her despair, when she learned that her husband is banished, and the cold vacant gaze with which she rose from her grave, were admirable; she exhibited a striking picture of her apprehended terror in the vault of her ancestors, and the highly poetical descriptive speech with which she drinks the friar's opiate, given with fine theatrical skill.

Cordelia is one of the most favourite of all Shakespeare's characters,—a suffering daughter, a daughter who sacrifices every thing for a father who had used her in the most cruel and unnatural manner, cannot fail of commanding our pity, admiration, and love. In the first scene with the old king, we thought her fully equal to Miss O'Neil; we cannot say that she carried this excellence throughout the whole character: still, there were some exquisite touches, particularly on meeting with Edgar on the heath; her kind solicitude, her affectionate attention to her father on his awakening from his trance, are entitled to the warmest commendation; we confess, on the whole, we were excessively delighted. In the tragedy of 'Bertram,' she performs the character of Imogen with her accustomed excellence: the part, however, as to effect, overdoes itself: the situation in which she is placed by her infidelity, is truly tragic, but the pomp of declamation, and the profusion of ornament, prevent it from producing its proper effect on the feelings; still, at intervals, when nature bursts the fetters of art, and the dialogue assumes an air of simplicity, Mrs. West availed herself of the favourable moments to disclose her powers. The picture which she drew of her despair was highly affecting, and her death admirably managed.—In several passages of Adelgitha, she was greeted not only with applause, but with enthusiasm; the pride, disdain, and remorse of the character, she expressed with much force, nor was she deficient in the tender scenes,—her first interview with Michael Ducas was excellent,—her relation to her husband of her own story, as that of another, was given with profound feeling,—upon the whole, it was certainly very far superior to the effect of Mrs. Bunn in the same character. We will not be so unjust as to forget her admirably pathetic representation of the sorrows of the tender virtuous Cora, or her inimitable performance of Julia, in the new tragedy of 'Montalto': her first interview with her husband was replete with affection and tenderness; the attitude in which she placed herself while deprecating Montalto's vague and unreasonable jealousy, and the whole of her concluding scene, were beyond praise.

Our best wishes attend Mrs. West, whom we consider a charming and most improving actress, and an extremely valuable ornament to Drury Lane Theatre. We have all, even the youngest of us, seen a finer tragic actress, but we have no one now on the stage who possesses half her merit; her excellence in several characters has been such, as fully to justify us in availing ourselves of the exclamation used by old Quin, on Mrs. Bellamy's unexpected success—'Thou art a charming creature, and the true spirit is in thee.'

Original Poetry.

LOVE TOKENS COST MONEY.

I'll not regret the joys I knew,
(Dost thou thyself, I prithee ?)
Though some of them, and not a few,
Were lovely when shared with these.

I'll not regret hope's faded flower,
Nor think on vanished blisses,
Nor call to mind joy's fleeting hour
To glad one dark as this is.

What's past I will not praise nor blame,
Nor sigh for what it lost me;
I'll not regret my early flame,
Nor all the pangs it cost me.

I will not ask thy love's return,
And so, my girl, content thee;
The only things I really mourn
Are presents which I sent thee!

J. W. DALRY.

STANZAS.

CALM was my early morn of life,
As a fair summer sky;
Yet, ere that morn had pass'd away,
Full many a cloud was nigh.

The hopes I treasur'd, long ago,
Have all proved false and vain;
And forms, that once were very dear,
I think of now with pain.

This world of mingled bliss and woe
Has lost its charm for me;
My eye in all its scenes of mirth
No pleasure now can see.

Yet there is one for whose sweet sake
I want and woe would share;
And ever watch his infant hours
With all a mother's care.

My child! thou dost not know my love;
'Twill cost me much to part;
For there is naught can ever tear
Thy image from my heart.

Where'er, in after times, thou art,
Be it on land or sea;
Thy mother's first and warmest prayer
Will ever be for thee. ELIZA.

TO VIRTUOUS BEAUTY.

I WILL not say how young thy life,
Thy heart, how suited for a wife!
I will not praise thy head of hair,
And cry how fine thine eye-brows are!
How dimples play about thy chin!
How blushing and how fair thy skin!
What odours pass thy teeth of white,
And tender beaming leave thy night!
But trust th' unbiass'd choice to thee,
If thou wilt love and marry me.

I have not told thee how thy heart
Can sympathise and bear a part
With those who grieve, in woe's distress,
To be so far from happiness;
I have not said that orphans' cries
Can drown the pupils of thine eyes,
That angry words and harsh control
Like sinful thoughts disturb thy soul;
But leave it to thyself to be
A judge if I am worthy thee.

Were I to tell thee, thou art praised;
What strange emotions love has rais'd!
What suitors, letters, strife, and woe,
Hearts of my sex must undergo!
Thou would'st not but smile and think me such
As those who vainly say too much;—
Try me and prove my value,—then
Survey me in thy love again;
If, after this, deserving thee,
Sigh thy consent and married be. J. R. P.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—Arne's serious opera of Antizares has been thrice repeated, since our last, to houses crowded to the very ceiling. Warmly as we spoke in praise of the talents of Miss Wilson, yet her subsequent exertions have given us a still higher opinion of her powers. Her first performance developed the compass of her voice, and the skill and taste which she possessed, but it remained for future efforts to display her astonishing powers, and the energetic and delightful variety of her resources. We never saw an audience so enraptured as those of Saturday and Tuesday nights. Her execution of 'Monster away' proved her to be almost as excellent an actress as a singer, a combination of talent so rare on the stage. In 'The Soldier tir'd,' her musical skill, tasteful decoration, and powerful notes had the amplest range of action, and the performance was perfect throughout. In its highest flight the voice was as clear and fine as if it were making but an ordinary effort; and, what was still more surprising, the lady rushed into this elevated excellence with the utmost rapidity. The song was encored; the pit and galleries standing up, huzzaing, and waving their hats for some minutes. It was called for a third time, but a portion of the audience feeling for the great exertion of the actress, resisted it. The fame of Miss Wilson is now fully established, and we look forward with pleasure to many a happy night in hearing her delightful strains. The next character in which she will appear will be Rosetta, in the opera of Love in a Village.

Miss Wilson, we understand, is not yet eighteen years of age. She has been instructed in elocution and acting by Mr. Alvey. Her present engagement with Mr. Elliston is extremely liberal; it is 800 guineas for forty nights. We trust that she will long be retained at this theatre, where her first exertions have been crowned with such success.

COVENT GARDEN.—In speaking of vocal performers, we must not forget a great favourite, Miss Stephens, whose return to her engagement we had omitted to notice. She is in excellent health, and her voice possesses all that sweetness and native simplicity, combined with great powers, which first recommended her to so high a rank in the public favour. She has performed the characters of Zeliada, in The Slave, and Diana Vernon, in Rob Roy, with her accustomed excellence; she is, however, much in want of support at this theatre, where there is no eminent male singer.

We learn with much pleasure, that an attractive novelty is forthcoming at this theatre—a lady to sustain Miss O'Neil's line of acting. Her first appearance will be in the character of Isabella. The name of the young lady is Dance, and report says she is exquisitely beautiful, and possesses great talents.

SURRY THEATRE.—Several novelties have been produced here since our last; on Monday, was presented the lively burletta of Figaro, or the Lady and the Page, in which the part of Susan was sustained by a Mrs. Young, with much spirit, her first appearance in London; and that of Agnes, by Miss Wells, who had never appeared before on any stage—the character is of a very minor description, but enabled her to introduce a song, which she sang with considerable sweetness. On the same evening, a new comic piece, entitled, The Blue Baron, or over the Bridge, was played with great humour; in which Fitzwilliam, Wyatt, and Miss Copeland were the principal performers; their characters, of the broadest farcical description, enabled them to keep the house in perpetual laughter, and the whole performance met with the warmest approbation.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—Two new dramatic pieces, entitled, Tossed in a Blanket, or Law without Study, and Twelve Precisely, have been brought out with considerable eclat. The former, attributed to the pen of Mr. Dibden, is a humorous farce, written with considerable spirit, but not one of the best class of that gentleman's productions. The latter appears to have been written expressly to suit the versatile talents of Mrs. W. S. Chatterly, who assumes several disguises, and supports them with great spirit. The Christmas pantomime, Tom the Piper's Son, still maintains its ground, and affords room for a pugilistic exhibition, which, though possessing no interest to our taste, seems to afford very great satisfaction to the major part of the audience.

TO READERS & CORRESPONDENTS.

'THE FAMILY TRUNK,' No. 1, in our next.
The Author of the 'Lines on Miss O'Neil's retirement from the Stage,' possesses some practical talent; but it should be more cultivated before he ventures to appear in print. From the following couplet, we suspect he is of the sister kingdom:—
'Shall in remembrance spread around this tale;
She's great, but ne'er shall equal Miss O'Neil.'
E. G. B. and J. B. O'M. have been received.
Mr. Dalby, J. R. P., and J. D., are requested to send to our office for letters.

A contemporary, who is never remarkable for modesty when speaking of himself, says, he 'defies any thing like competition,' and refers to his last number as a fair specimen of his work. We take him at his word, and offering the corresponding number of the Literary Chronicle in competition, leave the decision to that public which can best appreciate their relative merits.

Containing a Narrative of the Progress of the Rebellion, from its commencement to the Battle of Culloden: the Characters of the principal Persons engaged in it, and Anecdotes respecting them, and various important Particulars relating to that Contest, hitherto either unknown or imperfectly understood. Translated from a French MS. originally deposited in the Scots' College at Paris. 4to. pp. 348. London, 1820.

NOTWITHSTANDING the time that has elapsed since the rebellion of 1745, and the numerous historical accounts of it already existing, the narrative of an eye-witness holding a sufficient rank to enable him to become acquainted not only with the principal events, but the secret springs by which they were occasioned, could not even now fail to excite considerable interest, if related fairly and impartially. Such, however, is not the case with the Chevalier de Johnstone, who, perhaps, mortified at the disastrous result of an enterprise from which he hoped much, lays the whole blame on his prince, to whom he denies the possession of any talents or of a single virtue. The editor of these Memoirs goes still farther in his abuse of the unfortunate Charles, one of the last descendants of an illustrious race, whose misfortunes entitled him at least to pity, if not to respect.

Rejoicing, as we do, at the result of an expedition which lighted up the torch of civil war in our isle, and was intended to dethrone a family much endeared to the country by the mildness of their sway, we cannot attribute the failure to the illustrious adventurer alone; for, although his numerous followers were many of them faithful unto death, yet it is well known that considerable jealousies existed among several of the most distinguished clans, which it was difficult to suppress; and hence that want of union and cordiality, without which no enterprise can succeed. But, admitting Charles did not possess those commanding talents, so essential to such an adventure, yet it is cruel and in defiance of the evidence of facts, to reproach him with a total want of personal courage. If the Pretender had been the coward he is described, he would not have quitted the luxurious ease in which he had lived, (for he was a sensualist,) to undertake so hazardous an enterprise with such slender means as he did; nor do we believe that any talents could, under all the difficulties he had to encounter, have ensured his success. The love of peace and the tranquillity of nearly half a century, had consolidated the power of the House of Hanover, and created a strong attachment to their cause, while the recollection of the oppressive policy of the Stuarts was too much cherished to permit their having many partisans in England. Quitting, however, all disquisitions as to what the Pretender could or could not have done, we come now to speak of what he and his followers did, as detailed in these Memoirs; but first, a word or two of the author.

The Cheralier de Johnstone was the only son of James Johnstone, a merchant in Edinburgh, who, by descent and alliance, was connected with some of the first houses in Scotland. In his youth, the Chevalier moved in the best society in the Scottish capital, and was very intimate with the well-known Lady Jane Douglas, mother of the present Lord Douglas. Educated in Episcopalian and Jacobite principles, on the first landing of Prince Charles Edward, he made his escape from Edinburgh to Duncrub, the seat of Lord Rollo, near Perth, where he waited the arrival of the prince in that town, and was one of the first low country gentlemen who flocked to his standard. He was introduced to the Duke of Perth and Lord George Murray, the leaders of the rebel army, and became aide-de-camp to the latter. He received a captain's commission, from the prince, immediately after the battle of Preston Pans, and afterwards raised a company, with which, when completed, he joined the Duke of Perth's regiment. He bore a part in all the movements of the rebel army; and, after the battle of Culloden, remained for some time in concealment in different parts of the north. He made his escape to England in the disguise of a Scots' pedlar, and, after remaining some time in London, he went to Holland, thence to Paris, where he obtained a share in the fund set apart by the government for Scots exiles. Tired of an inactive life, he entered the French service, and was sent to North America; but, on the conquest of their possessions by the English, he returned to France, where these Memoirs were written shortly after his return. Though in many respects they are inaccurate, and in all written with very strong prejudices, yet they contain much interesting information respecting the events and the individuals of that period. It is by no means our intention to give a history of the rebellion, or to trace its progress, but rather to select some of the passages in these Memoirs possessing the greatest novelty, or relating to events the most interesting. The character of one of the most distinguished of the rebel leaders, is thus drawn by the author:—

'Lord George Murray, who had the charge of all the details of our army, and who had the sole direction of it, possessed a natural genius for military operations, and was, indeed, a man of surprising talents, which, had they been cultivated by the study of military tactics, would unquestionably have rendered him one of the greatest generals of the age. He was tall and robust, and brave in the highest degree; conducting the Highlanders in the most heroic manner, and always the first to rush sword in hand into the midst of the enemy. He used to say, when we advanced to the charge, "I do not ask you, my lads, to go before, but merely to follow me,"—a very energetic harangue, admirably calculated to excite the ardour of the Highlanders, but which would sometimes have had a better effect from the mouth of the prince. He slept little, was continually occupied with all manner of details, and was altogether most indefatigable, combining and directing alone all our operations; in a word, he was the only person capable of conducting our army.

In the account of the battle of Preston Pans, where the rebel army gained their first important success, we have the following anecdote:—

“Macgregor’s company did great execution with their scythes. They cut the legs of the horses in two; their riders through the middle of their bodies. Macgregor was brave and intrepid, but at the same time altogether whimsical and singular. When advancing to the charge with his company, he received five wounds, two of them from balls, that pierced his body through and through. Stretched on the ground, with his head resting on his hand, he called out to the Highlanders of his company, “My lads, I am not dead! by G— I shall see if any one of you does not do his duty.” The Highlanders instantly fell on the flanks of the infantry, which being uncovered and exposed from the flight of the cavalry, immediately gave way. Thus, in less than five minutes, we obtained a complete victory, with a terrible carnage on the part of the enemy.”

The affair of this day is, we suspect, strongly exaggerated, particularly so far as relates to the conduct of the British troops. We are told that the English lost thirteen hundred killed, and fifteen hundred prisoners, and that the rebel army had only forty killed and as many wounded. The following anecdotes partake largely of the marvellous:—

“I saw,” says the author, “a young Highlander, about fourteen years of age, scarcely formed, who was presented to the prince as a prodigy, having killed. It was said, fourteen of the enemy. The prince asked him if this was true? “I do not know,” replied he, “if I killed them; but I brought fourteen soldiers to the ground with my sword.” Another Highlander brought ten soldiers to the prince, whom he had made prisoners, driving them before him like a flock of sheep. This Highlander, from a rashness without example, having pursued a party to some distance from the field of battle, along the road between the two inclosures, struck down the hindmost with a blow of his sword, calling, at the same time, “down with your arms.” The soldiers, terror struck, threw down their arms, without looking behind them, and the Highlander, with a pistol in one hand, and a sword in the other, made them do exactly as he pleased. The rage and despair of these men, on seeing themselves made prisoner by a single individual, may easily be imagined. These, however, were the same English soldiers who had distinguished themselves at Dutton and Fontenoy, and who might justly be ranked amongst the bravest troops of Europe!”

Cæsar is accused of having multiplied the number of the Britons, to increase the glory of having conquered them. The Chevalier Johnstone does more,—he not only increases the number, but gives them superior powers. Ten men of the bravest troops in Europe, well armed, taken prisoners by a single Highlander, with a sword in one hand and a pistol in another, is rather too much for a willing credence. We have already stated, that the chevalier, tired of the laborious duties of an aide-camp, raised a company of his own; this, it would seem, was no difficult task, if we may judge from the following rapid success in recruiting, when the rebel army had advanced into England:—

“One of my sergeants, named Dickson, whom I had enlisted from among the prisoners of war at Gladsmuir, a young Scotsman, as brave and intrepid as a lion, and very much attached to my interest, informed me, on the 27th, at Preston, that he had been beating up for recruits all day, without getting one; and that he was the more chagrined at this, as the other sergeants had had better success. He, therefore, came to ask my permission to get a day’s march a-head of the army, by setting out immediately for Manchester, a very considerable town of England, containing forty thousand inhabitants, in order to make sure of some recruits before the arrival of the army. I reproved him sharply for entertaining so wild and extravagant a project, which exposed him to the danger of being taken and hanged, and I ordered him back to his company. Having much confidence in him, I had given him a horse, and entrusted him with my portmanteau, that I might always have it with me. On entering my quarters in the evening, my landlady informed me that my servant had called and taken away my portmanteau and blunderbuss. I immediately bethought myself of his extravagant project, and his situation gave me much uneasiness. But on our arrival at Manchester, on the evening of the following day, the 29th, Dickson brought me about one hundred and eighty recruits, whom he had enlisted for my company.”

He had quitted Preston in the evening, with his mistress and my drummer; and having marched all night, he arrived next morning at Manchester, which is about twenty miles distant from Preston, and immediately began to beat up for recruits “for the yellow haired laddie.” The populace, at first, did not interrupt him, conceiving our army to be near the town; but, as soon as they knew that it would not arrive till the evening, they surrounded him in a tumultuous manner, with the intention of taking him prisoner, alive or dead. Dickson presented his blunderbuss, which was charged with slugs, threatening to blow out the brains of those who first dared to lay hands on himself or the two who accompanied him; and by turning round continually, facing in all directions, and behaving like a lion, he soon enlarged the circle, which a crowd of people had formed round them. Having continued for some time to manoeuvre in this way, those of the inhabitants of Manchester who were attached to the house of Stuart, took arms, and flew to the assistance of Dickson, to rescue him from the fury of the mob; so that he soon had five or six hundred men to aid him, who dispersed the crowd in a very short time. Dickson now triumphed in his turn; and, putting himself at the head of his followers, he proudly paraded undisturbed the whole day, with his drummer, enlisting for my company all who offered themselves.

On presenting me with a list of one hundred and eighty recruits, I was agreeably surprised to find that the whole amount of his expenses did not exceed three guineas. This adventure of Dickson gave rise to many a joke, at the expense of the town of Manchester, from the singular circumstance of its having been taken by a sergeant, a drummer, and a girl. This circumstance may serve to show the enthusiastic courage of our army, and the alarm and terror with which the English were seized.

The chevalier did not derive any advantage from these recruits, as they were transferred to what was called the Manchester regiment, composed entirely of English recruits, but which never exceeded three hundred men. These were all the English who ever declared themselves openly in favour of the Pretender. This fact gives little ground for believing the chevalier right in his conjecture, that had they defeated the Duke of Cumberland at Derby, the army of Finckley would have dispersed of its own accord; and that the rebels would have taken possession of London without the least resistance from the inhabitants, and without exchanging a single shot with the soldiers.

That the success of the rebel army created great consternation in London is certain, but we never before heard that King George the Second “ordered all his yachts, in which he had embarked all his most precious effects, to remain at the Tower quays, in readiness to sail at a moment’s warning.” This assertion is not supported by any contemporary writer, and yet the fact, if true, must have been well known.

We cannot, however, believe the hero of Dettingen could have been guilty of such pusillanimity. We shall not pursue the subject further, for the present, than by extracting the author's account of the battle of Falkirk. The rebels having made a rapid movement from Bannockburn, took the English army by surprise:—

‘ They immediately flew to arms, and with great precipitation ascended to a part of the height, between us and the tower of Falkirk. There was a high wind, accompanied by a heavy rain, which the Highlanders, by their position, had in their back, whilst it was full in the face of the English, who were blinded by it. They were, besides, incommoded with the smoke of our discharge; and the rain, getting into their pans, rendered the half of their muskets useless. The English fruitlessly attempted to gain the advantage of the wind; but the prince, attending to the left, took care to preserve this advantage, by corresponding movements on his part.

‘ General Hawley drew up his army in order of battle, in two lines, having three regiments of infantry in a hollow at the foot of the hill. His cavalry was placed before his infantry, on the left wing of the first line. The English began the attack, with a body of about eleven hundred cavalry, who advanced very slowly against the right of our army, and did not halt till they were within twenty paces of our first line, to induce us to fire. The Highlanders, who had been particularly enjoined not to fire till the army was within musket-length of them, the moment the cavalry halted, discharged their muskets, and killed about eighty men, each of them having aimed at a rider. The commander of this body of cavalry, who had advanced some paces before his men, was of the number. The cavalry closing their ranks, which were opened by our discharge, put spurs to their horses and rushed upon the Highlanders at a hard trot, breaking their ranks, throwing down every thing before them, and trampling the Highlanders under the feet of their horses. The most singular and extraordinary combat immediately followed. The Highlanders, stretched on the ground, thrust their dirks into the bellies of the horses. Some seized the riders by their clothes, dragged them down, and stabbed them with their dirks; several again used their pistols; but few of them had sufficient space to handle their swords. Macdonald, of Clanranald, chief of one of the clans of the Macdonalds, assured me, that whilst he was lying upon the ground, under a dead horse, which had fallen upon him, without the power of extricating himself, he saw a dismounted horseman struggling with a Highlander; fortunately for him, the Highlander, being the stronger, threw his antagonist, and having killed him with his dirk, he came to his assistance, and drew him with difficulty from under his horse.

‘ The resistance of the Highlanders was so incredibly obstinate, that the English, after having been for some time engaged pell-mell with them in their ranks, were at length repulsed, and forced to retire. The Highlanders did not neglect the advantage they had obtained, but pursued them keenly with their swords, running as fast as their horses, and not allowing them a moment's time to recover from their fright. So that the English cavalry, falling back on their own infantry, drawn up in order of battle behind them, threw them immediately into disorder, and carried the right wing of their army with them in their flight. The clan of Camerons, which was on the left of our army, having attacked at the same time the right of the English army, where there were only infantry, put it also to flight; but the Highlanders, when descending the hill in pursuit of the enemy, received, on their left flank, a discharge from the three regiments placed in the hollow at the foot of the hill, which they did not perceive till the moment they received their fire, which greatly incommoded them. Mr. John Roy Stuart, an officer in the service of France, afraid lest this might be an ambuscade laid for us by the English, called out to the Highlanders to stop their pursuit; and the cry of stop! flew immediately from rank to rank, and threw the whole army into disorder. However, the enemy continued their retreat, and the three regiments at the foot of the hill followed the rest; but with this difference, that they retreated always in order, and acting as a rear-guard of the English army, and they continued a fire of platoons on us till their entrance into the town of Falkirk.

‘ As night began to appear, the English army entered the town, and fires were immediately seen in every part of their camp, from which we all supposed that they had retreated to it, and that we had not obtained a complete and substantial victory. The honour of remaining masters of the field was of little avail to us. We had no reason for believing that we had lost the battle, as the English army had retreated; but as we supposed them still in their camp, we considered it, at most, as undecided, and expected a renewal of the combat next morning.

‘ Fortunately, the enemy did not perceive the disorder which had crept into our army, and of which Colonel John Roy Stuart was the innocent cause, by his excessive precaution and foresight. The Highlanders were in complete disorder, dispersed, and the different clans mingled pell-mell together; whilst the obscurity of the night aided greatly to the confusion. Many of them had even retired from the field of battle, either thinking it lost, or with the intention of seeking a shelter from the dreadful weather. It is often more dangerous to stop the fire and impetuosity of soldiers, of whom the best are but machines, and still more of undisciplined men, who do not listen to any orders, than to let them run every risk in order to carry every thing before them.

‘ I met, by accident, Colonel Brown, an Irishman, to whom I proposed, that we should keep together, and share the same fate. He consented, but observed at the same time, that the prince having made him the bearer of an order, he wished to find him, with the view of communicating an answer. After having sought the prince for a long time to no purpose, and without finding any one who could give us the least information respecting him, we fell in with his life-guards, in order of battle, near a cottage on the edge of the hill, with their commander, Lord Elcho, who knew as little of what had become of Charles as we did ourselves. As the night was very dark, and the rain incessant, we resolved to withdraw to the mansion of Mr. Primrose, of Dunipace, about a quarter of a league from Falkirk, having a crowd of Highlanders as guides, who took the same road.

‘ On our arrival at the castle, we found Lord Lewis Gordon, brother to the Duke of Gordon, Mr. Fraser, son of Lord Lovat, and six or seven other chiefs of clans; but none of them knew what had become of their regiments. Other officers arrived every instant, all equally ignorant of the fate of the battle, and equally in doubt whether we had gained or lost it. About eight o'clock in the evening, Mr. Macdonald of Lochgarry joined us, and revived our spirits, by announcing for certain, that we had gained a most complete victory; and that the English, instead of remaining in their camp, had fled in disorder to Edinburgh. He added, in confirmation of this news, that he had left the prince in Falkirk, in the quarters which had been occupied by General Hawley; and that the prince had sent him to Dunipace, for the express purpose of ordering all of us to repair to Falkirk next morning by break of day.

‘ It is impossible, without having been in our situation, to form an idea of the extreme joy which we derived from this agreeable surprise. As the enemy, in their retreat, had abandoned all their tents and baggage, their camp was soon pillaged by the Highlanders, and the booty carried away, notwithstanding the obscurity of the night and the badness of the weather. The enemy lost six hundred in killed, and we took seven hundred prisoners. It was Lord Kilmarnock who first discovered the flight of the English. Being well acquainted with the nature of the ground, as a part of his estates lay in the neighbourhood, he was sent by the prince to reconnoitre the English; and having approached the great road to Edinburgh, beyond the town of Falkirk, passing by bye paths and across fields, he saw the English army panic-struck, and flying in the greatest disorder, as fast as their legs could carry them. Lord Kilmarnock immediately returned to the prince, with an account of this fortunate discovery, who still remained on the field of battle, notwithstanding the dreadful wind and rain; but he then descended from the hill, about half-past seven o'clock in the evening, immediately entered the town of Falkirk, and detached as many troops as he could suddenly assemble, to harass the English in their flight, who were yet at a short distance from us.

'The enemy were unable to avail themselves of their artillery during the action, and to carry it with them in their flight; and we found, next day, ten field pieces, half way up the hill, which they had not time to draw up to the top. They lost a great many men in the hollow at the foot of the hill, where the corn-fields were thickly strewn with dead bodies. In their flight they took one prisoner, in a very singular manner. Mr. Macdonald, a major of one of the Macdonald regiments, having dismounted an English officer, took possession of his horse, which was very beautiful, and immediately mounted it. When the English cavalry fled, the horse ran off with the unfortunate Mr. Macdonald, notwithstanding all his efforts to restrain him; nor did it stop till it was at the head of the regiment, of which, apparently, its master was the commander. The melancholy, and at the same time ludicrous figure, which poor Macdonald would cut, when he thus saw himself the victim of his ambition to possess a fine horse, which ultimately cost him his life upon the scaffold, may be easily conceived.'

Journal of the Visit of Her Majesty the Queen, to Tunis, Greece, and Palestine; written by Louise Demont. With other corresponding Papers, collected in Switzerland, and translated by Edgar Garston. 8vo. pp. 84. London, 1821.

WE presume that our readers are pretty well acquainted with the character of Miss Demont, the soi-disant Countess of Colombier, whose depositions on a late important investigation excited so much interest. In the course of the examination which this intriguing chambermaid underwent in the House of Lords, it transpired that she had kept a Journal of Her Majesty's travels, which, while circulated in MS. had attracted much notice in Switzerland, among those who were acquainted with the writer. Some copies of this Journal had been taken, and Mr. Garston, who officiated as interpreter at the Queen's trial, was, during a recent visit to Switzerland, enabled to procure a copy, from which this translation is made.

This Journal possesses no other interest than what it derives from the peculiar circumstances under which it has been written and produced. It is a very dry narrative, interspersed with common-place notices of the places visited, and the events connected with them. If, however, in addition to the exposure which Demont suffered in the House of Lords, any other proof were wanting of her ingratitude and treachery to her royal mistress, it would be found in the following almost impious passage, which appears in this Journal, in the account of the Queen's entry into Jerusalem:—

'At three o'clock in the afternoon, we broke up our tents, and the same evening, at nine o'clock, reached Jerusalem. At our entry, the people assembled in crowds to see the Princess of Wales, who rode upon an ass. This circumstance recalled to me strongly the Day of Palm, (Palm Sunday,) on which our Saviour made, in the same manner, his entry into Jerusalem. I imagined I beheld him, and inwardly made comparisons: for assuredly, if any one can in any way resemble our great Saviour, it is this excellent princess. She is, like him, charitable, mild, and beneficent to all; she has suffered much, and always supports her misfortunes with great patience and resignation; and, like him, she has not deserved them.'

The lady is quite devout when speaking of Jerusalem, and strongly recommends a new crusade, to rescue the Holy Sepulchre from the infidels. One of the best passages is the account of her Majesty's reception at Tunis. She says,—

'On the 12th, her Royal Highness went to pay a visit to the Bey, at his country residence. All the Turkish officers accompanied her, and on the road went through a very pretty manœuvre to entertain her. They galloped forward with their horses, which seemed rather to fly than to run; when advanced to some distance, they wheeled round, and returned with the velocity of lightning, discharging their muskets, and exhibiting a sham fight together. It is difficult to conceive how a man, mounted on a fiery horse, swift as the wind, can load his piece and discharge it with so much facility; but such is their manner of carrying on war. In other respects, they are very cowardly, and a Christian need not fear an encounter with thirty Turks. Their uniform nearly made us expire with laughter; they looked like so many old women; some had white head-dresses (a papillions), others had grey handkerchiefs fastened on the head, and cloaks, made like mantillas, on their shoulders, with large wooden boots on their legs. During a journey of three miles, we were much diverted with this masquerade.

We then arrived at the palace of the Bey, who received her Royal Highness. Her Royal Highness had the kindness to present us to him; after a short conversation, (they conversed in Italian,) he took the Princess by the hand, and conducted her into his seraglio. She commanded us to follow her; the gentlemen remained in the hall, it being forbidden for any man to enter the seraglio, under pain of death. We were introduced into a magnificent room: the women were dressed with incredible splendour, being loaded with gold, diamonds, and precious stones; their legs were uncovered, and their ancles encircled with diamond chains; their fingers covered with rich rings, and the tips of their painted black. The Princess seated herself with the Bey and his first wife, upon rich cushions; five wives, of the rank of slaves, presented napkins, wrought with gold; and afterwards, the richest collation that can be pictured was served to them; there were full two hundred different dishes, all served upon gold. After the repast, the slaves brought their finest perfumes, and sprinkled us with them from head to foot; our dresses have not even yet lost the scent. The Bey ordered music to be brought. Six old women commenced playing a sort of charivari, which deafened our hearing, but it was the most excellent melody of the Turkish court; and the old women were the most perfect of its songstresses. Afterwards, the eldest son of the Bey, (he who is now reigning,) took her Royal Highness by the hand, and conducted her into his own seraglio, whither also we followed her. That of the son is more extensive than that of the father, and contains more women; but they were not so richly dressed, with the exception of his wife, who was very beautiful, as was also that of the second son. The ceremonies with which we were received in the first seraglio, were repeated in this; the women crowded round us, and appeared delighted to see us. Unfortunate creatures! we were undoubtedly the first strangers whom they had seen since they were first immured, like encaged birds, in these cloisters. When once the doors of the mansion are closed upon them, they step forth no more, and meet the eye of no one, save the princess, by whom they are treated like slaves. When the princess enters, they all hasten to kiss their hands; it is the only favour enjoyed by them. They are enormously fat, and those who are the most bulky are esteemed the most beautiful; and even scarcely looked at. They are constantly guarded and watched by eunuchs; thus I look upon them as buried alive. It is said that there are five hundred in the palace of Tunis.'

At Athens, her Royal Highness gave two balls to the Grecian ladies:—
'Their manner of dancing is insipid to the last degree, (pour mourir d'ennui). They are not permitted to dance with the gentlemen, but merely among themselves; and their dance consists of nothing more than taking each other's hand, and turning. The first, or the one who dances best, holds a handkerchief in her hand, which she constantly waves; the accompanying music is simply, la, la, la, la, la, la, and la, la, la, without variety. Added to this, their want of grace makes one fancy them puppets, moved by wires. The lower rank of women wear a head-dress, composed of a silver coin, called barras, which is equivalent to a raps of Switzerland; they have also necklaces of the same materials; the coins are pierced in the centre, and placed on an iron wire. The women who are more wealthy, wear gold coins in the same style, and in great profusion. Both the poor and the wealthy unstring them, when they have no other money, or in preference to borrowing, and distribute to the many poor who offer themselves every where, and invariably limit their petition to a barras.

There is not a word about Mahomet's Moorish Dance, nor the slightest charge of impropriety against the Queen, in the whole of this narrative, which is in a style so stiff as to give a much less favourable opinion of Demout's talents, than her letters produced during the Queen's trial had created.

Endless Amusement; a Collection of nearly four hundred entertaining Experiments, in various Branches of Science. To which is added a complete System of Pyrotechny. Second Edition. 12mo. pp. 216. London, 1821.

Philosophical Recreations, or Winter Amusements; a Collection of entertaining and surprising Experiments in Mechanics, Arithmetic, Optics, Hydrostatics, Hydraulics, Pneumatics, Electricity, Chemistry, and Pyrotechny. &c. &c. 12mo. pp. 200. London, 1821.

'Endless Amusement!!!—Was there ever a more fatiguing title to a book? We read, in Shakespeare, of 'a consummation devoutly to be wished'—The zealous divine tells us that 'the end of all things is at hand.' Philosophers advise us, 'in the exercise of the mean, to keep the end in view'; and yet, though we love to arrive at the end of the week, the end of our cares, of our follies, our years, and our journeys, a little 'collection' of practical and experimental philosophy professes to insure us endless amusement. But we are not to be so misled by outward attraction. This book, as a collection, contains many useful recipes, and it also contains many useless and impracticable, or, at least, dear experiments; and, with all our love of science, we are quite satisfied with the accompanying volume, which, with more rationality, is called 'Philosophical Recreations, or Winter Amusements.'

The choicest fruits of the labours of Boyle, Gregory, Joyce, Wilkins, Accum, and others, form the matter and value of both collections. It would be fair and sincere were their editors to give the respective authorities. Books, like acts of parliament, are enhanced by authority. But poachers and empirics carry on their calling without constituted authority: ergo, they avoid the light of truth, and too often escape the sword of justice. We will not, however, quarrel about the definite or indefinite period of enjoyment stated; but, as these works are precisely similar in their nature, appearance, and tendency, we shall endeavour to entertain our readers by offering them five or six of the least common things, as we imagine, which are likely to afford 'endless amusement' or 'philosophical recreation.'

'Method of giving to Plaster of Paris Figures the Appearance of Marble.—One ounce of Windsor soap being grated is to be put into four fluid pounds of clear water, and dissolved in a well glazed earthen vessel. Then add of white bees' wax one ounce, cut into thin slices, and, as soon as the whole is incorporated, the compost is fit for use. Having dried the figure well before the fire, suspend it by a wire of twine, and dip it once in the varnish; upon taking it out, the moisture will appear to have been absorbed: in two minutes time stir the compost, and dip it a second time, and this generally suffices. Put it aside from dust for a week; then, with a bit of soft muslin rag or cotton wool, rub the figure gently, when a most brilliant gloss will be produced. Great care, however, is necessary to avoid a brasion of the coat of varnish, which would render the labour useless, and the figure would require dipping again.'

'Withered Fruit restored.—Take a shrivelled apple, and placing it under the receiver, exhaust the air. The apple will immediately be plumped up, and look as fresh as when first gathered; for this reason, that the pressure of the external air being taken off, the air in the apple extends it; so much, indeed, that it will sometimes burst. If the air is let into the receiver, the apple will be restored to its pristine shrivelled state.'

'Never-yielding Cement.—Calcareous shells, pound them, sift them through a silk sieve, and grind them on porphyry till they are reduced to the finest powder. Then take the whites of several eggs, according to the quantity of the powder; and, having mixed them with the powder, form them into a kind of paste. With this paste join the pieces of china, or glass, and press them together for seven or eight minutes. This cement will stand both heat and water, and will never give way, even if the article should, by accident, fall to the ground.'

'To remove Stains and Blemishes from Prints.—Paste a piece of paper to a very smooth clear table that the boiling water, used in the operation, may not acquire a colour which might lessen its success. Spread out the print you wish to clean upon the table, and sprinkle it with boiling water; taking care to moisten it throughout by very carefully applying a very fine sponge. After you have repeated this process five or six times you will observe the stains or spots extend themselves, but this is only a proof that the dirt begins to be dissolved.

'After this preparation, lay the print smoothly and carefully into a copper or wooden vessel, larger than the size of the print. Then cover it with a boiling ley of potash, taking care to keep it hot as long as possible. After the whole is cooled, strain off the liquor, take out the print with care, spread it on stretched cord, and, when half dry, press it between leaves of white paper to prevent wrinkles.

'By this process, spots and stains, of any kind, will be effectually removed.'

'To take Impressions of Coins, Medals, &c.—Cut fish glue, or isinglass, into small pieces, immerse it in clear water, and set it on a slow fire; when gradually dissolved, let it boil slowly, stirring it with a wooden spoon, and taking off the scum. The liquor being sufficiently adhesive, take it off the fire, let it cool a little, and then pour it on the medal or coin you wish to copy, having first rubbed the coin over with oil. Let the composition lay about the thickness of a crown piece on the medal. Then set it in a moderate air, neither too hot nor too cold; let it cool and dry; when it is dry, it will loosen itself: you will find the impression correct, and the finest strokes expressed with the greatest accuracy.

'You may give a more pleasing effect to the composition by mixing any colour with it, red, yellow, blue, green, &c.; and, if you add a little parchement size to it, it will make it harder and better. This size is made by gently simmering the cuttings of clear white parchement in a pipkin, with a little water, till it becomes adhesive.'

'The Art of Bronzing.—Bronzing is that process by which figures of plaster of paris, wood, &c. are made to have the appearance of copper or brass. The method is as follows:—

'Dissolve copper filings in aqua-fortis. When the copper has impregnated the acid, pour off the solution, and put into it some pieces of iron, or iron filings. The effect of this will be to sink the powder to the acid. Pour off the liquor and wash the powder in successive quantities of fresh water: when the powder is dry, it is to be rubbed on the figure with a soft cloth, or piece of leather; but observe that, previously to the application of the bronze powder, a dark blackish sort of green is first to be laid on the figure; and, if you wish the powder to adhere stronger, mix it with gum water, lay it on like paint, with a camel's hair brush, or previously trace the parts to be bronzed with gold size; and, when nearly dry, rub the powder over it.

The Camelon Spirit.—Put into a decanter volatile spirit, in which you have dissolved copper filings, and it will produce a fine blue. If the bottle is stopped the colour will disappear; but, when unstopped, it will return. This experiment may be often repeated.

A Lamp that will burn twelve Months without replenishing.—Take a stick of phosphorus and put it into a large dry phial, not corked, and it will afford a light sufficient to discern any object in a room, when held near it. The phial should be kept in a cool place, where there is no great current of air, and it will continue its luminous appearance for more than twelve months.

Three Objects discernible only with both eyes.—If you fix three pieces of paper against the wall of a room, at equal distances, at the height of your eye, placing yourself directly before them, at a few distances, and close your right eye, and look at them with your left, you will see only two of them, suppose the first and second; alter the position of your eye, and you will see the second and third, but never the whole three together; by which it appears, that a person who has only one eye can never see three objects placed in this position, nor all the parts of one object, of the same extent, without altering the situation of his eye.

To form Figures in Relief on an Egg.—Design on the shell any figure or ornament, you please, with melted tallow, or any other fat oily substance; then immerse the egg in very strong vinegar, and let it remain till the acid has corroded that part of the shell which is not covered with the greasy matter; those parts will then appear in relief, exactly as you have drawn them.

We shall not make any further extracts, as those already quoted are sufficient to explain the nature and character of both these works, which, though intended for juvenile readers, may afford an agreeable recreation to children of a larger growth. We should add, that there are several figures in a sheet to illustrate the most curious experiments, in each of these volumes; but we think them, like Hodge's razors, not made for use, but to sell: the sine qua non of literary traders in pictures of castles &c. &c. &c.

The Tutor's Assistant; being a Compendium of Arithmetic, and a complete Question Book. By Francis Walkington. A new Edition. By the Rev. T. Smith. 12mo. pp. 208. London, 1821.

We do not know that we have any business to review this work, a copy of it having been sent, under an envelope, to the Literary Gazette and including a review by the author, addressed to the Literary Chronicle. Be this as it may, we cannot but feel pain in seeing industry, united with some talent, stoop to the tricks of charlatanry; such conduct, in our opinion, is highly to be condemned; and we recommend to the Rev. T. Smith to have more confidence in future in his own merits, and in the justice of the critical press.

Les Trois Ages; ou, les Jeux Olympiques, L'Amphithéâtre, et la Chevalerie.

The three Ages, or the Olympic Games, the Amphitheatre, and Chivalry. 12mo. pp. 288. Paris.

POETRY is the language of inspiration, and the moment verse ceases to inspire it ceases to be poetry: this grand and simple truth seems to be an impenetrable secret to thousands who sip at Helicon; they fancy that a certain number of syllables, strung together like rows of beads in pairs, is poetry, merely because they assign that name to it; but they are woefully mistaken, as their still-born productions prove.

True poetry possesses a different character; it assumes a simple fact, clothes it in the richest drapery, places it, as it were, on the throne, and surrounds it with a brilliant court to which you are invited; you assist in person; and, while your imagination is churned with the ravishing scenes presented to you, your mind partakes of all the emotions the poet wishes to inspire, and your understanding is, invisibly enlightened. Such was the aim of poetry in ancient times; but ah! how has it degenerated; yet the sacred fire is not lost; were a proof of it wanting, we could proudly refer to the volume before us, and we cannot give a better idea of the noble aim of the poet than in quoting passages from his introduction.

The most durable institutions are those which enter into the education of the people, inspire them with strong emotions, and are supported by the pomp of solemnities. This character is specially remarked in the Olympic games, in those of the Amphitheatre, and in chivalry; the grand and noble establishment of the middle ages.

The Olympic games, founded in the infancy of Greece, contributed to its aggrandizement, and flourished long after its glory was set; they survived it, and, in the state of abasement to which it was reduced, they impressed upon the conquerors that ascendancy which arts and learning give.

The first object of the Olympic games was to form warriors and to render the nation stronger; without taking any other direction, they acquired a greater development; they were applied to mental, as well as bodily, exercises; and there were crowned all the talents, all the arts, and all that bore a character of genius and grandeur. This reunion of all the states of Greece was no vain spectacle; forgetting their dissensions, in the midst of public dangers, and hastening to the banks of the Alpha to partake of the same sacrifices and the same fetes, and attaching sufficient importance to those solemnities to render their return periodical, in order, from it, to form the basis of their chronology, the source of patriotism, and the love of glory.

The four years which separated these celebrations, was a period of labour and trials, in which the parties endeavoured to acquire new titles to the admiration of Greece. The athlete, the scholar, and the artist, exerted themselves, in the interval, to merit new crowns: a rising generation prepared itself for succeeding, honorably, its predecessors; there was thus established, not only between contemporaries, but between parents and children, a happy emulation; and, with such great examples before them, they aspired to excel. The Olympic games were, thus, a source of great actions to Greece. Who could resist the seduction of such solemn triumphs? genius, virtue itself, are not insensible to praise, and what empire must they not have had over a people endowed with a lively and fertile imagination, accessible to all kinds of emotions, quick in discerning and selecting what was noble and grand! Their religion even, favoured these first impressions; all Greece was peopled with divinities. Man found himself every where surrounded with them, and he was retained in the line of duty by these numerous witnesses of his actions. The gods were not always invisible; ancient traditions recalled their appearances and their metamorphoses: it was under the human form they loved to shew themselves; from hence, a more intimate connection between them and man; the poets had, even, lent them our passions and our weaknesses, and, if this error degraded their majesty, at least it elevated man in his own eyes. Some heroes had obtained the honour of apotheosis for their great actions, or services rendered to humanity; the career was still open, and, even at the time when new divinities ceased to be admitted, human respect and glory were considered a sufficient recompense.

This is sufficient to shew the plan of our author in his exquisite little poems; of his manner we will select a specimen, where Sophocles recites the episode of Leonidas: the beautiful poem of Glover has not a passage equal to it:—

‘Vaillant Léonidas! héroïque victime!
 Quel triomphe égalait ton dévouement sublime,
 Lorsque à Lacédémone, assis parmi les rois,
 Fit à mourir pour elle et pour ses saintes loix,
 Tu reçus, sans pâlir, ses adieux et ses larmes!
 Les trois cents immortels se couvrent de leurs armes;

Tu guides aux combats leur noble désespoir;
 Et, saluant ce jour qui n’aura point de soir,
 T’agrandissant comme eux à l’aspect de la tombe,

Tu meurs, accompagné de leur triple hécatombe.’

It is murdering poetry to put it into prose; but we wish to convey a faint idea of the beauties of the original, even under such a disadvantage:—

‘Valiant Leonidas! heroic victim!
 What triumph could equal thy sublime devotion,
 When at Lacedæmon, seated amongst kings, ready to die for her and her holy laws, thou receivest, without turning pale, her adieux and her tears!
 The three hundred immortals gird on their arms; thou guidest to combat their noble despair, and, saluting the morn which shall have no evening, aggrandizing thyself, like them, at the aspect of the tomb, thou diest accompanied by their triple hecatomb.’

We are sure that our readers will prefer other extracts to an analysis of the work; which no admirer of fine poetry would wish to be without. After painting the advantages of the Olympic games, their influence on manners, and even the character of the people, the author feelingly retraces the destruction of Greece and the transfer of her riches to Rome, the new wonder of the world. He paints the ferocity of Roman manners, which was more or less apparent, even to the destruction of the empire; as true it is, as old Paquiar says in his Recherches. Every nation preserves, through the continuity of ages, traces of its first form and primitive manners; the Romans, in the origin, were a horde of banditti, they knew no law but power, and ‘woe to the vanquished’ was their motto; and, woe indeed it was to them, for they became slaves, and were obliged to fight until they died, to please their barbarous conquerors; and, if they refused, they were doomed to be devoured by wild beasts. The Roman dames have, joyfully, witnessed a thousand of these inhuman massacres in a day! One of the most remarkable of them is selected by our poet to illustrate them; it is the well known story of Androcles, but which possesses new charms from his muse:—

‘Quel est l’infortuné qu’on mène au supplice!
 Il porte encor des fers la double cicatrice:
 Un glaive, un bouclier sont remis dans ses mains;

Ses farouches regards évitent les humains;
 Seul, assis sur la pierre, il garde le silence.
 Mais déjà, dans le cirque, apparaît et s’élance
 Un lion irrité, que tourmente la faim,
 Et que la Gétulie a porté dans son sein.
 Malheureux Androcles! tu te soutiens à peine
 Déjà ton ennemi, bondissant dans l’arène,
 Semble te dévorer de ses regards angustians:
 Sa queue en longs replis entoure et bat ses flancs;

Il accoutit, il se dresse: ô prodige! il s’arrête:
 Ses longs crins hérissés retombent sur sa tête;
 D’une langue crainative il flatte tes genoux,
 Il se couche à tes pieds, et ses yeux sans courroux

Se lèvent sur les tiens en s’humectant de larmes.
 D’un spectacle nouveau l’on admire ses charmes;
 Les cours sont attentifs; et l’homme humilié
 Reçoit des animaux des leçons de pitié.

Rassurez-vous, parlez, étonnante victime!
 Long-temps évanoui, l’esclave se ranime;
 Il recueille ses sens et retrouve la voix:

“ Il est donc des amis, dit-il, et je revois
 Celui dont la caverne, accueillant un transfuge, Contre un maître cruel fut long-temps mon refuge.”

Un jour, chargé d’ennuis et ne pouvant mourir,
 Je demandais au ciel qu’il vint me secourir;
 Il brisa mes liens, il protégea ma fuite,
 Et de mes ennemis il trompa la poursuite.
 Longuement, épuisé de fatigue et de faim,
 Un autre bienfaiteur me reçut dans son sein:
 Me m’endormis. O dieux! quelles vives larmes

M’arçhent au sommeil qui suspendait mes larmes!

Un lion gémissant se traîne jusqu’à moi:
 Je veux fuir, je retombe, et pousse un cri d’eroi.

 Son pied est déchiré d’une épine sanglante;
 Il pose dans mes mains sa tête suppliante,
 A son hôte inconnu semble fier ses jours,
 Et ses rugissements implorent mes secours.
 Je frissonnais d’horreur: sa plainte me rassure;
 J’arrache avec effort le trait de sa blessure;
 Son sang coule; mes mains en étanchent les flots;

Et de mes vêtements déchirant les lambeaux,
 Chers et tristes débris qu’a sauvés ma misère,
 J’épouse en appareil ma richesse dernière.
 Dès ce jour commença notre longue amitié:
 De ses sanglants festins il m’offrait la moitié;

Je pris soin de son antre, et d’une herbe nouvelle

Je couvrais chaque jour la couche fraternelle.
 Abattu sous ces coups, le peuple des forêts
 De sa riche débauche ornait son antre paillard:
 Moi-même j’empruntai leur sauvage parure:
 Repoussé des humains, et seul dans la nature,
 Un lion m’accueillait; je descendis à lui.
 Souvent, pour l’arracher à son stupide ennui,
 J’escaçais, en jouant, une lutte innocente:
 Timide, il épargnait mon audace impuissante;
 Terreur des animaux, un lion me craignait;
 L’homme avait pris ses droits, et le faible régna.

Je rouissais pourtant de mon sauvage empire.
 O raison! noble instinct qui pourrais te détruire!

Le monde que j’ai fui, mes malheurs et mes fers
 Au fond de mon exil me redeviennent chers.
 Enfin, ne pouvant plus souffrir ma solitude,
 Sourdement dévoré d’ennui, d’inquiétude,
 Triste, n’écoutant plus qu’un sombre désespoir, Je men fis . . . En quels lieux ai-je dû le revoir!

 Il m’avait épargné. Barbares que nous sommes!
 Pour tomber sous leurs coups, je revins chez les hommes:

Esclave fugitif, vous m’avez condamné;
 Un lion à ma fuite a déjà pardonné.”

Il dit, et de ses maux la naïve peinture
 Dans le cœur des Romains réveille la nature;
 Les jours de ce proselit leur deviennent sacrés.
 L’homme et son bienfaiteur, du cirque délivrés,
 Cherchent un même asile; et comme un chien timide,

Le lion, moins farouche, accompagne son guide.
 Long-temps on les a vus, confondant leurs destins.

Paraître en suppliants aux portes des festins:
 La pitié les nourrit; la pitié même enfance;
 Du monarque des bois insulte la clémence;
 La sainte humanité le couronne de fleurs:
 On chante d’Androcles la fuite et les malheurs,
 On chante du lion la grotte hospitalière.
 L’esclave arrive enfin à son heure dernière:
 Et l’ôte des forêts, qui s’unît à son sort,
 Se couche sur la tombe, en attendant la mort.”

The episode of the faithful Blondel discovering his master, our Richard the First, in prison, shall conclude our extracts:—

‘Blondel a vu le jour dans la fertile plaine
 Que borde l’Océan, et qu’embellit la Seine.
 On y appelle encor le nom de ce vieillard,
 Ses vertus, son courage, et les maux de Richard,
 De ce roi qui, chargé des palmes de Syrie,
 Disparut tout-à-coup, en cherchant sa patrie.
 Sa pitié et ses malheurs occupent l’archevêque.
 Le bruit s’est répandu qu’il languit dans les fers;
 Et Blondel, épiant ses traces incertaines,
 Voudrait sauver Richard, ou partager ses chaînes.

Mais qui peut le conduire aux murs de sa prison!

Par-tout veille la crainte et plane le soupçon:
 Il faut, sans exprimer une doute téméraire,
 Interroger cent fois la rumeur populaire.
 Réténir son secret, dévorer ses angoisses.
 Il parcourt les cités, et, dans l’ombre des nuits,
 Aux portes des cachots il écoute la plainte;
 Assiéger des donjons l’impénétrable enceinte,
 Et, pauvre pèlerin ou tendre troubadour,
 Sollicite l’aumône, ou dit un chant d’amour.

Un jour, les yeux en pleurs, sur sa harpe il commence
 Les amours de Richard et sa triste romance,

Et des sanglots pressés étouffent ses accents.
O ciel ! en croira-t-il le trouble de ses sens ?
Ces mots interrompus, un autre les achève :
On répond à sa voix. Il écoute, il se lève ;
Il écoute . . . O bonheur ! la voûte de la tour
Des chants du ménestrel retentit à son tour « C'est lui ! n'en doutons plus. O Dieu, qui vois ma joie,

Qu'enfin à ses sujets ta bonté le renvoie !"
Dieu seul bat le tambour de ses pieux transports.
D'Albion en secret il regagne les ports ;
Et ce peuple, fidèle au roi qu'il a vu naître,
S'appauvrit sans regret pour racheter son maître.

Rappelle-nous encore, généreux troubadour,
Les touchants souvenirs qu'éveilla son retour,
Aiors que, consacré par ses longues misères,
Il revint de l'exil au trône de ses pères.

Blondel, l'héroïque Blondel accompagne son roi.
Du noble serviteur on admire la foi :

« J'approuvai, dit Richard, ta constance et ton
zèle :

Je garde à ta franchise une épreuve nouvelle :
A mes peuples en deuil tu parlas des maux fers ;
Tu diras leurrois les maux qu'ils ont soufferts. »

When we are pleased, we wish to know to whom we are indebted for it, and though the elegant poet under notice has not published his name, it shall not be concealed—it is M. Roux, as amiable a man as he is an elegant poet and scholar.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

TO STEPHEN JONES, ESQ.

EDITOR OF THE PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY CALLED 'SHERIDAN IMPROVED.'

SIR,—Having no other means of addressing you, I applied to the correspondent of the Literary Chronicle, at Paris, to facilitate the means of asking you a question on the English language, which I have studied, as we say in French, par principe. You have taken for your motto, a passage from Ben Johnson, which runs thus: 'Negligent speech doth not only discredit the person of the speaker, but it discrediteth the opinion of his reason and judgment.' I confess to you, sir, that I was greatly surprised to see a phrase selected for your motto, which appears to me not only to be incorrect, but downright nonsense; yet this opinion may, perhaps, arise from my imperfect knowledge of the language, in which you so greatly excel; I shall, therefore, be obliged to you, sir, to inform me, through the medium of the Literary Chronicle, how a man's negligent speech can discredit his opinion of his reason? Ought it not rather to be, that his negligent speech discredits (or lowers) his reason and judgment, in my opinion? The subject is, perhaps, scarcely worth the pains I have taken about it; but it is always a pleasure to a student to catch his masters tripping, and to find a gentleman who professes to teach you to think and write correctly, making a grammatical blunder in the very title page of his book.

I am, sir, with much respect,
Your humble servant,

Paris, J. B. LECLERC.
Rue de Richieu, Jan. 24, 1821.

COBBETT ON FEMALE BEAUTY.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—As politics form no part of the plan of the Literary Chronicle, I do not expect you to be very well acquainted with the writings of a man only known for his political talents and tergiversation. It is on this account that I transmit you an extract from the last number of Cobbett's Register, in which he draws a picture of female beauty, and modestly intimates at the conclusion, that the originals are to be found in the persons of her Majesty and—Mrs. Cobbett.

'As to what is beautiful and what is not,' says Mr. Cobbett, 'there is no standard. All depends upon taste; and our tastes vary with our characters, which are as various as are the wild plants of the field. But I know what my own taste in female beauty is, and I will describe it.' A woman, five feet two inches high (without her shoes) half an inch more or less. Plump, even when young, and prone to crum, rather than crust, as she increases in years. Small-boned, small hand, and small nimble feet, and giving evident proofs, that the fruit of her love are not, for want of an ample natural supply, to be banished to a hireling breast. Sprightly eyes of I care not what colour; features that speak; a voice at once feminine and firm; a laugh that banishes melancholy from my abode; a temper that sets disguise at defiance; a will, that, by its ripplings, prevents life from becoming a stagnant pool; a heart that shews its tenderness, not in sighs and whines, but in excessive fondness for children and in active boldness at the bed-side of the yellow-fever or the plague; and if I cannot preserve that heart, I am unworthy to enjoy its possessor.

'That this is my taste I have given the best possible proof; and, it is well known, that her Majesty might have sitted for the picture.'

Mr. Cobbett speaks from an accurate survey of her Majesty's features and person: he first saw her 'just twenty years ago last Thursday week,' when he inquired who that 'pretty little gay lady was,' and he last saw her on Monday 'from a distance of about four yards, for a whole hour or more.' Who will dispute Mr. Cobbett's talents of judging of female beauty, when he studies it with such minuteness and accuracy.

I am your's, &c.
Jan. 28th, 1821. GIOVANNI.

QUACKERY.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

MR. EDITOR,

'Bears' Grease has virtues many, great, and rare;
To Hair decay'd, life, health, and vigour giving;

'Tis sold by ———, famed for cutting Hair,
At ——— living.

Who then would lose a Head of Hair for want?
A thousand tongues are heard "I try!" replying.

T——— no doubt with Bear's Grease can supply
A thousand more, when they're disposed to buy.

'No deception!—Seven bears publicly exhibited in seven months, and not an agent on the globe's surface. Sold upon oath, from 1s. to 10s. 6d. The smallest child will direct to ———, near the church,—a real bear over the door, where a good peruke is charged 1l. 10s. equal to those produced by Mr. T., at R——s, for 2l. 12s. 6d. Scalp 10s. 6d. and 6d. only for hair cutting—never refusing one shilling. N.B. Bear's grease effects wonders for the knees, &c. of horses.'

Having carefully perused this most wonderful production, I have no doubt whatever, you are fully persuaded in your own mind of the infallible specific, bears' grease. I certainly apologise to you, sir, and your enlightened readers, for bringing so greasy a subject before you, but the antiquity or sacred influence which true poetry is known to possess, gives me an excuse. I have withheld the author's name and address, because I would not subject you to an advertisement duty. But this rare discovery cannot remain in obscurity, especially on 'Change, where bears and even bulls are so frequently seen. A member of Parliament, not long since, ventured to say that 'the house would soon be turned into a bear-garden,' so that we may hope this virtuous grease will be generally used. But, should this gentleman be out in his prediction, the above extraordinary composition informs you where it can be obtained, 'seven bears having been publicly exhibited in seven months, and that there is a real bear over the door.' Not 'the Bear and Ragged Staff, sir, oh no!' there is not an agent on the globe's surface! this epithet, surface, is peculiarly happy, as it is so close to the skin. And 'the smallest child will direct near the church.' Those who have overgrown hair, 'may have it cut for sixpence,—never refusing a shilling!' I dare say not, sir. But the knees, ye lame, and halt, and bruised!—the knees are restored to vigour; particularly (beautiful comparison) horses'.

This, sir, is, indeed, the age for miracles;—this is enough to arouse the more sedate and time-shaving faculty to more exalted deeds of wonder. Operators are to be found at the pole and block as well as at Guy's and St. Thomas's Hospitals! Prescribers at the real Bear, as well as at the College of Physicians, Warwick Lane! How degraded, then, are the disciples of Galen and Hippocrates become! How shameful, that for paying the government a duty, such disgusting puffing should be tolerated to mislead the unwary, and sink the virtues of medical science into contempt rather than promote their general utility! The above, sir, is not so exceptional as hundreds which tinge the pages of respectable newspapers, by their violating the rules of decency and insulting the most common understanding; but sent you as a specimen of its promise and eccentricity.

P. PIGTAIL.

The Family Trunk,

No. I.

BY MOSES VON MUCKLEWIT, GENT.

THE embarrassment of a first appearance hath ever been felt and acknowledged through all ranks and gradations, from the drawing-room at St. James's down to the boards at Covent Garden or the dock of the Old Bailey. There are few creatures of a more nervous temperament than your genuine débutant; and in no situation hath this nervousness operated more sensibly than upon the honourable fraternity of periodical essayists, from the golden days of our illustrious precursor, Mr. Isaac Bickerstaff, even to these degenerate times. Scarcely one, but hath felt himself overpowered, at his first starting, by the overwhelming sense of his own unworthiness, somewhat after the fashion of young Hobnail, who pays his first visit to his landlord, the 'squire, to solicit his continuance in the farm, just vacated by his lamented sire; old Hobnail defunct. Who, that hath ever studied human nature in her rustic garb, cannot picture to himself the clumsy gait, sheepish countenance, awkward strides; and non-descript attitudes of the aforesaid bumpkin, as,—after scraping the floor most majestically with both feet, smoothing down his lank polished locks, and finally twirling before him his old beaver, according to the most approved modes in such cases,—he approaches the august presence of the 'squire, and, with a profusion of hems, yawns, grins, and such other rhetorical flourishes, stammers out the important purpose of his visitation?

—But as I have a mortal antipathy to digressions in travelling,—whether it be through the fens of Lincolnshire or the fuggers of the compositor,—I come at once to the point, at which it was my intention to commence this my first lucubration. And, however contrary it may be to the true Horatian precept, in all sublime productions of this nature, to begin ad ovo, or from the shell, (an illustration, by the way, extremely apposite to an unfiled author,) I cannot resist the temptation, which the example of my celebrated predecessors hath thrown out, to ingratiate myself with my loving readers by some account of my birth, parentage, and education. It hath, moreover, I am well aware, been ever regarded as a matter of etiquette, that this account should be accompanied by a certificate of one's age, height, colour, make, figure, good or bad qualities, and other important particulars, with as much minuteness, as if the poor devil of an author were about to be put up to sale at the far-famed repositories of Aldridge or Tattersall. For my own part, however, I have, from my youth upwards, always looked with abhorrence on this last-mentioned practice, as highly derogatory from the dignity of a free-born subject of these realms, and have resolved, in conformity with the glorious spirit of the times, if ever it should please my stars to afford me the opportunity, to be the first to make some reform in this weighty matter. For this reason, the following sketch of my history will be confined to such general matters, as I may deem essential to that proper understanding between my readers and myself, which it must ever be my chief ambition to cultivate.

According to the most authentic records, our family hath been settled in the North Riding of Yorkshire for the last two hundred and fifty years. The first of my progenitors, who bore the name of Von Mucklewit, was my great grandfather Solomon, of pious memory, who took it with a considerable estate, which was left him by an old college friend, who, luckily for our family, had contracted a wonderful liking for the aforesaid Solomon; and, happening to die without any near kin, he made him his heir, upon the sole condition, that my great grandfather and his family should ever after bear the name and arms of Von Mucklewit. Before that time, the family appellation was Numscold, or, as it was written in some old deeds, Numskull; but my father, who was a great etymologist, preferred the former reading, and derived the name from the Latin words, Nummos Colligere, which, he was wont to affirm, betokened the founder of the family to have been some great money-getting, or mercantile personage. But this by the way:—our name, wherever originating, was certainly of great antiquity, and connected with persons of the first rank,—the Numscolls or Numskulls having, from the most remote period, figured in the highest stations in church and state, where many of their descendants are still to be found. As to the name of Von Mucklewit, there was nothing about which my father was more puzzled: and the only satisfactory conclusion he could come to, after all his wanderings and bewilderings in the mazes of etymology, was that the name was a cross-breed between a Scotch non-conformist and a high Dutch commentator, the latter part of which hypothesis, as agreeing so well with my father's black-letter predilections, used to tickle his fancy not a little. However, as this is a point in which the honour of our family is not immediately interested, I shall dwell no longer upon it than to state, that my great grandfather's college friend, from whom we derive this important cognomen, left behind him no memorials, whereby the matter might be cleared; and whatever knowledge the venerable Solomon Von Mucklewit may have possessed, he has certainly took with him, when he descended to the vault of his ancestors.

I now come to my grandfather Jehoshaphat, of whom the most memorable record I find is that he married a lady from Wales of good fortune, and who claimed her descent from the aboriginal stock of the renowned Cadwalader. In consequence of this alliance, my grandmother's armorial bearings,—three goat's heads argent,—were quartered on our family shield:—a circumstance, which my father, drawing his conclusions, no doubt, from the mounting of the said heads, would often, with a significant shrug of his shoulders, lament, as more ominous than he could wish to the connubial honour of the Von Mucklewitz, though, in every other respect: he was not a little proud of his Cambrian descent, and made it the source of much pleasant genealogical speculation. As for my grandfather, he was so much taken with my grandmother and her native mountains, that he became a decided convert to her national customs, lived half his time upon Welsh mutton and leeks, and was found dead in his bed, after feeding too luxuriously one night upon a Welsh rabbit, (or, according to my father's emendation, rare bit;) which my grandmother was accustomed to cook for him.

It is now time to do honour to my immediate progenitor, Cadwalader Von Mucklewitz;—for such were my grandfather's Welsh partialities, as already hinted, that he was determined his eldest son should bear the name of the great Cambrian prince. And it must not be disguised, that my father was, to his latest hour, more vain than was, perhaps, consistent with true Christian humility, of this important distinction. My father, indeed, to say the truth, was not less a stickler for names than the renowned Mr. Shandy himself, and was, therefore, not only particularly proud of his own, as harmonizing so happily with his genealogical attachments, but was also remarkably solicitous about the choice of those, which he bestowed on his children. Many and keen, he hath often told me, were, at first, the contests, on this head, between himself and my mother, who, being of a puritanical lineage, was for preserving the old patriarchal appellations, which had been, from the days of the Reformation until my father's time, a part of the family inheritance. After a long series of conflicts on this important topic, they compromised the matter by agreeing to name their children alternately, my father to take the first chance. And, as it pleased heaven to bless them with a numerous progeny, they had each a full opportunity of gratifying their various whims in this particular. Accordingly, while my mother stocked our family nomenclature with Isaac, Job, Joshua, Rebecca, and Rachel; my father, on his part, brought in his Alexanders, Arthurs, Ossians, Erasmuses, and Lucretius, who were so named, according to the particular train of my father's studies at the time of their birth, or the capricious opinions he chose to form of their future destinies. For myself, it was my fortune, but whether good or ill I will not pretend to determine, to fall to my father's nomination: and, predicting, as he was pleased to say, that I would be of a very meek disposition, and bring, moreover, at the time, disposed to flatter my mother's scriptural predilections, he bestowed upon me the dignified appellation of Moses.

From the earliest period within my recollection I became a great favourite with my father, who even carried his partiality so far as to undertake the special charge of my education, while the rest of the family were sent to a public school. He, accordingly, after I had mastered the common rudiments of learning, initiated me in the varied and abstruse mysteries of his own studies; and, thus, before I was thirteen, I was deeply read in the respective sciences of heraldry, etymology, physics, astrology, and occult philosophy, with sundry other similar pursuits, antiquarian, philological, and metaphysical. In short, I had made such proficiency, that my father considered his superintendence no longer necessary, and left me to the guidance of my own discretion, until the time should arrive for fixing me in the world.

Matters had continued in this state for some time, when the gout, with which my father had been long struggling, at length gained a powerful ascendancy; and, in spite of all his skill, physical or necromantic, he was obliged to give up the combat. In a word, before I had well attained my fifteenth year, my lamented father, Cadwalader Von Mucklewitz, was obliged to bow to the common lot of humanity. However, he had not so far lost himself in the labyrinth of his studies, as to forget to provide previously for his children, to each of whom, although many in number, he contrived to leave a decent competency, besides an ample provision for my mother; and he was further pleased to mark his partiality for me by an additional bequest, which I cannot better describe than in the following words of his will:—

'And whereas, I have taken my dear son, Moses, from his infancy, under my own especial tuition, and he hath, through his diligence and ability, profited greatly thereby, in the attainment of a variety of useful and profound knowledge, so that he promiseth fairly to prove one of the brightest luminaries of his time; therefore, and in order the more effectually to enable him so to distinguish himself, I do hereby give and bequeath unto my said dear son, Moses, all that my large black-leather FAMILY TRUNK, which now is and stands in my private closet, together with all the contents thereof, and all the rights, members, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, with full power and authority for my said son, Moses, to make such use of the same, as he, in his discretion, shall deem fit.'

Now, this antique piece of furniture, which had been a sort of heir-loom in our family from time immemorial, and had, uncouthly, contained the family title-deeds, and other similar records, was converted, by my father, into a depository for his literary lucubrations. Here it was that he concealed, from all eyes but his own, those erudite labours which he, no doubt, flattered himself might one day astonish the world; and, as even I had never been permitted to penetrate into the mysteries of this sanctum sanctorum, it was with no small degree of curiosity that I first proceeded to take possession of my legacy. Upon opening this venerable trunk, I found the long hidden treasure to consist, principally, of small bundles of paper, many of them superscribed 'for the press,' together with a variety of copy books of all sorts and sizes. Some of the contents proved, upon a farther examination, to be my father's original productions, while the rest were merely transcripts, which he had made in the course of his reading. And, amongst such a mass, it will readily be imagined, that there must have been a good deal of matter, that did not greatly redound to the literary fame of Cadwalader Von Mucklewitz. Upon the whole, however, they served to give me a high idea of the profundity of my father's knowledge, and of the diversity of his talents; for, amongst the multifarious heap of original pieces, were skeletons of epic poems,—half-connected tragedies,—unfinished romances,—scraps of biography, chiefly relating to our own family,—and an infinite collection of miscellaneous compositions, under the various heads of commentaries, criticisms, dissertations, essays, anecdotes, bon mots, and a thousand other titles too tedious to mention. The transcripts, also, were equally diversified, and, perhaps, I ought to admit, by far the most valuable part of these literary remains. In short, so numerous were they, that some years elapsed before I was able to make a proper selection of such as were most worthy of being preserved; and, after deliberating for twenty years longer on their merits, I have, at length, resolved to lay them occasionally before the public, not doubting the gratitude with which they will be received. But I hereby give notice, that I reserve to myself the fullest use of the discretionary power, vested in me by the aforesaid will, whether by abbreviation, amplification, suppression, addition, or interpolation; and, should any one doubt my legal right and authority so to do, I hereby refer him to the proper office, at Doctors' Commons, where he will find the last will and testament of Cadwalader Von Mucklewit, Esq., which was duly proved on the first day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine. MOSES VON MUCKLEWIT.

Original Criticisms

ON
*The Principal Performers of the Theatres
Royal Drury Lane & Covent Garden.*

No. X.—MRS. BUNN.

‘Use all gently,
You must acquire, and beget a Temperance,’
SHAKESPEARE.

THE character of Imogen, in Mr. Matrin's tragedy of Beltrame, first introduced Mrs. Bunn (at that time Miss Somerville) to a London audience. Her task was arduous, but then she had not to contend with the comparative claims of any predecessor. Nothing could exceed the glorious welcome of the public; still, notwithstanding the torrents of applause that were showered on the performance, her conception of the character, on the whole, did not please us. Her figure is well adapted to the lofty rage of tragedy, but her countenance is extremely unimpressive. Again, she feels passionately, but fails in elevated expression. Her articulation is by no means distinct: her words roll into each other like intermingling waves that crowd into a confused mass; her voice, in short, wants that modulation, that variety of tone, which is exacted by declamation; nor is her study formed on a pure model, unless it be correct to surprise the ear by sudden starts, from the highest capable pitch of the voice to its lowest audible key. Her delivery of the speech ‘Of one who lov'd,—she was of humble birth,’ &c., was admirable; but the remainder of the character was badly conceived, and still worse executed; she was, at one time, vehement to the highest degree,—at another, she sunk into an almost inaudible whine. This lady was certainly of no advantage to Drury Lane; Imogen, Alicia, and Imoinda in Oronoko (an extremely mawkish and insipid personation of a weak and powerlessly drawn character), being the only parts she enacted, and these with little credit to herself, and still less to the house. About two years since, however, she appeared at Covent Garden in the character of Bianca in ‘Fazio,’ and, although her representation was far, very far inferior to that of Miss O'Neil, she was evidently much improved. We think, however, on the whole, the haughty beauty, Aldabella, would have suited her better. Her next appearance was in Adelgitha: her performance was again remarkable for frequent and powerful displays of talent, and great inequality. She was much applauded when she stabled Michael Ducas (Mr. Macready), and, though the character lost a main, if not essential source of its interest after the death of that personage, she availed herself of several opportunities to obtain applause in the fifth act. Her intonation was greatly improved, and she had, in a great measure, discarded that hollowness of tone which is by no means natural, and still less necessary to her. Roxana and Elvira, fierce, haughty, and vindictive, find in her very efficient representatives; but of her Lady Macbeth we are unwilling to speak; as we can offer her neither compliment or panegyric without a complete violation of truth, we shall pass it by in silence. We are persuaded that this lady is permitted to enact the heroine in tragedy, merely because the managers of Covent Garden have not a single first-rate performer in this line, with the exceptions, perhaps, of Miss Foote and Mrs. Faucit; the former of whom, though exquisitely beautiful, is but a mediocre performer in tragedy, and the latter, though an extremely clever woman, generally speaking, belongs rather to elegant comedy or a superior class of melo-drame. This is the only reason we can assign for Mrs. Bunn's constant appearance before the public in characters for which she possesses but slender requisites. Her Margaret of Anjou, in the ‘Earl of Warwick,’ as a whole, is entitled to commendation. Wherever rage or indignation were to be expressed, she fulfilled her task with much ability; she was, however, less happy in the scenes where feeling, pathos, and tenderness were required. Her last scene was very impressive, and was honoured with great applause. Some months ago, she performed Meg Merrilies, and, in our humble opinion, this is the very lie of character for which she is best adapted. She has never, in our estimation, merited the appellation of a first-rate actress. That she possesses talent is unquestionable, but that she has mis-apprehended its extent and peculiarity seems equally undeniable. She is too young for Volumnia, nor does she possess the dignity of the Roman matron; why is not Mrs. Faucit continued in the part, instead of assigning her that of Virgilia? Volumnia has more of what we may imagine Roman, than any of the other characters in the piece; her very love is pride,—she does not upon her son, but on the hero, the conqueror of Corioli; it is, therefore, impossible for it to have due effect on the stage, unless its representative be endowed with an innate dignity, and a majestic figure, action, and demeanour. Alicia, though a very natural, is by no means an agreeable character, and would scarcely be endured in the virulence of her actions and the extravagance of her behaviour, but that she meets with an admirable foil in her more amiable, but not more fortunate friend. The character loses none of its effect in the hands of Mrs. Bunn; many of her speeches are exquisitely given; her wild exclamation of horror ‘Stand off, and let me pass,’ &c., on meeting Hastings on the way to execution, had its proper effect, and the whole of her mad scene, in which she reviles the unhappy Jaane Shore as the author of her miseries, and spurs her from her door, were fine specimens of the histrionic art. Considerable force and effect is given by Mrs. Bunn to the bolder and more vehement attributes of Helen, in the tragedy of ‘Wallace,’ but, owing to the harsh and unpleasant tones in her voice, she is unable to give proper pathos to the softer and more tender scenes. Her voice is a terrible drawback to her general merits, and she has yet to learn to moderate her declamation, as well as to chasten her action, which is sometimes dignified and graceful, at others inappropriate and inelegant; these errors, however, we notice the more freely, as it is in her own power to get rid of, or, at least, to correct them. ‘She has still much to learn as well as to unlearn; let her study closely and without intermission; let her unlearn her acquired bad habits; native management, classically directed, will do wonders.’

W. H. PARRY.

LITERARY SQUABBLE.

The rival magazines of Baldwin and Blackwood have, for some months past, carried on a species of literary warfare against each other, equally disgraceful to the conductors of both. The pen, however powerful, has been found too feeble a weapon, and an appeal of another description has been made by one of the parties, and evaded by the other. It appears, from a narrative published by Mr. Lockhart, who avows himself an occasional, but an unpeevish, contributor to Blackwood's Magazine, that feeling himself 'insulted by name, in various articles of a publication called the London Magazine,' he authorized his friend, Mr. Christie, to call on the editor, Mr. John Scott; and 'ask of him, on the part of Mr. Lockhart, whether he really had any concern in these offensive articles, or was inclined to hold himself responsible for them.' Mr. Scott at first refused to give an answer, because Mr. Lockhart was not on the spot. This difficulty was soon removed, by Mr. L. immediately hastening to London and renewing his demand. Mr. Scott still evaded an explanation, requiring from Mr. Lockhart to disavow his having been concerned, under fabricated names or anonymously, with 'that very infamous publication, Blackwood's Magazine.' This was the sine qua non of Mr. Scott's giving any explanation. On receiving this letter, Mr. Lockhart wrote a reply, which, with the remainder of the narrative we give entire:—

"London, January, 19.

"Mr. Lockhart, without admitting that Mr. Scott has, according to the usual practice of gentlemen in similar situations, any right to a preliminary explanation, does, nevertheless, not hesitate to offer Mr. Scott any explanation upon any subject in which Mr. Scott's personal feelings and honour can be concerned; in the hopes, and on the understanding, that Mr. Scott will then no longer delay giving Mr. Lockhart the explanation and satisfaction alluded to in Mr. Scott's communications."

"If Mr. Scott's previous conduct had not prepared Mr. Lockhart to expect any degree of meanness and inconsis-

"So anxious was Mr. Lockhart to bring this discussion to a conclusion, that his friend went on this occasion, charged by him with authority to deny on the part of Mr. L. (in case Mr. Scott should offer any opportunity for doing so,) 'the smallest knowledge of or concern in any article in any publication whatsoever, by which Mr. Scott could possibly have imagined himself to be injured or insulted.' It will be seen, that Mr. Christie had no opportunity of acting upon these instructions."

ency, he would have been surprised at receiving in answer to so plain, so distinct, and so decisive a proposition, the following letter, in which it will be seen that Mr. Scott maintains all the spirit of his former communications, but variegates the discussion with certain new conditions, which nothing but the ingenuity of personal apprehension could have brought into this stage of the business:—

"Mr. Scott does not think it necessary to discuss Mr. Lockhart's denial of his right to a preliminary explanation; it is sufficient for Mr. Scott to have made up his mind on that point; to have his opinion supported by that of his friend—a man of unblemished honour; and to be prepared to stand the test of the feelings of society upon it.

"It is, however, his wish to limit the explanation he demands within the narrowest bounds the case will possibly admit of. He will not, therefore, require from Mr. Lockhart any avowal or disavowal, directed towards particular articles that may have appeared in Blackwood's Magazine: all he requires is, that Mr. Lockhart should declare upon his honour, in explicit terms, that he has never derived money from any connexion, direct or indirect, with the management of that work; and that he has never stood in a situation giving him, directly or indirectly, a pecuniary interest in its sale.

"Mr. Lockhart will see that the terms of this disavowal have no reference whatever to occasional, or even frequent contributions, which Mr. Scott waives his right to inquire into. They are simply intended to draw the line of distinction between the dealer in scandal and the man of honour.

"The system of concealment and evasion, adopted in regard to the editorship of Blackwood's Magazine, and obstinately maintained under calls as direct as that which Mr. Lockhart has now made on Mr. Scott, but which Mr. Scott could not bring himself to imitate; also Mr. Lockhart's silence under the general public report attributing to him a principal share in the getting-up of the work in question, are sufficient to justify Mr. Scott in demanding this preliminary explanation. The disavowal required by Mr. Scott being made, he holds himself prepared to give Mr. Lockhart satisfaction without delay."

"Contemptible as Mr. Scott's assertions had now become to Mr. Lockhart, he nevertheless condescended to make one effort more to remove his tremulous delicacy and ever-springing difficulties, by authorising Mr. Christie to read to Mr. Scott a formal denial of that bare-faced falsehood, that Mr. Lockhart had ever, on any pretence whatever, declined giving an immediate and open answer to any application connected with any point of honour in which he (Mr. L.) could conceive himself to be in any sort concerned; but Mr. Scott now found it convenient not even to listen to the answer to his own despicable insinuation, and he, therefore, would not permit Mr. Christie to read this paper, and for that reason Mr. Lockhart does not think it necessary to insert it here.

"Mr. Lockhart had now been engaged in this very disagreeable correspondence for the greater part of a week. Seeing no likelihood of bringing the affair to a termination by such means as he had hitherto resorted to, he now found himself compelled to address the following final note to Mr. John Scott:—

"Mr. Lockhart, in consequence of Mr. Scott's having refused to act towards him according to the rules by which gentlemen are accustomed to regulate their conduct, thinks it necessary to inform Mr. Scott, that he, Mr. Lockhart, considers him as a liar and a scoundrel.

"Mr. Lockhart also thinks proper to inform Mr. Scott, that it is his intention to set off for Scotland on Tuesday morning—bearing with him no other feeling in regard to Mr. Scott, except that supreme contempt with which every gentleman must contemplate the almost united baseness of falsehood and poltrovery."

"In about two hours, Mr. S. replied in these terms:—

"Mr. Scott has just received, and opened (not knowing the seal) the last note addressed to him by Mr. Lockhart; and thinks it only necessary to say, that he considers it as coming from the editor of Blackwood's Magazine.

"Saturday evening, half-past seven."

"This last new miserable subterfuge is as false in assertion (Mr. Lockhart not being the editor of Blackwood's Magazine), as its motive is despicable. And Mr. Lockhart has now only to regret that his ignorance of the manners and character of Mr. John Scott, should have involved him in any discussion with a person alike incapable of giving or of receiving the explanation of a gentleman.

"N. B. The first copy of this statement was sent to Mr. Scott with a notification that Mr. Lockhart intended leaving London within twenty-four hours after the time of his receiving it."

Here the affair rests at present, and what further steps may be taken is of little consequence to the public. Both the magazines in question have been remarkable for their gross personalities, which have placed them out of the pale of honourable literature. What a pity it is that these gentlemen do not read Addison, who has so justly condemned the line of conduct they pursue. He says, 'there is nothing so detestable in the eyes of all good men as defamation, or satire aimed at particular persons. It deserves the utmost detestation and discouragement of all who have either the love of their country, or the honour of their religion at heart. I have not scrupled to rank those who deal in those pernicious arts of writing, with the murderer and assassin. Every honest man sets as high a value on his good name as upon life itself: and I cannot but think that those who privily assault the one could destroy the other, might they do it with the same security and impunity.'

SINGULAR POEM.

THERE exists in the French language, a poem on the passion of our Saviour, in verses of only one syllable, or rather of only one word: the following is a specimen:—

De	from ce	this
Lieu,	place,
Dieu	God
mort	dead
sort;	went;
sort	fate
fort	very dur,	hard,
mais	but tres	very
sur	sore.

In Scarron's time, burlesque verse was so much in vogue, that a priest advertised a poem 'on the passion of our Lord, in burlesque verse.'

Original Poetry.

THE OLD YEW TREE.

A TALE.

My chaise the high brow of the hill had just gain'd,

When a cottage arose on my view;
An appearance of weakness it still had retain'd,
For the ruins of roses and woodbines remain'd,
But broken and wand'ring they grew.

An old yew tree, whose branches had once been a shade

To the green turf that stretch'd at the door,
Was lopp'd of its boughs, as if its kind aid
No longer were wanted, or Sorrow had said,
'Thou shalt shadow the cottage no more.'

'Whose cottage is that?' to the post-boy I cried,
For the scene shew'd a recent decay;
'Old Christopher's cottage,' the driver replied,
'I well can remember that tree in its pride,
'And Christopher happy and gay.

And tho' 'tis a broken and wither'd trunk now,
'Continued the boy with a sigh,
'That tree had ten branches your honour must 1000 to 1000.

And he had ten children, and cut off a bough
When one of his children did die.

'Tis a sorrowful story, your honour, to tell;
But of nine he was shortly bereft;
By a fever that rag'd in the hamlet, they fell,
And down came the boughs of the yew-tree as well—

And none but a daughter was left.
The pride of the village Eliza was known,—
The prettiest lass on the green—
To all the same smile of good humour was shewn,

And each lad in the dance wish'd Eliza his own,
And envied the rival between.

Each ev'ning in summer, beneath the old tree,
Would Christopher always repair;
And while all around him was frolic and glee,
No one was more happy, more joyous than he,
For Eliza, his treasure, was there.

What pity, your honour, that pleasure should fade!
But sorrow was Christopher's lot,—
And Eliza, the blooming and good-humour'd maid,

Before winter came, in the cold grave was laid;
And he lost the last comfort he'd got.

I shan't see such a burying again! he exclaim'd,
As his eye trembled fast with a tear;
For throughout all the village Eliza was fam'd,
And each one who knew her, had thought themselves sham'd,

If by chance they had fail'd to be there.

The maidens her coffin with flowers did strew,
And sobb'd as if she were their own;
The old father follow'd, his grief to renew,—
He bore in his hand the last bough of the yew,
And since has no happiness known.'

'But of what fell disease did Eliza expire?'
I quickly inquir'd with a sigh;

'Perhaps the same fever, whose mould'ring fire
On her cheek the false blossom of health might inspire,

When she thought not her death was so nigh.'

'Indeed some did think so,' the driver replied,
'But nobody ever could prove;

And soon she grew dull, lost her spirits, and cried,

Which made others say, 'twas of sorrow she died,
But I think, your honour, 'twas love.

The dashing young squire, at yon house in the vale,

To the cottage would often repair;
He made love to Eliza, and told her a tale,
In hopes that a flattering tongue would prevail,
But Eliza was virtuous as fair.

Yet she lov'd him, your honour, and so she believ'd.

Whatever he promis'd or said;
But alas! poor Eliza was sadly deceiv'd;
And what was her grief when the news she receiv'd—

That the squire to another was wed!

From that day she pin'd, and no longer was found

The same sprightly girl as before;
By moonlight she'd wander the cottage around,
When the dead leaves of autumn lay thick on the ground,

And before winter came—was no more.'

'But Christopher lives, then?'—'He lives,' he replied.

'And, like the old yew on the green,
Is blighted and wither'd—'twere better he'd died,
For he keeps the last bough that he lopp'd, by his side,

And calls it Lizzy!—his Queen'

'Alas!' I exclaimed, 'and does no one allay
The bitter repinings of grief?'—

'I call away, your honour, when driving this way,

And give him what little I save in the day,
Yet 'tis but a trifling relief.'

His tale being ended, 'My lad,' I replied,
'Old Christopher's woes be my care;

I'll see that all his wants shall be quickly supplied:
Leave this purse at the cottage, as homeward you ride,

Nor let the old mourner be taken.'

My chaise I dismiss'd, and a broken bestow'd
On a heart that such feeling display'd;

Tho' humble his station, compassion still flow'd

For the sorrows of others, and forcibly shew'd
A breast for philanthropy made. E. G. B.

Fine Arts.

ESSAY II.

'Manca il parlar: di vivo altro non chiedi;
Ne manca questo ancor, s'agil occhio credi.'

Tasso.
'Di natura arte par, che per diletto
L'imitatrice sua scherzando imiti.'—Idem.

NOTHING has contributed so much to the discouragement of the imitative arts, strictly so called, in this country, as that unfortunate rage for innovation, which, at the time of the reformation, enlisted itself under the banners of religious enthusiasm, and under the cloak of that good cause did not scruple to indulge in excesses the most discreditable to human nature, and to civilized society.—At that period of our history, intolerance and bigotry, clad in the uniform, and fighting in the cause of that pure Christianity, which now blesses our nation, gave the rein to every species of licentiousness, and overturned in their mad career all that was kind in manner and awakening in principle, while the noblest efforts of genius and of art fell scorched and blasted beneath the hand of universal destruction. Painting, which, under the old religion, had been accustomed to adorn the temple as well as the palace, which put forth all its strength in the support of piety and devotion, under the new system, fled excommunicated from the altar and the shrine; and, when outlawed from the beneficial patronage, from the fostering shelter of the law of religion, where could it fly, to what pursuits was it to be expected she would turn? Beneath the rank luxuriant shade of vice, involved in the covert of obscurity, she employed her skill to entrap the youthful, and rob the soul of all that is ennobling, of all that is enriching, and to tear from the corrupted heart the last remnants 'of that sweet peace which goodness bosoms ever.'—Music was wout to take her part in her earliest, her noblest, employment, the service of the god of harmony and truth! Now, religion was denied all intercourse with her; and she, who, in the dying fall of sacred melody, was accustomed to sink into the inmost recesses of the softened heart, and again soaring, in the grand swell of the full-toned organ, to snatch the entranced soul beyond the bounds of time and space to the presence of its creator,—she who was wont to realize almost all that imagination can conceive of the angelic choirs,—she who was wont to excite the piety of the refined and to arrest the attention of the ignorant, was denounced as sinful, and inveighed against, as an unworthy confidant of rational devotion. From this false spirit of religion, the arts may date that state of decline under which they so long have pined, and the greater part of that ill success which they had to struggle against in this country. Music has already, in a slight degree, recovered her station in the religion of the land, but we have yet to look forward to the time, when our churches shall again glow with the graces of painting, and when the dwelling of him who is the sovereign of all earthly powers, shall not be thought unworthy of equal magnificence with the palaces of mundane nobility. England, we may presume to hope, will not long disdain to allow the fire of genius to contribute to the kindling of true devotion, or to employ the arm of skill in the encouragement of that religious feeling which is so lamentably deficient among our lower classes.—Let us hear what the generous poet of liberty would teach us in that poem so beautifully finished and so undeservedly neglected:—

‘Ofullen genius he!

Cursed by the Muses; y by the Graces loath’d!
Who deems beneath the public’s high regard
These last enlivening touches of my reign—
However puff’d with power, or gorged with wealth

A nation be; let trade enormous rise,
Let out and west their mingled treasures pour,
‘Till swell’d impetuous the corrupting flood
Burnt o’er the city and devour the land;
Yet these neglected, these recording arts,
Which rots a nuisance! and oblivious sunk
Thrust nation must another Carthage lie.

• • • • •
The awarden they of Fame’s immortal wreath;
They route ambition, they the mind exalt,
Give great ideas, lovely forms infuse,
Delight the general eye; and, dress’d by them,
The moral Venus glows with double charms.

TWOMSON—Liberty—Part 6.

Such have been the sentiments of the greatest legislators, the most enlightened patriots, through all ages; and shall England alone witness the barbarous, the unmanly sight of Genius and Art ‘lying in cold obstruction,’ beneath the tumulus that prejudice has heaped above them; while the despotic dynasties of Asia bear witness by their deficiency in the arts to the degraded state which they must ever hold in the scale of existence? While the monuments of Greece and Rome live in the memory of never dying fame, shall England alone blush to wear the name of the protectress of the arts? While our churches are graced with ornaments of little or inferior importance, shall those decorations which conduce to piety and devotion; shall those arts which may find their truest and noblest employment in the service of religion, be alone debarred an entrance to our temples? We trust that the mists of prejudice are now clearing away, and we hope to see the time when the religion of the country will not be debarred from those adornments which its law does not forbid, and which our piety ought to command.

W. H. PARRY.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—On Monday night, the tragedy of Richard the Third was performed, when Mr. Wallack appeared for the first time as the Duke of Gloucester. This play is so familiar to the public, that every person thinks himself able to criticize it, and judges of a new performer according to some pre-conceived opinions which he has formed of the character. This is injurious to the debutant, who, if he ventures to strike out any novelty, is charged with innovation, and if he hold on the beaten track of his predecessors, is accused of imitation. Mr. Wallack seemed aware of this, and endeavoured to avoid the two extremes. In the scene with Lady Anne, and in the tent scene, he was most successful, and in the latter, gave a fine representation of the terrors which awe the soul of Richard; but in the least prominent parts he failed to delineate the character of the tyrant. His soliloquies were not well delivered. On the whole, the performance was highly creditable to Mr. Wallack, and is the best effort he has yet made in tragedy. Mr. Cooper played Richmond with great spirit; his address to his soldiers was extremely well delivered. The other characters were the same as usual.

Miss Wilson’s transcendent talents suffer no diminution by their frequent exertion. The house is crowded to excess every night she appears. On Saturday night the fine bravura of the ‘Soldier bird,’ was twice encored, and executed with increased effect each time. On Wednesday night she was prevented from performing on account of a severe cold. The opera of the Lord of the Manor was in consequence substituted.

Oratorio.—An oratorio, under the direction of Sir George Smart, was performed at this theatre on Tuesday night. It consisted of selections from Handel and Beethoven, with a miscellaneous act. Mrs. Salmon, Braham, Pyne, with Madame Camporese, from the Italian stage, were the principal performers. At the close of the first act this accomplished singer made her first appearance, and was welcomed with much applause. Madame Camporese was always remarkable for the delicacy and taste of her performance; but, to those qualifications she has, during a three years’ absence from this country, added power and richness of tone. She sang the recitative and air, ‘Alfin ritorno,’ by Meyer, with admirable effect, and was encored. Lindley followed, with a delightful concerto on the violoncello, executed with that delicacy and skill which he alone possesses. A Mr. Cutler made his debut as a bass-singer in ‘Why do the people,’ but it was by no means a successful effort. Braham and Mrs. Salmon displayed all their accustomed excellence. The house was well attended.

COBURG THEATRE.—A new melodrama, founded upon recent political events at St. Domingo, and entitled The Death of King Christophe, has been produced. The subject is well chosen, and the piece is replete with popular sentiment, but the humorous part is sufficiently absurd to destroy the effect of the better. It is got up with considerable splendour, and was played very well throughout.

MR. KEAN IN AMERICA.

KING LEAR.—On Wednesday evening last, this play was exhibited in our theatre, (the principal part by Mr. Kean,) to a full and fashionable house, and certainly with an effect that we never before witnessed. Strong emotions, even to tears, were excited in all parts of the house; nor were they confined to the female part of the audience. It could not be otherwise. Who could remain callous to the appearance of a feeble old monarch, upwards of four score years, staggering under decrepitude and overwhelmed with misfortunes, attended with an aberration of mind, which ends in downright madness, who could behold such a sight unmoved? Such a representation was given with perfect fidelity by Mr. Keau. His plaintive tones were heard from the bottom of a broken heart, and completed the picture of human woe. Nature, writhing under the poignancy of feeling, and finding no utterance in words or tears, found a vent at length for her indescribable sensations, in a spontaneous hysteric idiotic laugh. The impressions made upon all who were present, will never be forgotten. His dreadful imprecations upon his daughters, his solemn appeals to heaven, struck the soul with awe.—But no adequate conception can be conveyed, by words, of Mr. Keau's representation of this high-drawn and arduous character, to any one who did not see it. When we lately united with an English critic, and said, upon seeing the second representation of Richard, that 'acting could go no further,' it was because we had not witnessed Mr. Keau in Lea.—New York Evening Post, Dec. 11, 1820.

Public Dinner to Mr. Keau at New York.—A public entertainment has been given to Mr. Keau, at New York, in testimony of the sense entertained of his great merits. Mr. Keau's health having been drunk in a most distinguished and flattering manner, he addressed the company (according to the report of the American Papers), in nearly these words:—

'GENTLEMEN,—To pass over in silence such unequivocal testimonials of your approbation would, I fear, savour more of insensibility than diffidence; and, while I apologise for my want of eloquence, I must add, that I am proud of this flattering opportunity to offer, in the simple language of my heart, my grateful acknowledgments to the citizens of New York. When the professional man is fortunate enough to blend private esteem with public approbation, he must have achieved the very extent of his ambition. The union of those feelings have been so manifestly conspicuous during my short stay in this city, that it has placed the records of your kindness memoria in eterna. I have too high an opinion of the sound judgment and liberality of feeling of those gentlemen whom I have now the honour of addressing, not to suppose they would not encourage me in those sentiments of attachment I must ever entertain for that country which gave me birth—for that country in which I have left every thing dear to me—for that country which, by its plaudits, flattered the humble spark of talent, till it lighted up a reputation which is the passport to your protection—the introduction to your hospitality; nor does the influence of your favour extend only to the stranger whom you have so generously welcomed: There are hearts dear to me, conjoined with mine by ties of affection and alliance, who are, perhaps, at this moment anticipating, with joy, my professional success in this country, and will blend your names with their thanks to the grand Dissemmer of Events. It is there, gentlemen, in my domestic circle, I shall dwell on the retrospection of these hours; it is there that I shall instruct the being entrusted to my care to respect and love the patrons of his father; and while the pages of your history record achievements that give lustre to the political and warlike character of your country, be assured that the English actor will, to the last hour, extol the merits of your private worth, and gratefully transmit his Columbian laurels to the charge of his posterity.'

Literature and Science.

The Niger.—It is at length ascertained that the Niger empties itself into the Atlantic Ocean, a few degrees to the northward of the equator. This important fact is confirmed by the arrival of Mr. Dupuis, from Africa. This gentleman was appointed consul from this country at Ashantee, where Mr. Bowdich resided for some time. He is acquainted with the Arabic and Moorish languages, and got his intelligence by conversing with different traders he met with at Ashantee. He thought it so important as to warrant his voyage home to communicate to government what he had learnt. It happens that Mr. Dupuis has been anticipated in this discovery, by the geographical acumen of a gentleman of Glasgow, who arrived at the same conclusion by a most persevering and diligent investigation of the works of travellers and geographers, ancient and modern, and examining African captives; and had actually constructed, and submitted to the inspection of government, two or three months ago, a map of Africa, in which he lays down the Niger as emptying itself into the Atlantic, in about four degrees north latitude, after tracing out its entire course from the interior.

Freemasonry.—A chief of the society of Freemasons in Germany, who died about two years ago, left, among his papers, a most remarkable MS. containing a complete history of all the secret ceremonies, views, and plans of the association. This manuscript has been printed, and its publication, we are told, has excited an extraordinary sensation throughout the continent. It has already passed through many editions, and occasioned the publication of numberless controversial tracts.

Longevity in Russia.—The tables of longevity published for the year 1817, in the Russian empire, give the following results:—Amongst 828,561 persons who have died, all belonging to the Greek church, there appears to have been as follows: one above 140 years of age; one of 135; seven of 130; 21 of 123; 51 of 120; 83 of 115; and 783 above 100 years of age.

Mr. J. Williams is preparing for the press, a new edition of Blackstone's Commentaries, with notes and annotations, and corrections of the errors and misstatements of the learned and eloquent judge, as also of those of his less gifted editors. This edition will contain the author's last corrections, together with the celebrated passages on the liberty of the subject, which have been expanded from all the editions published of this valuable work, except the first.

An investigation of the numerous records of the city of Exeter, has lately taken place. These valuable articles of antiquity have long remained deposited in old chests, in a private apartment of the Guildhall, almost neglected. Upwards of one hundred manuscripts have already been discovered and examined by the Rev. George Oliver, Pitman Jones, Esq. &c. Many of them are beautifully written on fine vellum, and present some curious and interesting historical occurrences. The earliest yet found is of the time of King William Rufus, 1090, being about the period that Osbertus, the Norman, was Bishop of Exeter; and it is thought that some earlier manuscripts may still be discovered.

Oil Gas.—At a recent meeting at Hull, to consider of the propriety of lighting the town with gas, considerable discussion occurred as to the comparative merits of gas from oil and gas from coal. It was stated, that the oil gas threw a better light than that from coal, that it required 'smaller apparatus, that it was free from the offensive smell, so injurious to breath and destructive of comfort, by which coal gas was accompanied; that it did not corrode the pipes, nor tarnish nor discolour polished metals, silks, &c., as coal gas did; and that it was used in Covent Garden Theatre, in the Argyle Rooms, in Whitbread's brewery, and some other places.' One of the speakers ers alleged, on the contrary, that he procured 417 gallons of gas from 11lbs. of coal, which cost a penny. The coke produced was worth a penny, and the tar one penny more, so that he had a profit of 200 per cent. and the gas for nothing. Besides, his gas had produced no offensive smell, and he had not perceived that his pipes, which were of lead, had been corroded.—A letter was read, which observed, that 1000 feet of oil gas would produce a light equal to 3393 feet of coal gas. It appears that the Emperor Alexander is lighting up his palace at St. Petersburg with oil gas. The meeting unanimously agreed to resolutions in favour of gas from oil.

Chinese Statistics.—China contains 1,297,999 square miles, or 830,719,300 acres. The population is estimated at 330,000,000, and the revenue amounts to 12,140,625l. There are 256 persons to a square mile; and the tax upon each inhabitant is not more than eightpence halfpenny annually; and yet the people are wretched, and infanticide is allowed, to prevent the expense of bringing up a family.

When Frederick of Prussia proclaimed his new code of laws, it rendered lawyers unnecessary, and a very large body of them signed a petition to his Majesty, praying his relief, and ending with a request to know what they were to do? Under these circumstances, the King wrote this laconic answer: 'Such as are tall enough, may enlist for grenadiers, and the shortest will do for drummers or fifers.'

James II.—When it was discovered that the Earl of Somerset and his lady were concerned in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, Lord Chief Justice Coke granted his warrant for apprehending them, which was served upon the earl when he was at supper with the King. Somerset claimed his Majesty's protection, but the King answered, 'Gude faith, man, I cannot help it; if Coke send to me, I must gang to him as well as you.' This is a fair specimen of that canting pedant's hypocrisy.

Alliteration.—The late Mr. Pitt, the translator of Virgil, exhibited a striking instance of the facility of alliterative composition. I believe that it was in a mixed company, that the apt alliterations of Mr. Pope, in the translations of Homer, were spoken of as happy specimens of poetic skill, and Mr. Pitt was, in some degree, abused for having paid little attention, in his works, to the use of this figure. But Mr. Pitt, it seems, held alliteration in contempt; and said that it was not for want of opportunity that he had not used it, and that he thought it the easiest thing in the world to jingle alliterations together without end. 'Propose a subject,' said he, 'and I will give it you in alliterative array directly.' Some one present mentioned Cardinal Wolsey, whereupon, in a minute or two, Mr. Pitt exclaimed,—

'Begot by butchers, and by bishops bred,
How high his honour holds his haughty head.'

Early English Poetry. (Author unknown.)

I do confess thou't young and fair,
And I might have been brought to love thee,
Had I not found the slightest prayer
That breath could move, had power to move thee;

But I can let thee now alone,
As worthy to be lov'd by none.

I do confess thou't sweet, but find
Thou such an untruth of thy sweets;
Thy favours are but like the wind,
That kisseth every thing it meets.
And since thou can't with more than one,
Thou't worthy to be lov'd by none.
The morning rose that natouch'd stands,
Arm'd with its briars, how sweet it smells!
But pluck'd and strain'd by ruder hands,
Its sweet no longer with it dwells;
But scent and beauty both are gone,
And leaves fall from it, one by one.

Such fate, ere long, will thee betide,
When thou hast banded been awhile,
Like faded flowers—be thrown aside,
And I shall sing, when some will smile,
To see thy love for every one
Hath brought thee to be lov'd by none.

TO READERS & CORRESPONDENTS.

We thank R. E. for his good wishes and his kind suggestion; but to insert the price of books and the names of the publishers, would subject us to the advertisement duty for each review.

The 'Elegy' is not of sufficient general interest, and the 'Nosegay' does not boast many sweets; on these grounds we are compelled to decline their insertion.

The 'Birth Day' in our next; but we are lovers of truth, and, therefore, cannot, knowingly, insert a 'Falseness'; the article will, therefore, be left at our office for the writer.

Mr. PARRY is requested to send to our publisher.

Review of New Books.

An Historical and Picturesque Tour of the Seine, from Paris to the Sea. Illustrated and embellished by twenty-four highly finished and colored Engravings, from Drawings made by Messrs. Prugin and Gendall. Parts I. and II. Elephant 4to. London, 1821.

This work, in plan and arrangement, is similar to the Tour of the Rhine, noticed in No. 83 of the Literary Chronicle, and to which it is intended as a companion. Only two of the six parts, in which it is intended to be comprised, are published, and these are so favourable specimens of the work, as to induce us to recommend it at once, without waiting for its completion. The engravings, of which there are four in each number, present interesting views, well executed; and the work is got up in that elegant style which usually distinguishes the productions of its tasteful publisher, Mr. Ackerman.

As the Tour commences at Paris, the first portion of the letter press is devoted to a notice of that capital, and occupies the two parts already published. Without entering into an account of the public edifices, which we here minutely described, we shall quote the general notice of the French metropolis:—

‘The origin of Paris is lost in the obscurity of ages; for, if we may believe Æneïd and some other historians, its foundation was anterior even to the building of Rome. The opinions of the learned differ also in regard to its extent in the early periods of its history; some asserting, that till the reign of Philip Augustus it was but a small town confined to the island in the Seine, now known by the appellation of la Cité. Others, on the contrary, declare that, immediately after the conquest of Gaul, Paris became, under the emperors, a large and flourishing city; and, in support of this opinion, they adduce the inscription of the Nauta Parisiorum of the time of Tiberius, the monuments dug up in the cathedral, the aqueduct found at a distance from the ancient town, the beautiful head of Cybele discovered in researches made near the church of St. Eustache, and, lastly, the ruins of the palace of the emperors, which are still to be seen in the rue de la Harpe, and which are, consequently, far from the spot to which Paris is said to have been limited. Add to these evidences, that all historians concur in stating, that on the death of St. Genevieve, in 509, her body was interred out of the city to the south; over her tomb was built a small chapel, instead of which Clovis erected a spacious church, which, though dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, was never known, from the earliest period after its foundation, by any other name than the church of St. Genevieve. This structure, and the palace of the emperors, could scarcely be the only buildings situated out of the town; so that, long before the reign of Philip Augustus, there must have been houses beyond the limits of the present Cité.

‘These contending opinions may, I think, be reconciled, if we recollect that, in the ninth century, Paris was besieged by the Normans, who could not make themselves masters of the city, properly so called, but who destroyed all the exterior buildings, and reduced the capital to the above-mentioned island, which resisted all their attacks.

‘From the time of Clovis, that is to say, ever since the year 482, Paris has been, invariably, the principal seat of the monarchy. Notwithstanding the successive partitions of the kingdom among the children of the sovereigns of the first dynasty, it was frequently agreed that this city should be possessed by them in common. The Kings of Burgundy, Austrasia, and Soissons, set the example of this species of contract. When the possessions of Caribert, King of Paris, had devolved to them, they agreed that none of the three should enter the place without the consent of the other two, lest, on that ground, he should claim to be considered as the only king of the Franks. Such was, at all times, the importance of Paris, that on the accession of Hugh Capet to the throne, the possession of the metropolis contributed not a little to the success of his projects. Recent events also, in 1814 and 1815, prove that the crown of France is inseparable from Paris.

‘If the most laborious researches furnish but vague notions respecting the period at which Paris was founded, we are left in equal uncertainty respecting the origin of the names of Lutetia and Paris. Some etymologists derive the former from Lucius, King of the Gauls, who is said to have given the name of Lutetia, or Luco- tecia, to this little city, encompassed by the two branches of the Seine.

‘Others deduce the appellation of Lutetia from lutum, which signifies mud, dirt, because the site was very marshy, especially near the bridge of Noire Dame. Ptolemy tells us, that it was called Luco-tecia, that is, white—probably from its situation, being surrounded by quarries of stone and gypsum. These verses of John Lascaris may allude to the same circumstance:—

‘*Nativo Luco-teciam candore consuecam
Dixere, ex etymo Gallicæ terra tuo.*’

John Baptist Mantuanus writes, that the Parthians, whom Hercules led from a corner of Arcadia, came to France, where they settled, and gave to the nation the name of Parisians, instead of Parthians. Lastly, some are of opinion, that Paris is compounded of Pura and Isis, that is, near the temple of Isis, which is supposed to have stood on the spot now occupied by St. Germain des Prés.

‘Nature herself marked out the place where this capital is built for the site of a mighty city. Paris is situated in 48° 34' 10" north latitude, and 2° 20' east longitude from Greenwich. On the north, it is sheltered from severe cold by an uninterrupted chain of hills, extending from the Faubourg St. Antoine to the Faubourg du Roule. The climate is healthy and temperate: the heat rises but rarely to twenty-four degrees, and the mean term of cold is about seven degrees. Twenty-eight roads conduct to the city, which is entered by sixty barriers, and is seven leagues in circumference. Its population exceeds seven hundred thousand souls; it contains thirty thousand houses, and eleven hundred streets. Its revenues are computed at about twenty-five millions of francs.

‘On calculating the quantity of commodities consumed in Paris in the course of a year, and setting them down at their medium price, we shall obtain an amount which, divided by the number of the inhabitants, shews that the average expenditure of each exceeds six hundred francs per annum. This sum will appear very small to those who have not studied political economy: it proves, nevertheless, that there is scarcely a capital in Europe, where the lower classes of the inhabitants can command more comforts than those of Paris.*

• This may be the fact, but the circumstance of each individual, on an average, expending 25l. per annum, does not prove it.—REV.

'Were it consistent with the plan of this work to give a complete history of the French capital, I should here introduce an epitome of the opinions of different historians respecting the antiquity of this celebrated city; I should describe its successive embellishments, and the revolutions which it has undergone; but I must not forget that I am restricted to an account of the edifices which border the banks of the Seine, at Paris, and of the scenery which embellishes that river in its course to the sea. Having, therefore, exhibited in this concise introduction a general view of the present state of the capital, I proceed to my subject, and beg the reader's pardon for entering on it so abruptly.

La Seine et l'Aurore descendant.
Vers la Reine de nos Cités
Leur ondes, leur rayons s'étendent
Entre des palais enchantés;
Un double fleuve la partage;
Le Louvre y baigne son image
Peinte dans ce vaste miroir;
Plus loin le Pavillon de Flore
Verra le soleil qui le dore Rougir les nuages du soir.

'The Seine intersects Paris longitudinally from east to west. This river, which abounds in fish, and rises in the forest of St. Seine, in Burgundy, affords a ready and not expensive medium for the conveyance of supplies of all kinds to this immense city. That advantage, together with the fertility of the surrounding country, tends to keep the necessities of life at a low price. The Seine is navigable at almost every period of the year: its breadth in front of the King's Garden is four hundred French feet, nine hundred at the Pont Neuf, and four hundred and twenty at Chailloit, below Paris.

'The principal cities of Europe are all distinguished by peculiar edifices or beauties, between which it is frequently difficult to institute a comparison, so that we are at a loss which to prefer. In this respect, Paris is so richly endowed as to fear no competition. There is one species of embellishment which is not to be found except in the capital of France. I mean those magnificent quays, which, extending nearly two leagues in length, hold the Seine captive for its own ornament from the Pont du Jardin du Roi to the Pont de l'Ecole Militaire. Broad pavements allow pedestrians to walk there without fear, and to enjoy the enchanting spectacle of the beautiful river, and the palaces reflected in its current. This magnificent decoration alone would confer high distinction on Paris.'

Every one who has visited Paris, and attended to the political economy by which its affairs are regulated, has admired the arrangements by which the price of provisions is kept within proper limits. This is effected by various means; such as the strict attention to the markets, and the allowance made to the city by the government, but principally by the public granaries, which, by treasuring up in plentiful seasons, affords an abundance for time of want, and prevents those miseries which too often occur in countries where a similar plan is not adopted. With a description of the Greniers de Reserve, in Paris, we conclude our notice of this elegant work:—

'The denomination of Greniers de Reserve sufficiently denotes the object of this public granary. The administration, providing with laudable attention for the wants of this immense metropolis, was deeply impressed with the utility of a magazine for the reception of corn collected in plentiful years, as a store against those of scarcity. This plan is the more beneficial, inasmuch as it tends to keep corn at a reasonable price, in case a too productive year should, by reducing its natural value, deprive the husbandman of the just reward of his labour: when, on the contrary, the soil or unfavourable seasons deny to the farmer a suitable return for his toil, and, owing to a scanty crop, the price of the first necessary of life rises too high, then it is that the wisdom of such an establishment is more particularly demonstrated.

'The real treasures amassed in the public granary will always enable the administration to keep bread at a moderate price, and the people will wait with patience till the bounty of heaven grants a more abundant harvest. It is by such institutions, founded for the general advantage, that a government ensures the happiness and tranquillity of a kingdom.

'The first stone of this granary was laid in 1807, but the work was not prosecuted with activity till the following year. The edifice is one thousand and fifty-eight feet in length, and sixty-three feet in breadth. It consists of five projecting and four receding parts. According to the original plan, it was to have consisted of a vaulted basement and five stories, exclusively of the lofts. Under the whole of the building there are cellars for the reception of fine wines. Below these, were constructed four aqueducts, because it was at first designed that this vast edifice should contain flour-mills, with wheels for raising the sacks to the different floors; and it was intended that the water of the canal of Ourcq, after working them, should be discharged into the basin of la Garre.

'The works were interrupted in 1814; when they were resumed in 1816, it was decided that the edifice should be no more than one story high besides the lofts, and that the wood-work and roof should resemble those of the markets of Paris. It is just finished after the plan of M. de Lannoy, one of the first architects of Paris, at an expense of five millions of francs, and is capable of holding thirty thousand metrical quintals of corn.

The Mystery, or Forty Years Ago.
Three Vols. 12mo. London, 1820.

Calthorpe, or Fallen Fortunes. By the Author of the 'Mystery.' Three Vols. 12mo. London, 1820.

We have placed these works together as being the productions of the same author, within a very short period of each other. They, however, differ much in their character and merits.

The novel of 'The Mystery' was principally founded on facts; that of 'Calthorpe' is almost entirely fictitious. The former contained a well-written historical notice of the riots of 1780, and of the state of London at that period. An account of Major Houghton's journey to explore the interior of Africa, with some interesting particulars respecting Governor Wall, not very generally known, were also given in the course of the work. In 'Calthorpe,' the chief interest of the novel arises out of the murder of one of the principal characters, under such circumstances as induce the belief that the deceased has committed suicide; and he is, in consequence, consigned to the earth in that barbarous manner, which, to the disgrace of the age, is still exercised on a felo de se. The novel contains some well-sketched scenes, both of a serious and a comic nature; and, as we shall not attempt a detail of the plot, we shall select one scene which partakes, in some degree, of both. It is an account of the inquest held, at an inn, by Mr. Catastrophe, the coroner, on the body of the supposed suicide. The coroner and jury are at breakfast:—

'The animation of Mr. Coroner soon began to operate on his colleagues. The death-like gloom which had fallen on them began to vanish before the bright sun of his vivacity, and the comforts fast accumulating around them. Each began to reflect and "inwardly to digest," with other matter, that though life is brief and precarious, it contains some delights which rational men should not fail to seize while they may; as, whether they do so or not, they must be exposed to the same perils, and must finally sink beneath the inevitable stroke of death. The beneficial progress of these considerations was soon perceptible in the tranquil air with which the party, by the time the orders of the coroner had been duly attended to, were prepared to go through the ceremonies of breakfast, though these had been solemnized, in the usual way, by at least half the company, before the arrival of Mr. Catastrophe.

"A very melancholy business this that has called us together," he remarked, with a grave air, at the same time dismissing his egg-cup, with the incumbent shell, and reaching a second egg. "A very melancholy business, upon my honour. I do not know that any thing has occurred to affect me so much for a long time. I have really not been myself since I first heard of it.—Shall I trouble you to send me a slice of that ham, while your hand's in."

"It is, indeed, very melancholy."—"Very melancholy, indeed," ran round the room, in a sort of irregular chorus.

"I was shocked beyond measure."—"Not quite so much fat, if you please," Mr. Catastrophe proceeded, addressing himself to the gentleman who was then in the act of complying with his requisition for a new supply of ham. "There, that's just the thing. I am sorry to give you so much trouble, but really my appetite is so much impaired that I am obliged to study it more than formerly.—Mr. Burleigh was a man very much respected I believe, and this event—Another cup, if you please—What was I going to say?—O! Mrs. Muddle.—I quite forgot to ask after her, I hope she is well."

"Very poorly, indeed."—"Bless me, I'm extremely sorry to hear it. I hope nothing dangerous. In the old way, I suppose. She'll be better in eight or nine months.—Hey! You can't leave off your old tricks."

"Here Mr. Catastrophe treated the company with a laugh, in which his eye, glancing archly round the table, invited all present to join. Most of the gentlemen, by distending their nostrils and giving them, with the upper lip, a slight elevation, so as to imitate that arrangement of the features which, rising above a smile, gets half way to a laugh, had the complacency to indicate that they understood the drift of Mr. Catastrophe's wit. After being refreshed with a few more sallies, nearly or altogether as brilliant, the real business of the day was commenced under very favourable circumstances, as the jury were so far recovered by the good things they had seen, heard, and tasted, that the morbid sensibility which had, at first, threatened to impede the fair exercise of their reasoning faculties, was, thanks to the meritorious exertions and wise arrangements of Mr. Catastrophe, completely dissipated.

"The servants of the deceased proved, that Mr. Burleigh had been alive, and, apparently, in good health, on the night preceding the morning on which he was found dead in his bed. Several of them remembered that his air and manner had been strange of late. One had seen him reading in the garden, when his mind appeared so unusually abstracted, that he neither saw the deponent, nor a flower-pot which stood in his way, till he had nearly fallen over it. About the same period he had called another John, whose name was Thomas; and, one day, when news was taken to him, in his study, that dinner was on table, he started up, with an air of surprise, exclaiming, "Bless me!—I forgot that I had not dined."

"The medical gentleman who had been called in when the first alarm was given, described, with much technical parade, the situation in which the deceased had been found, and the wounds which he had received. He had sought, but in vain, to discover any pulsation in the wrist, or in the region of the heart. Witness was of opinion that the deceased's death was occasioned by loss of blood, from the wound in his breast; and by the obstruction of breathing caused by the stab in his wind-pipe. Both wounds were evidently inflicted by the point of a sword on the bed.

"John Jackson, a gentleman's servant, deposed that he had seen a man jump over Mr. Burleigh's garden wall, between one and two in the morning, and run away immediately on perceiving him on the outside; but, supposing it to be Frank Tibbins, Betty Notable's sweetheart, he did not give any alarm.

"Betty Notable, the housemaid, was next examined. She admitted that Frank Tibbins had been with her in the garden after the rest of the family had retired for the night; and also, that he had made good his retreat by leaping from the wall. She, however, denied that it was so late as one o'clock. In all her statements she was corroborated by the evidence of Frank Tibbins.

"A paper was now produced, which had been found on the table of the deceased, and was supposed to have been written immediately before the rash act was committed. It was signed with his name, and ran as follows:—

"To those I leave behind me.

"Life has become an intolerable burden to me, which I think, after bearing it so long, I have a right to lay down. I leave this, that it may be known the deed I am about to commit is my own act, that no other mortal may be suspected of that crime (if it be one) which is mine, and mine alone. "George Burleigh."

"The note was viewed with the most intense interest by the whole of the jurors, and listened to with the most thrilling sensations of awe.

"It escaped not the eye of Mr. Catastrophe that they were much affected; and he forthwith remarked, that, after the fatigue they had already undergone, a glass of Madeira and a sandwich would be no bad things to introduce in this stage of the proceedings, before they called witnesses to prove the hand-writing of the deceased. He accordingly rung the bell, and the landlord attending on the instant, the order was given.

"When the wine made its appearance, the coroner, after tasting it, pronounced a verdict in its favour. The gentlemen of the jury, one after another, took a glass on his recommendation, and, presently, felt themselves very considerably relieved. In the breathing time, thus afforded,

Mr. Muddle inquired of Mr. Catastrophe, when he had seen their friend 'Squire Freakish.

"Methim," replied the coroner, "by mere chance, this day week, at our old house, the King's Arms. We had a quest there, on a lady who was burnt to death. I arrived too soon, and luckily stumbled on Jack Freakish; so we played a game at billiards till the jurors arrived. He waited for me till it was over. I soon knocked off the business, and then we dined together at the King's Arms; had some of Swig's best—number thirty-five. You remember the number. The binn is not out yet, but it gets low. We had a very merry day together, I assure you."

"The sandwiches were now brought in, and the landlord made his appearance to express regret that there was no cold fowl in the house. This was kindly excused by Mr. Catastrophe, who, however, remarked that some of the gentlemen might prefer a glass of Port, and it might, therefore, be as well to bring in a bottle. He added:

"Of course the family have given orders to have every thing provided for the accommodation of the gentlemen of the jury, that may be required."

"Sir?"

"The note of interrogation that accompanied the monosyllable, which last escaped the landlord, was not exactly to the taste of the coroner. To him there appeared something suspicious in it. He therefore went on:

"I say, the family have, as a matter of course, directed you to provide whatever may be requisite for the accommodation of the gentlemen on the inquest."

"No, sir; I have received no orders from any one but yourself; but I shall be very happy to supply whatever Mr. Catastrophe may think proper to call for.—Did you say a bottle of Port?"

"Hey!—yes—stay—gentlemen, shall we have any Port this morning?"

"It's rather early to begin drinking Port." "All the jurors, who had been perfectly willing that a bottle of Port should crown the festivity of the morning, while they supposed somebody else was to pay for it, now declared, and voce, that they could not drink Port before dinner; so the question was carried in the negative, and the landlord left the room.

"Mr. Catastrophe looked unusually grave. He had ordered refreshments, and the jurors might suppose, unless he gave them to understand the contrary, that if no one else came forward, he intended to pay for them out of his own pocket. This apprehension gave his feelings a very severe shock.

"Gentlemen," said he, "this is really quite unprecedented. On an inquest like this, it was, of course, to be supposed that the friends of the deceased, whom we all know to be rolling in wealth, would have taken especial care that the jurors should be properly accommodated."—Lord Burleigh, for the sake of a brother. I should have expected, would have looked to this, even though confined to his chamber by the gout. However, gentlemen, you see how it is: we are left to make a Yorkshire club of it."

"The juror, were, unanimously, of opinion that some accommodation ought to have been provided by the relations of the deceased; the sandwiches and Madeira were not relished half so well as the breakfast had been, and the suspended inquiry was resumed with much sullen dignity.

"Several witnesses who knew the hand writing of Mr. Burleigh were examined, all of whom believed,—were confident,—had no doubt,—that the paper produced to them had been written by the deceased. Two or three persons came forward to prove acts of insanity; but what they disposed served only to show that much occasional abstraction of mind had been remarked in Mr. Burleigh, and the former evidence on this subject was not at all strengthened by what these witnesses advanced.

"The coroner, when he came to sum up, addressing the jury, said,—In the earlier stages of this business, he had inclined to the opinion that the deceased was insane when he committed the fatal act; but he confessed that he was much staggered by the paper which had been produced, and which had been proved to be in Mr. Burleigh's hand-writing. That which had been advanced to prove insanity, he could not help thinking, went rather to indicate that mental absence which was not uncommon in men of studious habits, than any positive derangement of intellect. They had, however, first to consider, whether the wounds had been inflicted by the deceased himself, or by some other hand. On this head he thought the evidence quite conclusive; and, having briefly stated to them the law applicable to self-murder, he left it to them to decide on the merits of the case.

"After deliberating for about an hour, the jury decided that the deceased died by his own hand, and returned a verdict of Pelo de se."

This scene, though not 'described with all the spirit of a Smollet,' as a cotemporary has declared, is calculated to give a favorable opinion of 'Calthorpe,' of which, as to the style, it is a fair specimen.

Memoirs of the Rebellion in 1745 and 1746. By the Chevalier de Johnstone. (Continued from p. 68.)

WE concluded our last week's notice of this work with an account of the battle of Falkirk, so fatal to the English army. This battle is said to have given great satisfaction to General Cope; he had made bets to the amount of ten thousand guineas, in the different coffee-houses in London, that the first general sent to command an army against the rebels in Scotland, would be beaten. The account of Lord Loudon's dashing attempt to seize the prince at Moy, affords us an interesting extract:—

"On the 10th [February], the prince slept at Moy, a castle belonging to the chief of the clan of Mackintosh, about two leagues from Inverness. Lord Loudon, lieutenant-general in the service of King George, and colonel of a regiment of Highlanders, being at Inverness, with about two thousand regular troops, the prince intended to wait the arrival of the other column, before approaching nearer to that town. In the mean time, Lord Loudon formed the project of seizing by surprise the person of the prince, who could have no suspicion of any attempt of the kind, conceiving himself in perfect security at Moy; and his lordship would have succeeded in this design, but for the intervention of that invisible Being who frequently chuses to manifest his power in overturning the best contrived schemes of feeble mortals. His lordship, at three o'clock in the afternoon, posted guards, and a chain of centinels, all round Inverness, both within and without the town, with positive orders not to suffer any person to leave it, on any pretext whatever, or whatever the rank of the person might be. He ordered, at the same time, fifteen hundred men to hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's warning; and having assembled this body of troops without noise, and without alarming the inhabitants, he put himself at their head, and instantly set off, planning his march so as to arrive at the castle of Moy about eleven o'clock at night.

"Whilst some English officers were drinking in the house of Mrs. Bailly, an innkeeper in Inverness, and passing the time till the hour of their departure, her daughter, a girl of about thirteen or fourteen years of age, who happened to wait on them, paid great attention to their conversation, and, from certain expressions dropped from them, she discovered their designs. As soon as this generous girl was certain as to their intentions, she immediately left the house, escaped from the town, notwithstanding the vigilance of the centinels, and immediately took the road to Moy, running as fast as she was able, without shoes or stockings, which, to accelerate her progress, she had taken off, in order to inform the prince of the danger that menaced him. She reached Moy, quite out of breath, before Lord Loudon; and the prince, with difficulty, escaped in his robe de chambre, night-cap, and slippers, to the neighbouring mountains, where he passed the night in concealment. This daring girl, to whom the prince owed his life, was in great danger of losing her own, from her excessive fatigue on this occasion; but the care and attentions she experienced restored her to life, and her health was at length re-established. The prince, having no suspicion of such a daring attempt, had very few people with him in the castle of Moy.

"As soon as the girl had spread the alarm, the blacksmith of the village of Moy presented himself to the prince, and assured his royal highness that he had no occasion to leave the castle, as he would answer for it, with his head, that Lord Loudon and his troops would be obliged to return faster than they came. The prince had not sufficient confidence in his assurances to neglect seeking his safety by flight to the neighbouring mountains. However, the blacksmith, for his own satisfaction, put his project in execution. He instantly assembled a dozen of his companions, and advanced with them about a quarter of a league from the castle, on the road to Inverness. There he laid an ambuscade, placing six of his companions on each side of the highway, to wait the arrival of the detachment of Lord Loudon, enjoining them not to fire till he should tell them, and then not to fire together, but one after another. When the head of the detachment of Lord Loudon was opposite the twelve men, about eleven o'clock in the evening, the blacksmith called out with a loud voice, "Here come the villains, who intend carrying off our prince; fire, my lads, do not spare them,—give no quarter!" In an instant, muskets were discharged from each side of the road, and the detachment, seeing their project had taken wind, began to fly in the greatest disorder, imagining that our whole army was lying in wait for them. Such was their terror and consternation, that they did not stop till they reached Inverness. In this manner did a common blacksmith, with twelve of his companions, put Lord Loudon and fifteen hundred of his regular troops to flight. The sifer of his lordship, who happened to be at the head of the detachment, was killed by the first discharge; and the detachment did not wait for a second."

The author gives a very exaggerated account of the excesses committed by the King's troops quartered in Athol, whom he accuses of committing 'the most unheard of cruelties,—burning the houses of the gentlemen who were with the prince,—turning out their wives and children in the midst of winter, to perish in the mountains with cold and hunger, after subjecting them to every species of brutal treatment.' This statement the editor has very properly contradicted in a note. A daring exploit was successfully undertaken by Mr. Glasgow, an Irish officer in the service of France, at Keith, with a detachment of only two hundred men:—

'He arrived at Keith at one o'clock in the morning, without being discovered, and exactly at the time he calculated the march would occupy. On the sentinel before the guard-house calling out, "Who goes there?" Mr. Glasgow replied, "a friend," and advanced himself to the sentinel, whom he killed with his dirk. The Highlanders immediately rushed on the guard, who at first made some resistance, but were soon disarmed. Then, without losing a moment, they flew through the town, making prisoners of the soldiers who were quartered in the houses of the inhab'tants; and Mr. Glasgow managed matters so well, that in less than an hour he accomplished his object, and retired with a hundred and eighty prisoners, whom he presented next day to the prince.'

The great number of prisoners taken by the rebels gave them much inconvenience, as their army being always in motion, they escaped, and joined their different regiments. A Mr. Peter Smith suggested to the prince to cut off the thumb of the right hand of every prisoner, which would render them incapable of holding their muskets. The Chevalier de Johnstone says, it was "consonant to justice to make no prisoners, but put all the enemy to the sword; yet the excessive attachment of the prince for the English nation, the executions of his family, prevented him from adopting any expedient which could give them the smallest umbrage." A very small umbrage, truly, cutting off the thumbs or taking the lives of every man found in arms for his King and country! The prince, however, was more humane, and he generally released them on their parole, not to serve against him for a limited time. Some officers, made prisoners at Falkirk, were required to add their oath to their parole, but the Duke of Cumberland issued circulars, absolving them from their parole and oath, when they all, excepting four, joined the army. Mr. Ross, one of the officers who refused, nobly replied to the duke, 'that he was master of their commissions, but not of their probity and honour'; and George II. afterwards expressed his approval of those who adhered punctually to their parole. We pass over the account of the battle of Culloden, so fatal to the cause of the Pretender, which has been detailed more at length by preceding historians. Much as we have heard of the cruelties of the Duke of Cumberland on this occasion, the following is new to us. The author says,—

'The Duke of Cumberland had the cruelty to allow our wounded to remain amongst the dead on the field of battle, strip of their clothes, from Wednesday, the day of our unfortunate engagement, till three o'clock in the afternoon of Friday, when he sent detachments to kill all those who were still in life; and a great many, who had resisted the effects of the continual rains which fell all that time, were then despatched. He ordered a barn, which contained many of the wounded Highlanders, to be set on fire; and having stationed soldiers round it, they, with fixed bayonets, drove back the unfortunate men who attempted to save themselves, into the flames, burning them alive in this horrible manner, as if they had not been fellow creatures.'

For the honour of human nature, we trust there is no truth in this charge against the royal duke, who possessed an amiable disposition, and is known to have acted generously towards the descendants of the unfortunate House of Stuart. The author blames Prince Charles for not placing himself at the head of the army in the battle of Culloden, and observes, justly, that 'there are occasions when a general ought to expose his person, and not remain beyond the reach of musketry.' What effect this would have had on the battle we know not; at all events, it was not only worth trying, but it was the duty of the prince to share the dangers of the day with his faithful followers; on the contrary,—

'As soon as the prince saw his army begin to give way, he made his escape, with a few horsemen of Fitzjames's piquet. Some hours after the battle, Lord

• We extract the following passage on this subject from the Percy Anecdotes:—'His royal highness incurred much odium for what has been styled his inhuman conduct to the Scotch rebels after the battle of Culloden; and a historian of no mean repute, Lord Lyttleton, coincides in this particular with the voice of the public. From some facts, however, subsequently communicated to the public, by a gentleman who was not only sincerely devoted to the House of Stuart, but actually fought under Prince Charles's standard, it would seem that the odium was not very well founded. We are told, for instance, that after the battle of Culloden, some of the officers in the duke's army were talking severely against Prince Charles, whom they termed the Pretender, and that the duke, on over-hearing the discourse, instantly rebuked the officers most sharply, observing to them, they were reviling one who, though his enemy, was a gentleman and a relation. And we are further assured, that every man of Prince Charles's army who happened to fall into the duke's own hands, during the rebellion, and after the battle at Culloden, was treated not only with humanity, but with tenderness.'

'These statements, though much at variance with the popular belief, especially in the northern part of the island, are perfectly in accordance with the conduct of the duke on other occasions, of which many highly honourable traits are extant.—Anecdotes of George the Third and His Family.

Elcho found him in a cabin, beside the River Nairn, surrounded by Irish, and without a single Scotsman near him, in a state of complete dejection, without the least hope of being able to re-establish his affairs, having given himself altogether up to the pernicious councils of Sheridan, and the other Irish, who governed him as they pleased, and abandoned every other project, but that of escaping to France as soon as possible. Lord Elcho represented to him, that this check was nothing, as was really the case; and exerted himself to the utmost to persuade him to think only of rallying his army, putting himself at its head, and trying once more the fortune of war, as the disaster might be easily repaired; but he was insensible to all that his lordship could suggest, and utterly disregarded his advice.

'I arrived,' continues the author, 'on the 18th, at Ruthven, which happened, by chance, to become the rallying point of our army, without having been previously fixed on. There I found the Duke of Athol, Lord George Murray, the Duke of Perth, Lord John Drummond, Lord Ogilvie, and many other chiefs of clans, with about four or five thousand Highlanders, all in the best possible disposition for renewing hostilities and taking their revenge. The little town of Ruthven is about eight leagues from Inverness, by a road through the mountains, very narrow, full of tremendously high precipices, where there are several passes which a hundred men could defend against ten thousand, by merely rolling down rocks from the summit of the mountains.'

'Lord George [Murray] immediately dispatched people to guard the passes, and, at the same time, sent off an aid-de-camp to inform the prince, that a great part of his army was assembled at Ruthven; that the Highlanders were full of animation and ardour, and eager to be led against the enemy; that the Grants, and other Highland clans, who had, till then, remained neuter, were disposed to declare themselves in his favour, seeing the inevitable destruction of their country from the proximity of the victorious army of the Duke of Cumberland; that all the clans who had received leave of absence, would assemble there in the course of a few days; and that, instead of five or six thousand men, the whole of the number present at the battle of Culloden, from the absence of those who had returned to their homes, and of those who had left the army on reaching Culloden, on the morning of the 16th, to go to sleep, he might count upon eight or nine thousand men at least, a greater number than he had at any time in his army. Every body earnestly intreated the Prince to come immediately, and put himself at the head of this force.'

'We passed the 19th at Ruthven, without any news from the prince. All the Highlanders were cheerful, and full of of spirits, to a degree, perhaps, never before witnessed in an army so recently beaten, expecting, with impatience, every moment, the arrival of the prince; but, on the 20th, Mr. Macleod, Lord George's aid-de-camp, who had been sent to him, returned with the following laconic answer: "Let every man seek his safety in the best way he can;" an inconsiderate answer, heart-breaking to the brave men who had sacrificed themselves for him. However critical our situation, the prince ought not to have despaired. On occasions when every thing is to be feared, we ought to lay aside fear; when we are surrounded with dangers, no danger ought to alarm us. With the best plans we may fail in our enterprises; but the firmness we display in misfortune is the noblest ornament of virtue. This is the manner in which a prince ought to conduct himself, who, with an unexampled rashness, landed in Scotland with only seven men.

'We were masters of the passes between Ruthven and Inverness, which gave us sufficient time to assemble our adherents. The clan of Macpherson of Clunie, consisting of five hundred very brave men, besides many other Highlanders, who had not been able to reach Inverness before the battle, joined us at Ruthven; so that our numbers increased every moment, and I am thoroughly convinced that, in the course of eight days, we should have had a more powerful army than ever, capable of re-establishing, without delay, the state of our affairs, and of avenging the barbarous cruelties of the Duke of Cumberland. But the prince was inexorable and immovable in his resolution of abandoning his enterprise, and terminating in this inglorious manner, an expedition, the rapid progress of which had fixed the attention of all Europe. Unfortunately, he had nobody to advise with but Sir Thomas Sheridan, and other Irishmen, who were altogether ignorant of the nature and resources of the country, and the character of the Highlanders; and who had nothing to lose, but, on the contrary, a great deal to gain on arriving in France, where several of them have since laid the foundations of their fortunes.

'Our separation at Ruthven was truly affecting. We bade one another an eternal adieu. No one could tell whether the scaffold would not be his fate. The Highlanders gave vent to their grief in wild howlings and lamentations; the tears flowed down their cheeks when they thought that their country was now at the discretion of the Duke of Cumberland, and on the point of being plundered; whilst they and their children would be reduced to slavery, and plunged, without resource, into a state of remediless distress.

'An accident which took place at Inverness, some days after the battle, might have proved very advantageous to us, if the prince had joined us at Ruthven. A young gentleman of the name of Forbes, related to Lord Forbes, and a cadet in an English regiment, having abandoned his colours to join the prince, had the misfortune to be taken prisoner, and was hanged at Inverness, without any distinction, amongst the other deserters. Whilst the body of Forbes was still suspended from the gibbet, a brutal and vulgar English officer plunged his sword into his body, and swore that "all his countrymen were traitors and rebels like himself." A Scots officer, who heard the impertinence of this Englishman, immediately drew his sword, and demanded satisfaction for the insult done to his country; and, whilst they fought, all the officers took part in the quarrel, and swords were drawn in every direction. The soldiers, at the same time, of their own accord, beat to arms, drew up along the streets, the Scots on one side and the English on the other, beginning a very warm combat with fixed bayonets. The Duke of Cumberland happening to be out of town, information was immediately conveyed to him, and he hastened to the scene of action before this warfare had made much progress. He addressed himself immediately to the Scots, whom he endeavoured to mollify by the high compliments he paid them. He told them that, whenever he had had the honour of commanding them, he had always experienced their fidelity and attachment to his family, as well as their courage and exemplary conduct; and he at length succeeded in appeasing them.

'Thus did Prince Charles begin his enterprise with seven men, and abandon it at a moment he might have been at the head of as many thousands,—preferring to wander up and down the mountains alone, exposed every instant to be taken and put to death by detachments of the English troops, sent by the Duke of Cumberland in pursuit of him, and who followed him closely, often passed quite near him, and from whom he escaped as if by miracle,—to putting himself at the head of a body of brave and determined men, of whose fidelity and attachment he was secure, and all of whom would have shed the last drop of their blood in his defence. Indeed, this was now the only means of saving themselves from the scaffold, and their families from being slaughtered by a furious, enraged, and barbarous soldiery. The Highlands are full of precipices and passes through mountains, where only one person can proceed at a time, and where a thousand men can defend themselves against a hundred thousand, for years; and, as it abounds with horned cattle, of which they sell above one hundred thousand yearly to the English, provisions would not have been wanting. But this partisan warfare it would only have been necessary to adopt as a last resource; for I am morally certain that, in the course of ten or twelve days, we should have been in a condition to return to Inverness, and fight the Duke of Cumberland on equal terms. Whenever I reflect on this subject, I am always astonished that Lord George Murray, and the other chiefs of clans, did not resolve to carry on this mountain warfare themselves, for their own defence; as nothing can be more certain than what was said by a celebrated author, that, in a revolt, "when we draw the sword we ought to throw away the scabbard." There is no medium; we must conquer or die. This would have spared much of the blood which was afterwards shed on the scaffold in England, and would have prevented the almost total extermination of the race of Highlanders which has since taken place, either from the policy of the English government, the emigration of their families to the colonies, or from the numerous Highland regiments which have been often cut to pieces, and renewed during the last war.

'Prince Charles, for several months, was hotly pursued by detachments of English troops; and so very near were they frequently to him, that he had scarcely quitted a place before they arrived at it. Sometimes he was wholly surrounded by them. The Duke of Cumberland never failed to say to the commanders of these detachments, at the moment of their departure, "make no prisoners; you understand me." They had particular instructions to stab the prince, if he fell into their hands; but Divine wisdom frustrated the atrocious and barbarous designs and pursuits of the sanguinary Duke, whose officers and their detachments, his executors, inflicted more cruelties on the brave but unfortunate Highlanders, than would have been committed by the most ferocious savages of Canada. The generous and heroic action of Mr. Roderic Mackenzie, contributed greatly to save the prince from those blood-thirsty assassins.

'Mr. Mackenzie, a gentleman of good family in Scotland, had served, during the whole expedition, in the life-guards of Prince Charles. He was of the prince's size, and, to those who were not accustomed to see them together, might seem to resemble him a little. Mackenzie happened to be in a cabin with the prince, and two or three other persons, when, all of a sudden, they received information that they were surrounded by detachments of English troops, advancing from every point, as if they had received positive information that the prince was in the cabin. The prince was asleep at this moment, and was awakened for the purpose of being informed of his melancholy fate; namely, that it was morally impossible for him to save his life. He answered, "then we must die like brave men, with swords in our hands."—"No, my prince," replied Mackenzie; "resources still remain; I will take your name, and face one of these detachments. I know what my fate will be; but whilst I occupy it, your royal highness will have time to escape." Mackenzie darted forward with fury, sword in hand, against a detachment of fifty men, and on falling, covered with wounds, he exclaimed aloud, "You know not what you have done! I am your prince whom you have killed!" after which he instantly expired. They cut off his head, and carried it, without delay, to the Duke of Cumberland, nobody doubting that it was the head of Prince Charles. And the barbarous duke, having now, as he thought, obtained the head of the prince, the great object of his wishes, set off next day for London, with this head packed up, in his post-chaise.

This is another of those assertions, to which, unsupported as it is by other evidence, we must deny credence, as we must to the assertion, that the Duke of Cumberland gave instructions to his commanders, that they should not take the prince prisoner, but put him to instant death. The author closes the account of the prince, with briefly stating that he escaped to France. The remainder of the volume relates to the chevalier personally, which we must defer noticing at present. (To be concluded in our next.)

The Scrap Book; containing a Collection of Amusing and Striking Pieces, in Prose and Verse. With an Introduction, and occasional Remarks and Contributions. By John M'Diarmid, Author of the 'Life of William Cowper.' 12mo. pp. 396. Edinburgh and London, 1821.

MR. M'DIARMID'S modest title, 'The Scrap Book,' and his motto, that it is 'a thing of shreds and patches,' limits criticism to a remark on his taste or industry in the selection. 'The plan of the work is similar to that of those well-known school-books, the English Speaker—the English Reader—the Hive, &c.; but in the execution, the editor has trodden new ground, and has abandoned Addison and Johnson, Shakespeare and Milton, Pope and Dryden, for more modern authors. The descriptive, narrative, and didactic pieces, are principally from the Scotch novels,—the Edinburgh Review,—Jeffrey, Beattie, Hogg,—Modern Voyages and Travels, &c. The poetry is chiefly from Byron, Scott, Campbell, Moore, Crabbe, &c. with some few pieces from Swift, Cowper, and Prior. Of the humorous and miscellaneous pieces,—indeed of the whole collection, the author may say, varius locis dispersa in unum fasciculum relegi. From such an agreeable and amusing melange, we make a few extracts. The first may form a good sequel or companion to Johnstone's Memoirs of the Rebellion of 1745, at present under review:—

'Anecdotes, illustrative of the State of the Highlands after the Rebellion of Forty-five.—The field of Culloden and the scenes of cruelty which followed it, though fatal to the hopes of the Highlanders, who enthusiastically espoused the cause of Charles, yet did not utterly crush their hardy and predatory disposition. The clansmen retired, it is true, to the rocky fastnesses of their highest glens; they chewed the cud of bitter reflection, and they mourned their cottages burned, and their wives and children massacred at dead of night, or arrested in melancholy flight by death, amidst the snows of winter. But savage heroism was not altogether subdued within them by calamities such as these, calamities calculated to bend less lofty souls to the very dust of subjection. With them the effect was like that produced by attempting to curb the mountain cataraet,—they were divided into smaller and less important bodies, and their power was no longer forcible in its native stream; but each individual portion seemed to gain a particular character and consequence of its own, by separation from the main body, where it had been undistinguished and unobserved. It was thus that, lurking in little parties, among pine-clad precipices, in caverns known only to themselves, they now waged a minor warfare,—that which had the plundering of cattle for its object. But let us not look upon those men, driven as it were to desperation, as we do upon the wretched cow-stealers of the present day. That which is now considered as one of the basest of crimes, was then, in the eyes of the mountaineer, rather an honourable and chivalrous profession. Nothing was then more creditable than to be the leader of a daring band, to harry the low country of its live stock, and, above all, it was conceived to be perfectly fair to drive "Moray-land, where every gentleman had a right to take his prey."

'It was about this period, and (though it may surprise many) it was not much more than fifty years ago, that Mr. R—, a gentleman of the low country of Moray, was awakened early in a morning by the unpleasing intelligence of the Highlanders having carried off the whole of his cattle from a distant hill, grazing in Brae Moray, a few miles above the junction of the rapid rivers Findhorn and Livie, and between both. He was an active man, so that, after a few questions put to the breathless messenger, he lost not a moment in summoning and arming several servants; and, instead of taking the way to his farm, he struck at once across the country, in order to get as speedily as possible to a point, where the rocks and woods, hanging over the deep bed of the Findhorn, first begin to be crowned by steep and lofty mountains, receding in long and misty perspective. This was the grand pass into the boundless wastes frequented by the robbers; and here Mr. R—, I forded the river to its southern bank, and took his stand with his little party, well aware, that if he could not intercept his cattle here, he might abandon all further search after them.

'The spot chosen for the ambuscade was a beautiful range of scenery, known by the name of the Streens.—So deep is the hollow in many places, that some of the little cottages, with which its bottom is here and there sprinkled, have Gaelic appellations, implying, that they never see the sun. There were no houses near them; but the party lay concealed amongst some huge fragments of rock, shivered by the wedging ice of the previous winter, from the summit of a lofty crag, that hung half across the narrow holm where they stood. A little way further down the river, the passage was contracted to a rude and scrambling footpath, and behind them the glen was equally confined. Both extremities of the small amphitheatre were shaded by almost impenetrable thickets of birch, hazel, alder, and holly, whilst a few wild pines found a scanty subsistence for their roots, in mid-way air, on the face of the crags, and were twisted and writhed for lack of nourishment, into a thousand fantastic and picturesque forms. The serene sun of a beautiful summer's day was declining, and half the narrow haugh was, in broad and deep shadow, beautifully contrasted by the brilliant golden light that fell on the wooded bank on the other side of the river.

'Such was the scene where Mr. R—, I posted his party; and they had not waited long, listening in the silence of the evening, when they heard the distant lowing of the cattle, and the wild shouts of the reavers, re-echoed as they approached by the surrounding rocks. The sound came nearer and nearer; and, at last, the crashing of the boughs announced the appearance of the more advanced part of the drove, and the animals began to issue slowly from the tangled wood, or to rush violently forth, as the blows or slouts of the drivers were more or less impetuous. As they came out, they collected themselves into a group, and stood below, as if unwilling to proceed farther. In the rear of the last of the herd, Mr. R— saw, bursting singly from different parts of the brake, a party of fourteen Highlanders, all in the full costume of the mountains, and armed with dirk, pistols, and claymore, and two or three of them carrying antique fowling pieces. Mr. R—'s party consisted of not more than ten or eleven; but, telling them to be firm, he drew them forth from their ambuscade, and ranged them on the green turf. With some exclamations of surprise, the robbers, at the shrill whistle of their leader, rushed forwards and ranged themselves in front of their spoil. Mr. R— and his party stood their ground with determination, whilst the robbers appeared to hold a council of war. At last their chief, a little athletic man, with long red hair curling over his shoulders, and with a pale and thin, but acute visage, advanced a little way beyond the rest. "Mr. R—!" said he, in a loud voice, and speaking good English, though in a Highland accent, "are you for peace or war? if for war, look to yourself; if for peace and treaty, order your men to stand fast, and advance to meet me!" "I will treat," replied Mr. R—, "but can I trust to your keeping faith?"—"Trust to the honour of a gentleman!" rejoined the other, with an imperious air. The respective parties were ordered to stand their ground, and the two leaders advanced about seventy or eighty paces each, towards the middle of the space, with their loaded guns cocked, and presented at each other. A certain sum was demanded for the restitution of the cattle; Mr. R— had not so much about him, but he offered to give what money he had in his pocket, being a few pounds short of what the robber had asked. The bargain was concluded—the money paid—the guns uncocked and shouldered—and the two parties advanced to meet each other in perfect harmony. "And now, Mr. R—!" said the leader of the band, "you must look at your beasts to see that none of them be wanting." Mr. R— did so. "They are all here," said he, "but one small dun quoy."—"Make yourself easy about her," replied the other, "she shall be in your pasture before daylight to-morrow morning." The treaty being thus concluded, the robbers proceeded up the glen, and were soon hid beneath its thick foliage; whilst Mr. R—'s people took charge of the cattle and began to drive them homewards. The reaver was as good as his word; the next morning the dun quoy was seen grazing with the herd. Nobody knew how she came there; but her jaded and dragged appearance bespoke the length and the nature of the night journey she had performed.

The following are taken from the miscellaneous pieces, many of which we recognize as old friends:—

'Curious Rencontre.—A curious affair occurred, about two years ago, at a small church in Wales. The parson having a tame goat, which followed him to the church, and sat under the pulpit, the animal was so struck with the nodding of a drowsy Cambrian, who sat opposite to him, that taking the frequent inclinations of his head for a challenge to combat, he made a butt at his supposed antagonist, who, not perceiving from whence the blow proceeded, struck the person next him. The parson, who was also of the quorum, would have committed the drowsy Cambrian, when brought before him next day, especially as the latter had been convicted of reading and commenting on the newspapers; but as it was proved by several witnesses that his goat was the first aggressor, he observed, that if the people "tespided tivine service, it would be no wonder if peasts of the field was to rise upon all the clakopins in the country."

'Royal Society.—When King Charles II. dined with the members on the occasion of constituting them a Royal Society, towards the close of the evening, he expressed his satisfaction at being the first English monarch who had laid a foundation for a society, who proposed that their whole studies should be directed to the investigation of the arcana of nature, and added, with that peculiar gravity of countenance he usually wore on such occasions, that among such learned men he now hoped for a solution to a question which had long puzzled him. The case he thus stated:—"Suppose two pails of water were fixed in two different scales that were equally poised, and which weighed equally alike, and two live bream, or small fish, were put into either of these pails; he wanted to know the reason, why that pail, with such addition, should not weigh more than the other pail which was against it." Every one was ready to set at quiet the royal curiosity; but it appeared that every one was giving a different opinion. One, at length, offered so ridiculous a solution, that another of the members could not refrain from a loud laugh; when the King turning to him, insisted that he should give his sentiments as well as the rest. This he did without hesitation; and told his majesty, in plain terms, that he denied the fact; on which the King, in high mirth, exclaimed, "Oddis fish, brother, you are in the right." The jest was not ill designed. The story was often useful, to cool the enthusiasm of the scientific visionary who is apt to account for what never existed.

'Medical Anecdote.—Kien Long, Emperor of China, inquired of Sir G. Staunton the manner in which physicians were paid in England. When, with some difficulty, his majesty was made to comprehend the manner of paying their physicians so well in England for the time they were sick, he exclaimed, "Is any man well in England who can afford to be ill? Now I will inform you how I nianage my physicians: I have four, to whom the care of my health is committed; a certain weekly salary is allowed them; but the moment I am ill, their salary stops till I am well again. I need not inform you my illnesses are very short."

'Remarkable instance of Fidelity in a Servant.—In the winter of the year 1770, the Count and Countess Podotsky being on their way from Vienna to Cracow, the wolves, which are very numerous in the Carpathian mountains, and when the cold is very severe are more bold and savage than usual, came down in hordes, and pursued the carriage between the towns of Oswiek and Zator, the latter of which is only a few leagues from Cracow. Of two servants, one was sent before to bespeak post-horses; the other, whom the Count particularly esteemed for his fidelity, seeing the wolves come nearer and nearer, begged his master to permit him to leave them his horse, by which their rage would, in some measure, be satisfied, and they should gain time to reach Zator. The Count consented; the servant mounted behind the carriage, and let the horse go, which was seized by the wolves, and torn into a thousand pieces. Meantime, the travellers proceeded with all the speed they could, in hopes to reach the town, from which they were not very distant. But the horses were tired, and the wolves, becoming more savage now that they had tasted blood, had almost overtaken the carriage. In this extreme necessity, the servant cried out, "There is only one means of deliverance: I will go and meet the wolves, if you will swear to provide as a father for my wife and children. I must perish; but while they fall upon me, you will escape." Podotsky hesitated to comply; but as there was no prospect of escape, he consented, and solemnly vowed, that if he would sacrifice himself for their safety, he would constantly provide for his family. The servant immediately got down, went to meet the wolves, and was devoured! The Count reached the gates of Zator, and was saved.—The servant was a Protestant; his master a Catholic, and conscientiously kept his word.

'Interesting Anecdote.—Serjeant Weir, of the Scots Greys, was pay-serjeant of his troop, and, as such, might have excused serving in action, and, perhaps, he should not have been forward; but on such a day as the battle of Waterloo, he requested to be allowed to charge with the regiment. In one of the charges he fell, mortally wounded, and was left on the field. Corporal Scot, of the same regiment (who lost a leg), asserts, that when the field was searched for the wounded and slain, the body of Serjeant Weir was found with his name written on his forehead, by his own hand, dipped in his own blood! This, his comrade said, he was supposed to have done, that his body might be found and known, and that it might not be imagined he had disappeared with the money of the troop.

'Irish Humour.—An American citizen, for the purpose of arresting attention, caused his sign to be set up side down. One day, while the rain was pouring down with great violence, a son of Hibernia was discovered directly opposite, standing with some gravity upon his head, and fixing his eyes steadfastly upon the sign. On an inquiry being made of this inverted gentleman, why he stood in so singular an attitude, he answered, "I am trying to read that sign."

'Engineer.—An engineer, named Brindley, a man of considerable talent, had so completely identified himself with his enterprises, that he thought of nothing but plans, piers, levellings, perforating mountains, digging canals, &c. Being once called before the House of Commons on the subject of a certain affair, he was asked for what end he imagined rivers had been formed. "I suppose," replied he, "they were invented to supply navigable canals."

We may here remark, that the love of desultory reading appears to be increasing, if we may judge from the numerous volumes of Anecdotes, Collections, and Selections, which are now ushered forth: among which, the Scrap Book is entitled to a respectable rank.

Observations on Mr. Brougham's Bill 'for better providing the Means of Education for his Majesty's Subjects': shewing its Inadequacy to the end proposed, and the Danger which will arise from it to the Cause of Religious Liberty. 12mo. pp. 30. London, 1821.

It is generally understood to be Mr. Brougham's intention immediately to proceed with his 'bill for the education of the poor.' A numerous body in this country—the Protestant dissenters—feel very warmly interested in favour of the professed object of this measure, yet view the means by which it is to be accomplished, with considerable alarm; they are persuaded, on calm and deliberate reflection, that the proposed plan is essentially defective, and if adopted will retard rather than accelerate the progress of education; that it will be highly injurious to the interests of religious freedom; and, in its practical operation, prove to thousands of our fellow countrymen a source of bitter persecution. Hence the birth of this pamphlet, which is written in a truly Christian spirit, and deserves the consideration of every churchman and dissenter, because it is no party question, nor one which affects the separate interests of any religious denomination.

Account of the Voyage of Discovery and Circumnavigation performed in 1818, 1819, and 1820, by Captain Freycinet, Commander of the French Corvette Urania.

M. LOUIS DE FREYCINET, captain of a frigate, to whom the King had intrusted the command of the corvette Urania, in order to make a voyage of discovery in the South Seas, arrived at Havre, on the 18th of November, 1820.

The principal object of this expedition was to make the necessary observations for determining the configuration of the earth, and the strength of the magnetic power in the southern hemisphere; but having to traverse, during more than two years, a great extent of sea, M. de Freycinet was also to take advantage of all occasions which might offer to him, to augment our collections of natural history, to add new documents in hydrography, to those which are already deposited in the Royal Marine Depot.

The corvette Urania, fitted out at Toulon, in the early part of 1817, was furnished with every article necessary for a long voyage; she received a picked crew, and her quarter-deck was composed of officers equally distinguished for their zeal and the extent of their knowledge.

A numerous collection of the best instruments for physical and nautical astronomy, were put on board, to be used in the experiments and observations which were the essential objects of the voyage.

The Royal Academy of Sciences anxiously drew up, for M. de Freycinet, notes, necessary to guide him in his researches into general physics, natural history, geology, mineralogy, &c.

After long delays, occasioned by the difficulty of getting on board different objects necessary for the undertaking, the Urania set sail on the 17th of September, 1817.

Contrary winds obliged them to put into Gibraltar on the 11th of October, and she did not arrive at Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriffe, before the 22d of the same month.

This port would have been a commodious place for making observations of various kinds; but the necessity of first submitting to a long quarantine, determined M. de Freycinet to stop only for six days; and, on the 28th of October, he sailed for the Brazils.

On the 6th day of December, Cape Frio was observed, and its geographical position verified. The Urania entered Rio de Janeiro the same night, where she remained until the 29th of January.

The stay of nearly two months was not so usefully employed as M. de Freycinet wished: Some difficulties at first opposed themselves to the establishment of an observatory on shore. The bad weather, too, obstructed the astronomical observations; but those in magnetism, and the oscillations of the pendulum, were made with the greatest care; and, at the same time, the numerous specimens of natural history, and drawings of all kinds, commenced the valuable collections which were to be the fruits of the expedition.

The passage from Rio Janeiro to the Cape of Good Hope, was marked by a melancholy event, which deprived M. de Freycinet of one of his ablest colleagues. M. Laborde, an officer of distinguished merit, an accurate observer, a good draughtsman, and who joined to these excellent qualities a character the most sociable, died in the flower of his age. His loss, at first, caused an universal sorrow.

The Urania remained in Table Bay from the 7th of March till the 5th of April; and from thence they sailed to Port Louis, in the Isle of France, where they arrived on the 5th of May.

M. de Freycinet praises particularly the reception which he met with during these two stoppages, from Lord C. Somerset, the governor of the Cape; and from Mr. G. Smith, chief judge and commissioner of justice at Port Louis, from whom he received the greatest facilities, as well for the establishment of his observatory a-shore, as for the advancement of every thing which could contribute to the success of his mission.

Port Louis, placed nearly in the same latitude as Rio de Janeiro, and at a distance of more than one hundred degrees in longitude, was favourably situated for observations respecting the pendulum. Those were made in detail, as well as experiments, the objects of which were to enlarge the study of magnetism and of meteorology.

A very considerable damage, which had torn off the copper sheeting of the Urania, did not allow them to put to sea until the 16th of July. The corvette stopped only some days at the Isle of Bourbon, to take in provisions, and then directed her course towards the coasts of New Holland, the northern extremity of which was seen on the 11th of September, 1818. (This part of the coast is called Edle's Land.)

The Urania coasted along at a moderate distance, and, having fallen in with Endracht's Land, she followed it until she arrived at the entrance of Sea Dog's Bay, from whence, after a short stay, she sailed on the 13th of September, to the anchorage before the peninsula of Peron.

An observatory was at first established on shore, and then they were employed in procuring, by means of distillation, water fit to be drunk. Two stills had been shipped at Toulon for this purpose. Numerous defects, which it may probably be easy to remedy in other vessels, rendered almost null the products of the apparatus placed on board the corvette; but that which was put up on shore gave, in sufficient abundance, water pleasant to drink, and in which they could discover no noxious quality.

The Urania sailed on the 26th September; the intention of M. de Freycinet being to sail for Timor, in order to ascertain some points respecting its geographical position, of which he had doubts. He consequently sailed near the isles of Dorre and Bernier, which he coasted along at a good distance to the eastward, and in shallow water; when the corvette having struck on a sand bank, he was obliged to abandon the labour begun, and to bear off from the shore.

This event had no disagreeable consequence; the time passed at the anchorage on the bank was employed in exploring its figure and soundings, and M. de Freycinet gave it the name of the Bank of Urania.

On the 29th of October, 1827, the corvette cast anchor in the Bay of Coupang, in the Island of Timor, after having coasted on the west side of the isles of Linas and Reti, which belong to that archipelago.

The inhabitants of Coupang were then wholly busied in preparations for the war which the Dutch government was going to make on the rajah, Louis d'Amanoebang.

This circumstance rendered it difficult to purchase the provisions necessary to victual the corvette; but it did not hinder the scientific operations, which were carried on with the greatest zeal, in spite of the excessive height of the temperature; at the observatory, it stood, at times, at forty-five degrees of the thermometer (R-aumur's); whilst, in the shade, it kept at thirty-three or thirty-five degrees.

The Urania sailed from Coupang on the 23d of October, 1818, very badly provisioned, and with several men attacked with dysentery.

Calms and contrary currents detained them a long time between Timor and Ombay. This was taken advantage of to visit the village of Bitoca; it is situated on the south coast of the latter of these islands, has been, till now, little frequented by Europeans, and is peopled by a war-like and ferocious race, some of whom are anthropophagites.

Meanwhile, the number of dysenteric patients increased on board the corvette, and all the skill of M. Quoy, the surgeon-major, was not sufficient to overcome the influence of a devouring climate. The harbour of Coupang had furnished them with but few refreshments; it became, therefore, necessary to take a new station at Timor, and, accordingly, the Urania anchored at Dicy, the chief place among the Portuguese establishments on the north coast of that island.

A most obliging reception was given to the expedition by Don Jose Pinto Alcoforado d'Azevedo e Souza; and the corvette was abundantly provisioned, through his care, with every thing that she wanted.

Their stay here was only for five days, after which the Urania bent her course still along the coast of Timor, in order to get through the straits to the eastward of Vitters, by the channel that separates that isle from those of Kiffer and Roma.

On the 29th of November, they were in sight of Ceram and Amboyna, and, stretching into the strait between the latter island and Bournon, they bent their course towards the Isle Gase, which they doubled to the eastward at a small distance, during a violent storm. A great number of isles were observed, among which the most remarkable are those of Damoner, Gilolo, and Guébé.

In this passage, the Urania fell in with several armed canoes, belonging to the Kimalaha of Guébé. This prince came on board, and passed an entire day with them, during which his flotilla towed astern of the corvette. He furnished M. de Freycinet with various information respecting his country and his maritime expeditions, and made the strongest endeavours to induce him to stop at his island, where he assured him there was an excellent harbour, a commodious watering-place, and good refreshments. This proposition not being accepted, he assured him he would come with his brothers to Waigion, and pay him a new visit.

It was to the Isle Guébé that M. de Pavre was sent formerly, by M. de Coëtiva, to take drawings of the nutmeg trees, which have since multiplied so much in the Indian and American colonies. The Guébéans recollected that circumstance very well, of which they were themselves the first to speak; and M. de Freycinet attributes to their former relations with the French, the very particular amity which they testified towards him.

A pretty fresh breeze put an end to these amicable communications. The Urania, continuing her track, passed, on the 12th of December, the strait which separates the Isle of Monho from Guébé, and stretched to the eastward; she ran some risk in the strait formed by the isles of Rouij and of Balabalack, and by the Wyng Islands, where, during a calm, violent currents set upon shallows; but she was, fortunately, able to keep her anchorage, and to wait for such winds as permitted her to keep her way, until she got clear of that perilous situation.

She cast anchor on the 16th of December, at the Isle of Rawak, after having, at a short distance, coasted along the northern side of Waigion.

An observatory was established on shore, and its position, in latitude only one and a-half minute south, was the most favourable for experiments with the pendulum, which they could get under the equator. The period of this stay was employed in researches respecting geography and natural history.

Two or three days before they sailed, they heard, on a sudden, the martial music of tontons, kettle-drums, &c. Some moments after, there appeared, at the large point of the island, the fleet of the Kimalaha of Guébé, who, faithful to his promise, had come to pay the visit he had before announced. This little squadron presented a spectacle at once imposing and whimsical. The Guébéan prince was accompanied by his brothers and sons, to the number of eight; all, like himself, of good mien, and remarkable for their intelligence. They remained on board until the moment of the corvette's departure; they gave, as presents to M. de Freycinet, various curiosities of their country, and, among others, hats made of straw and minglass (talc), worked with admirable art.

EAVES DROPPING.

'What impudence!—not so, since, every day, His Lordship asks,—and who are you sir, pray?'

It is an old and common saying, 'that list-ners hear no good of themselves,' but this is founded in error; since we are told that Shakespeare and Ben Jonson used to listen, and smile at the good things which escaped through the key-hole of the green-room, and which spread, with much poetical fancy, round the smoky tavern. Who are you? is a very polite question at the theatre in the present day; and, while the card of address is bustled out of its case, the natural and home-striking reply is, 'Sir, I am a gentleman.' As such then I presume to be, and I flatter myself (and self flattery is sweet surely) I am out of the reach of that vulgar trinity,—'without wit, money, or manners;' for I cannot be void of wit when I laugh at my own jokes; I cannot be poor, since I invite myself to every friend's well-garnished table; nor can I want the customary catalogue of manners, while I am an automaton of flattery and an expert chess player in the abstract game of 'Pleasing made Easy.' Galen, Hippocrates, and other ancient sages, used the personal pronoun, now and then, in their venerable tomes, but modern orators and writers scorn the erudite ornaments of egotism; hence, it would be unbecoming in me to talk of myself. But, having over-heard some ladies at a tea-party, the other evening, to whom, it must appear, I am no stranger, I will give a sketch of myself.

'Yes,' continued Mrs. Retail, in affirmation of Miss Detail, 'I do verily believe Hog's-flesh is the ugliest man in the world; for my part, I like a well-looking young man.' 'That's generally the case with short ladies,' replied Mrs. Mimpit, 'no personal allusions, I beg, M^{rs}.m.' 'Hog's-flesh, I think, has an odd foot?' 'Oh yes!'—'is pockfretten';—has lost his front teeth?' 'So they say; but, as I never saw him laugh, I cannot be positive.' 'He is as bald as a tea-cup, and resembles it too, for he has neither shape nor height, and his temper is as crooked as his person.' 'Exactly so, but you know a tea-cup contains many good things.' 'I know it, I know it, Miss Catchup; I suppose Jessamy Hog's-flesh is a favorite of your's.' 'Not he, indeed, Mem; but I should like a husband with two eyes in his head; a lord of the creation, satanised as he is,—poor creature! it is his misfortune to be sure, and it is a pity some one does not receive his address; for he has a little understanding.' 'Like a grain of mustard-seed, scarcely perceptible.' 'He is a strange compound, as we sometimes say of tea: now a book-worm; now a jockey; now an amateur spouter; now a street-lounger and now the loquacious opinionist of the circulating library.' 'But you must allow him to be very engaging in his manners!—I fancy he has a snug little property!' 'Oh ay, to be sure he has.' 'Well, I always thought him a very sensible man; and he has so much small talk, and he has been to Paris, and seen the Louvre and what not?' 'None the better for that Miss.' 'Dear me, Madam! I like travellers, they tell one so many astonishing things.' 'You know a great deal about him, Miss, I hear;—'tis as I suspected: well, every one to her liking; and you will have a comfortable settlement, no doubt; for, if you are to his taste, he'll spare no expense.'

Here the bell rang, and Betty entering with the tea—and an additional complement of muffins, I was disturbed from my post, and abruptly necessitated to leave the moral for personal application.

The Family Trunk,

No. II.

BY MOSES VON MUCKLEWIT, GENT.

TRUNKS—THE GOUT—WIGS AND BEARDS.

It was my intention, in this my second lucubration, to present my readers, for their amusement and edification, with a full and erudite history of trunks, from the earliest records relating to that very useful piece of family furniture, down to the last new-invented patent trunks, to be had in such abundance in St. Paul's Church Yard and other parts of this metropolis. For this laudable purpose, I had, with infinite labour and much deep and patient research, investigated the whole subject, both in its general and specific varieties, beginning with the famous trunk of Pandora, commonly called Pandora's box,—and which, I doubt not, must have been a trunk of considerable size to be the depository, as it was, of all our sublimary evils and maladies. From this remote instance I had waded through an incredible mass, both ancient and modern, sacred and profane, until I arrived at what I consider the age of Truncomania in the history of English literature, when Chatterton and Ireland brought forth, from their celebrated trunks, the pretended relics of Rowley and Shakespeare; though I ought, by the way, to admit, that the last-mentioned trunk-finder fell infinitely below his Bristol rival in the merit of his discovery. All this I had done, examining, moreover, with due diligence, the various properties and functions of trunks, of all denominations, from the most minute pill-box imaginable, up to the most ponderous baggage chest that had ever been manufactured, when it suddenly occurred to me, that it might be more agreeable to my readers to see some of the contents of our FAMILY TRUNK than any of my own speculations, however ingenious or sublime they might be, on all the trunks in the universe. I shall, accordingly, devote this paper to one or two specimens of my father's most curious and out-of-the-way reading, of which he left several bundles, under the title of Collectanea, affixing thereto the various epithets of curiosa, erudita, rara, notabilia, &c., according to his judgment of their respective contents. But the reader must ever hold it in remembrance, that he is by no means bound to follow my father's opinion in these matters, which was often more whimsical and capricious than perhaps became a person of his profound and varied erudition.

I have observed in my former paper, that my father had been long and dolefully afflicted with that most doleful of distempers, the gout; and, in the course of his tedious struggle, and during the intervals that his paroxysms allowed him, he had travelled through an immense body of lore on this painful subject. He had consulted almost all the German and Dutch doctors who had treated of this malady, without being a whit the better for it, notwithstanding he had used all the remedies, both external and internal, and however opposite their nature, which those sages had prescribed,—living, at one time, on water, at another on wine, feasting to-day, with Fabricius, on radishes and leeks, and to-morrow feasting, like another Heliogabalus, on soups and ragouts. And, with respect to physical remedies, there were none to which he did not occasionally resort:—emetics, aperients, astringents, diuretics with sedatives and alteratives of all sorts, and phlebotomizing, in all its varieties, were, in their turn, tried and condemned. In a word, there was no diversity of diet or regimen with which my father did not afflict himself, till finding, as might naturally have been anticipated, that this experimental mode of living ended in no practical good, he came, at length, to the resolution of being his own doctor. With this view, he formed certain rules and regulations for his conduct in this particular, and to which he adhered with the most rigorous punctuality for the rest of his life. These rules he afterwards resolved to enlarge into a regular disquisition, under the following title:—A treatise on the gout, containing an easy and infallible mode of curing that afflictive disorder, as exemplified in the experience of the author himself: and he was actually on the point of committing his work to the press, when, in spite of his 'easy and infallible mode of cure,' he was compelled to give up the field to his old adversary, who set at naught all the cataplasms, blisters, and clysters, which my father could bring against him, and which were latterly become the weapons he most commonly used in this unequal contest.

I have thought it proper to notice, somewhat circumstantially, this work of my father's, not only because it was the last of any importance, in which he was occupied, but since it was in the course of his laborious researches on this occasion, that he collected several anecdotes of the gout, which are treasured up among the Collectanea, already alluded to, and of which the two following are here transcribed in my father's own words.

'M. Riedlin, a learned doctor of Ulm, narrates, in his laborious collection of cases, relating to the Praxis Medica, that a certain valet de chambre having received many clothes from his master, who was of a very gouty habit, wore some of them, whereupon he was instantly seized with the gout; and, though he immediately pulled them off, the gout remained, and he was more violently tormented: therewith than his master. This anecdote,' adds my father, 'ought to be publicly read by the common crier, once every week at least, in the purlieus of Moumouth Street and Saffron Hill.'

'The same author relates, that a Turkish physician, having been formerly taken prisoner by the imperial troops, was brought to the Emperor, who asked him if the gout was known in Turkey as well as in Germany? To this the physician answered, that many were afflicted with it, but were wont to cure it in the following manner. They make scarifications on the part affected, and then they take the blood that comes out, and put it in an egg-shell, which they stop very close, and set it under a hen. It is afterwards thrown to a hungry dog, who, after swallowing it, contracts the disease; and the patient, from that moment, experiences the desired relief. This M. Riedlin calls a cure by sympathy.'

Among the numerous topics, to which my father was attached in his studies, there was none on which he dwelt with more satisfaction than the different customs of the world concerning beards and wigs, and the various revolutions that have taken place, from time to time, in the cut, shape, and other particulars of these grave appendages. And nothing puzzled him more in his ruminations on this important point than the question, whether wigs were worn or not by the ancients. Of the venerable antiquity of beards he could have no doubt; but his scepticism with respect to wigs was, for a long time, evident, until good fortune threw in his way the celebrated work of M. Dutens, entitled 'Origine des Decourts, &c.' in which the learned writer proves, most satisfactorily, from Suetonius, Polybius, Horace, Ovid, Xenophon, and Herodias, that wigs were, in fact and bond fide, worn by the ancients. But of all the works my father had stumbled upon in this inquiry, the elaborate treatise of M. Thiers, entitled 'Histoire des Periwigs,' gave him the highest gratification, notwithstanding that the author differs in opinion from M. Dutens as to the antiquity of wigs. Often have I seen my father chuckle over this work with as much transport as a Spaniard is known to do in his first perusal of Don Quixote. The following summary of the opinions of M. Thiers, both with respect to wigs and beards, as preserved by my father in his Collectanea, shall, for the present, conclude my selections from our FAMILY TRUNK.

'The History of Periwigs is one of the most curious books published by M. Thiers. He designed it against those ecclesiastics, who are not content to wear their own hair. The year 1639, he says, is the epoch of periwigs in France: no clergyman wore a perwig before 1660, and there are no instances in antiquity. The Cardinal de Richelieu was the first who wore a calor: and the bishop of Evreux, having prefixed to the life of St. Francis de Sales, which he presented to Pope Alexander VIII., a portrait, wherein the saint appeared with a leather cap on, the Pope made considerable difficulty in accepting the book, attended with such an irregularity. M. Thiers exclaims against those ecclesiastics who powder their periwigs, and wear them of a different colour from their own hair. As for what concerns their beard and their band, he says no ecclesiastic wore a band before the middle of the last century. There have been many variations about their beards: sometimes shaving was looked upon as a great effeminacy, and a long beard as particularly suitable with sacerdotal gravity, while, at other times, a venerable beard was accounted a piece of pride and stateliness. When Cardinal D'Angennes went to take possession of his bishopric of Mans, in 1556, he was obliged to have an express order from the king to be admitted with his long beard, which he could not resolve to cut. M. Thiers acknowledges these variations about the beard; but he maintains that the discipline, as to periwigs, has always been constant and uniform, wherefore he concludes by praying the Pope and the King to suppress the innovation, that had then* taken place in this respect.'

THE WISDOM OF CATWG †.

A MAN'S CHOICE THINGS.

This was addressed by Catwg the Wise to his father Gwyallw Tegid, the son of Glywis, the son of Veler, the son of Cadell Deyrnllwg.

 14. To be just in his dealing :
 15. That whatever he doeth be to the will of God.

ANSWER OF CATWG TO TALIESIN.

I should be glad to know more than I do concerning thee: tell me what sort of a man thou art, said Taliesin to Catwg. In reply to him Catwg said—Thou oughtest to know better concerning me than I myself; for thou hearest as to me behind my back what never came to my ear, and to the country it belongs to judge; and it is not I, nor is it any one else, that knows the whole truth about himself.

PHILOSOPHICAL MILKMEN.

THAT milkmen are philosophers' true tie;
 They keep celestial elements in view;
 And, howsoever their fellow-men complain
 Of dismal prospects and incessant rain,
 Their scene's transform'd to sky-blue twice a day—

They get their living by the milky-way.

THE BIRTH DAY.

(FEBRUARY 4TH, 1821.)

AGAIN the sun rises

With bliss and delight;
 And the day-cloud surprises
 The shadows of night.

The feeling of sadness,
 Which pained yesterday,
 Has melted in gladness
 And vanished away;

And my soul has arisen its sorrow above,
 To greet the bright day that gave birth to my love.

Again my eye sparkles

With pleasure and peace;
 And the sorrow that darkles
 Is hidden to cease.

For that day shall never
 Be viewed with a tear,
 But, for ever and ever,
 Be sacred and dear;

And my prayer shall be offered to heaven above
 To hallow the day that gave birth to my love.

For why should I sorrow,
 Or my spirit sleep?

There is time on the morrow
 To languish and weep;
 Without striving to wail,
 With anguish, a day
 Whose admirers are wholly
 The generous and gay;

Then, no sigh of sorrow shall seem to reprove
 With its sadness, the day that gave birth to my love.

Oh, no! may its brightness

Be ever divine,
 And its heavenly lightness,
 My Emma, be thine;

May thy sunshine, when beaming,
 Be emblem of thee,
 When thy bonom is teeming
 With fondness for me!

And those visions, where fancy delighted to rove;
 Be fulfilled on the day that gave birth to my love.

And may every blessing,
 Lov'd Emma, be thine,
 When (caress'd and caressing,
 By heaven made mine;)
 Fled afar then the sorrow
 Which hover'd o'er me,
 And my fond soul can borrow
 Its pleasures of thee;

When the bright beam of heaven, dispensed from above,
 Shall make sacred the day that gave birth to my love!

THE BUTTERFLY AND VENUS FLOWER.

(A FABLE.)

THE Venus-Flower's so very curious,
 That when her attributes you mention,
 Some people deem the statement spurious,
 And all you utter wild invention.

Sceptics, I heartily dislike,
 Who never deign to look about me,
 To see those things which others strike,
 And yet, when represented, doubt me.

Let such doubt on:—the Venus-flower's
 Possesses this peculiar skill,
 To shield her style from sun or show'r,
 She opens and shuts her valves at will.
 Hence, when within her honey'd cup
 The future bee prepares to dive,
 Her velvet portals closing up,
 Buries the little thief alive.

One softly silent afternoon,—

The month I cannot quite remember:

'Twas March or April—May or June—

July or August—or September;

The swelling buds began to sever,
 Exhibiting such various tinges

As few can paint—tho' I endeavour,—

'Each vallance'd round with argent fringes.

'What elegance, the flow'r exclaim'd,

'Sits on these frost-besprinkl'd petals;

'And instantly the lady nam'd,

'With much contempt, the best of metals.

'The purple that pervades my flow'r

Rivals the dove's emblazon'd neck;

These stamens, how rich their gloss!

And this coronal—a la grecque!

A butterfly, that near her hover'd,

Hearing this boast of crowns and glosses,

At once her finest blossom cover'd,

And darted in his thin proboscis:

'My dearest friend!—and then he sip'd,—

'How is your health?—Inauscuate hawing.

And once again his trunk he slipp'd

Beneath the rich, embroider'd awning:

'The sun, methinks,' (another draught)

'Is growing (charming liquid) paler.

But now the flower perceiv'd his craft,

And thus assail'd the rude assailer:—

'Begone—I say, this instant hence,

Ere disposess'd of power to go;

Thy death ensues the next offence,

Thou summer friend and flatt'ring foe;

Thyself, and thy deceitful tribe,

I hold in hatred, mix'd with scorn,

Who kindness for the rich imbibe,

But shun the naked and forlorn.

When August shakes his orient tresses,

About my bloom you sport and bask;

But when that bloom the frost depresses,

Where lurks your lordship, then, I ask!

Thy love is but the love of self,—

Once more I say the poor you shun:

Begone! incorrigible elf,

Away! before you are undone.

This is a never failing rule,

Wherever we perceive a knave;

There, too, we recognize a fool,—

A fool that counsel cannot save.

The butterfly his former course

Pursuing still, with plastic trunk,

The valves disjoin'd, with sudden force,

And in the struggl'ing victim sunk.

APPLICATION.

I cannot say I much commend

Marilla's manners, or her heart:

She never will prove a faithful friend,

Who only likes the gay and smart.

As a dull atmosphere depresses

Quicksilver, and a fire elates;

Exactly so, as peoples' dresses

Are rich or plain, she loves or hates.

At home they style her Miss Cameleon:

She plays with folks or picks a quarrel,

Just as they shine in white cornelian

Or simply glow in modest coral.

Two topazes her ears bedeck,

Flamingly yellow and dependent;

Large beads of amber grace her neck,

With something ruddy and replendent—

Something!—a heart—and most suspect

The only heart the nymph possesses;

But poets ne'er ascribe defect

On idle jokes and wanton guesses.

Come, any one to see her mother,—

Before the maid the name announces,

She runs to one door, then another,

To get a peep and count her frownces.

The other day—(her parent out)

An old man to the dwelling came;

Sixty he seem'd, or there about,

And of his right leg rather lame:

Marilla looked disdain—and danc'd

Attward him, with a haughty air;

Her younger sister, Suke, advanc'd,

And gently offer'd him a chair.

Susan her name—they call'd her Suke,

Because, at home, no mighty favourite;

But still she bore with the rebuke,

And kindness felt for those who gave her it.

The stranger told a simple story:

He had been wounded in the wars,

And brushing back his ringlets hoary,

Show'd on his brow a brace of scars;

He pointed to his useless legs,

And own'd such woes were accidental—

They griev'd him not; but thus to beg

Was both an outward ill and mental,

Marilla tender'd him a shilling,

But made him from the bounty shrink,

Exclaiming, with an aspect killing,

'Begone! and spend it all in drink.'

Poor Susan grog'd about her pocket,

With fingers charitably nimble,

Produc'd a lussif—then a locket,—

Some sealing-wax,—and next a thimble.

Benevolent pursuit, but vain!

She could not find a single groat,

So, after feeling thrice, was fain

To stand absorb'd in mournful thought;

Graver her features grew, and graver,—

At last the locket—precious trinket—

Occurr'd, from further grief to save her,—

And that she offer'd—who would think it!

And yet to spare what we despise,

Is not donation, but denial;

To give, is granting things we prize,—

True charity infers a trial.

The old man, snatching, kiss'd the boon,

And then—as seiz'd with sudden dotage,

Begg'd them to come that afternoon,

To see, if not to himself, his cottage:

'It rises in the valley yonder,
And is, tho' unembellish'd, seemly.
Come, my sweet ladies, do not ponder,
Methinks you'll like the spot extremely.'—
'I visit you,' Marilla said,

'The crazy wreck begins to rave.'
Good temper'd Susan bent her head,
And her consent by silence gave.
The morning went—the evening came,
And Susan, tho' her sister rallied,
Wrapp'd in her cloak her taper frame,
Tied on her hat, and forward sallied.
The clouds were grey, the air was chill,
But there were signs of infant spring:
The primrose peep'd, and daffodil,—
The building chaffinch paus'd to sing,—
The gale came scented from the glen;
She knew the violet's respiration,
But tho' she look'd around her then,
Nature conceal'd its private station.
Proud man for little things cares nothing,
But nature cares so very much,
She clads them in her chastest clothing,
And tinges with her nicest touch.
Unlike your common place adorners,
The goddess chooses to embellish
Those unfrequented holes and corners
Which tasteful tempers only cherish.
Susan, aware of nature's arts,
Abandoning the open way
To those less known sequester'd parts,
Would often unattended stray.
She lov'd to watch the browsing deer,
Their sides with spots of velvet sprinkl'd;
To view the simple sheep, and hear
The bells that on the withers tinkled;
Along the Bowme's untrodden banks,
Her thoughtful course pursued the maid,—
Where Flora plays her earliest pranks,
With herbs that bloom and shrubs that fade.
She knew each flow'r's bud and leaf,
Whilst various notes of various birds
Enhanc'd her bliss or sooth'd her grief—
A poetess in all but words.
But lo! she reach'd the valley's centre,
And her amazement, who can tell,
On finding that she had to enter
A house in which a duke might dwell;
She turn'd to flee, but when the porter
Said that his lord her coming waited,
Shorter she drew her breath, and shorter,
Nor could have fled as meditated:
With humble bows and courteous airs,
He led her thro' a wide saloon,—
Whilst she, pursuing, said her prayers,
And mourn'd that that luckless afternoon.
She smil'd indeed, but smil'd in pain,
Quick follow'd by distressful tears,—
Just as the day concludes in rain,
When morning over bright appears:
At once the parlour doors unfold,
When, wonder-struck, her blue eyes greet
The beggar—now no longer old,
But young and gay, and at her feet;
Around his neck a golden chain
Hung loose, his splendid dress adorning,
And on his breast she saw again,
The granted locket of the morning.
'Forgive my stratagem,' he cried,
With kisses she forgot to parry,—
'Susan shall be Lorenzo's bride,
Or never will Lorenzo marry.'
When poor Marilla heard the tale,
No poet can describe her feelings;
At length she own'd that folks might fall
Who judg'd of apples by their peelings.

Fine Arts.

BRITISH GALLERY.—No. I.

'Quid vetat et nosmet.'—HORACE.

AMID the homage which is so universally and so deservedly lavished upon the old masters, those colossi of the arts; amid the admiration which, as it were, encrusts the sculptured remains of ancient and even of modern times, as far as they do not approximate to our own days; amid the eulogiums which have been passed upon the excellencies of foreign artists in the present age;—though in all these we ourselves participate, we are not sorry to witness the increasing encouragement which now begins to be given to native merits,—a spirit that the institution which is the subject of the present remarks has had no small share in promoting, in hurling the bolts of reason, not for the purpose of withering those bays, which shed their never-fading green around the temples of antiquity, but of blasting that icy hand of prejudice, which would thrust the wreath from the brows of those among our own countrymen, who would boldly climb the rugged steep of Fame to hail the immortal star which beams above its summit. That these labours have not been in vain, that this encouragement has not been without a cheering influence, the splendid exhibition which now graces the gallery of this institution will abundantly testify; the loftiness of genius, the strength of talent, and the finish of execution, have here contributed to raise and to embellish an honourable monument to the judgment, taste, and liberality which has still continued to mark the proceedings of this body, under whose auspices the present institution has attained such wide and beneficial influence. Of the liberality which prompted these endeavours, the undertaking itself bears ample testimony; of the two former qualities, the rich and splendid assemblage of talent, now submitted to the public, will not warrant any denial. All those whose works form this year's exhibition at the British Gallery, are native artists of the present time: very many are geniuses, who have risen into notice within these few years; and who, by their abilities, have arrested the attention, and kindled the expectations of the public. Having already extended our remarks on the general nature of the exhibition to so great a length, we shall terminate the present paper with a few observations on the specimens of sculpture, of which a very small number have been admitted into the gallery.—'Mercy,' No. 306, by H. W. Peck, though pleasing in the details, is, nevertheless, devoid of that impassioned energy which is demanded by the lines of Collins, which it is intended to illustrate; the figure of Mercy particularly wants that winning grace and easy passion which ought to invest the poet's lovely personification. Instead of the light and airy beauty which ought to adorn the embodied form of an abstract quality, the artist has presented us with a figure which might, with more propriety, be mistaken, by the stiffness of its attitude, and the ungracefulness of its form, for that of a Dutch woman hardened into stone, by the sudden application of the Gorgonian Ægis.—We were pleased to recognize, in No. 308, an old friend, 'Jacob wrestling with the Angel,' by Joseph Gott, which our readers may remember, obtained the gold medal of the Academy, in 1819. We cannot say we found our admiration decrease from a second view of this charming piece; and we much doubt if we do not feel a growing affection, the more we contemplate the delightful simplicity, the exquisite anatomical knowledge, and the almost breathing attitudes which characterize this pleasing performance.—To the 'Young Bacchante,' of the same artist, No. 309, we are sorry we cannot award the same unqualified approbation; it is spiritless and ungraceful, and does not at all approximate to that beau ideal, which, after all, must form the basis of all excellence in sculpture; indeed, Mr. Gott, in the present instance, seems to have chosen a model, which is as far removed as possible from that unalloyed loveliness which pervades the remnants of ancient art. 'Theseus rescuing Hippolyta from Eurytus,' by J. E. Hinchcliffe, No. 318, is a performance which unites great power of genius with much of that elegance of taste and freedom of execution which must always characterize the perfect sculptor. W. Scouler's 'Satan contemplating the Fall of Man,' No. 310, and the 'Death of Virginia,' No. 315, are two performances, both highly creditable to the genius which conceived, and to the talent which has embodied those conceptions. The former particularly breathes the soul of Milton's soul-stirring poetry; we trace, in the clenched hand and the up-cast look of agony, the strife of conflicting passions, we see, in the agitated lines of the countenance, those surging waves of bitter recollection, soon about to sink only into the ferocious calm of desperation. 'The Combat between Michael and Satan,' No. 313, executed in alto relievo, by C. Moore, is a work of considerable merit. The grin of the baffled archangel, expressive at once of malignity as well as agony, and the hand clenching the edge of its shield cast to the earth, are finely imagined; indeed, the whole piece is replete with energy and animation, as well in the execution as in the design; we must, however, object to the too forcible expression of fury with which the features of the Archangel Michael have been distorted; the artist should have recollected the words of the poet on another occasion,—

'Thou, while he spoke, and passion dimm'd his face,
Thine changed with pale ire, envy, and despair,
Which mard his borrow'd visage, and betray'd
His counterfeits, if any eye beheld—
For heavenly minds from such distempers foul
Are ever clear.'

W. H. PARRY.

The Drama.

It is with much pleasure we announce to our readers, that since our last, the two winter theatres have been honoured with visits from the King. On Tuesday night, his Majesty, accompanied by the Dukes of York and Clarence, went to Drury Lane Theatre, to witness the opera of Arlaxerxes and the farce of Who's who, with both of which he appeared highly delighted. On Wednesday night, his Majesty visited Covent Garden Theatre, when Twelfth Night and the new pantomime were performed. On both occasions, the theatres were crowded to excess long before the commencement of the performance, and thousands, unable to get in, filled all the minor theatres in the neighbourhood. Such was the anxiety to get admittance, that the avenues leading to the entrance doors of the theatres were crowded by three o'clock in the afternoon. The boxes were filled up in the same manner as when his late Majesty used to visit the theatres. His Majesty was received at both houses with the most ardent and enthusiastic cheers. God save the King and Rule Britannia were loudly called for, and readily sung by the vocal strength of the respective companies; and his Majesty had a good opportunity of witnessing that unshaken loyalty and attachment which the people of England feel for their sovereign;

and the respect which they show even at a time when the rancour of party is most violent.

DRURY LANE.—On Saturday night, a new melo-drama in three acts was produced at this theatre, entitled 'Therese, the Orphan of Geneva.' It is avowedly from the French, and is now performing on the continent with the most extraordinary success. It has not suffered in being transplanted to the British soil, 'since the play-bills (those oracles of truth and modesty), assure us that no piece, however successful, was ever received with such extraordinary applause,' and that 'it is the most successful piece ever produced.' Whether this may be the case or not, we know not, but if a tale of the most powerful interest, with all the advantages which good acting can give to it is calculated to ensure success, then must the drama of Therese be successful. We give a sketch of the story, which, however, affords but a feeble idea of the merits of the piece:—

Therese (Miss Kelly) is of a noble family of Geneva, but her mother having allied herself to one of inferior rank, conceals her marriage, and Therese, her daughter, is brought up in the family as an orphan, whom they had taken under their protection. The mother leaves her the whole of her fortune after her death; but other relations accuse her of having forged the will, and she is tried for crime and condemned. Carwin, an advocate, (Mr. Wallack,) who had been employed to conduct the prosecution, gets possession of the papers, and releases Therese from prison, in the hopes that she would marry him, and he thus gets possession of the estates. Her refusal excites his revenge,—Therese flies, and gains the protection of the Countess de Morville, (Mrs. Egerton,) whose son, the count, (Mr. Barnard,) falls in love with her, and offers his hand. While preparations are making for the nuptial ceremony, Carwin appears, and failing in persuading Therese to go with him, he denounces her to the count and countess as a criminal. The match is broken off, and the poor orphan turned out. She finds a friend in the pastor Fontaine, (Mr. Cooper,) who offers her an asylum in his house. When on her way thither, she is driven by a storm to seek shelter with a farmer Lavigne (Knight). When she has retired to rest, Carwin, who had watched her steps, again appears, and assuming the voice of Fontaine, induces her to quit her room. He attempts to stab her, but her shrieks bring the assistance of Lavigne, and he escapes. In the mean time, the countess and her son come to the farm, and the apartment of Therese is assigned to the former. Carwin returns, gets into the apartment, and kills the countess, under the supposition that it was Therese.

The building is set on fire. Therese hastens to the apartment,—discovers the murdered countess,—takes the bloody knife from her side, and in agony exclaims, 'It is I that have done it!' Circumstances appear strong against her, and she is accused of the murder; but Fontaine, who is still her friend, learns from her artless story the clue to detect the murderer. Carwin is taken in the forest; he audaciously denies his guilt, but still supposes that it is Therese who has fallen. He is dared to that ordeal of a superstitious age—touching the dead body. He hesitates, but at length agrees to it—folding doors open and discover Therese holding in her hand the knife with which he had committed the murder. Struck with horror and remorse, Carwin confesses his crime,—gives up the papers, which restore the orphan of Geneva to rank and fortune, and then dies.

Much as we have admired Miss Kelly on many occasions, we never saw her to such advantage. The tears that suffused many a cheek in more scenes than one, testified the power her acting had on the feelings of the audience. It was not acting—no one thought he saw Miss Kelly, but the wretched persecuted orphan of Geneva. Wallack gave great effect to the character of the villain Carwin, particularly in his interviews with Therese, and in the last scene, where he is accused of the murder. The good pastor, Fontaine, was very well sustained by Mr. Cooper, who deservedly received much applause. Knight had a comic part, with a touch of sentiment in it;—we need not say more, as every one who has seen this excellent actor, knows how much he can make of such a character. The other characters were well cast, and the drama was completely successful.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—The Soirées Amusantes still continue attractive. A new imitative piece, entitled the Green Room, has been produced, in which Mr. J. Knight gives (off the stage) some whimsical imitations of gentlemen very well known on it, particularly the managers of the winter theatres. The piece is amusing.

SURREY THEATRE.—A new historical melodrama, entitled Elizabeth and Essex, or the days of Queen Bess, was produced at this theatre on Monday last. It is adapted from Henry Jones's*

* This author was a bricklayer whom Lord Chesterfield patronised, long after his profligacy had made him unworthy of all assistance. At last he borrowed eight guineas of his lordship's servant, and never ventured to revisit the house. His tragedy of the Earl of Essex procured him a footing in the theatre, which enabled him to levy contributions upon the players by writing prologues and praising them in verse. His poetry was also of use to him in the sponge.

tragedy of the Earl of Essex, and details the eventful history of that distinguished favourite. The character of the maiden Queen was admirably performed by Miss Taylor, who gave a powerful delineation of the love, jealousy, and revenge, which alternately wrung the soul of Elizabeth. Huntley gave great effect to the part of Essex, but was rather too haughty in his interviews with his royal mistress. Miss Poole played the treacherous Countess of Nottingham very well, but Mrs. Young made sad work of the Countess of Rutland: she must not attempt any thing serious. The laughable barletta of Peggy Larkins followed, in which Wyatt revels to such ludicrous advantage, and Miss Copeland and Fitzwilliam keep the audience in continued good-humour. George Barnwell concluded the evening: the characters of the love-stricken youth and the wily and abandoned Milwood, could scarcely have been in better hands than those of Huntley and Miss Taylor. The house was crowded in every part.

LUCRETIVS.

In the year 1784, upon the death of Innocent XIII. the following satirical distinction was made between the candidates for the papal throne:—

Il cielo vuol	Orsini,
Il popolo	Corini,
Le donne	Ottoboni,
Il diavolo	Alberoni.
Heaven is for	Omini,
The people for	Comini,
The ladies for	Ottoboni,
The devil for	Alberoni.

ing-house, where he was a frequent guest; and he generally contrived to make the wife or daughter of the bullfinch his friend, by praising her in rhyme. He used to boast that he had thus prevailed upon a bullfinch's daughter to let him escape, and that, another time, he had actually borrowed two guineas of the bullfinch who had him in custody for a debt of ten pounds. His talents, if they could not preserve him from distress, assisted him in it. He wrote petitions for his fellow prisoners, assisted at the tap, and was sometimes trusted to keep the inner door.

After having been drunk for two days, he was found on the night of the third crushed by a waggon, in St. Martin's Lane, without his hat or coat; he was carried to the parish workhouse, and there terminated a disgraceful life, in the year 1770.

The Earl of Essex is his best known performance; he left a tragedy upon the story of Harold, which is lost, and a fragment of another, called The Cave Ida, which was finished and brought forth by Paul Hifferman. His papers fell into the hands of Reddish, who volunteered as executor, but Reddish was at first negligent, and afterwards deranged, and they never were produced.

When General Pichegru entered Maestricht, during the early period of the French revolution, he experienced some difficulty in obtaining quarters for his troops. A merchant, who considered himself very patriotic, called on him, and gave him a list of Orangists who had soldiers quartered on them, though not in sufficient numbers, in the opinion of this demagogue, who wished that the Aristocrats should have their houses filled with troops from the cellar to the garret. 'I am obliged to you for this information,' said Pichegru; 'and have they sent you any soldiers, citizen?' 'Yes, General.' 'How many?' 'Four.' 'That will do.' The merchant had no sooner returned home than forty more soldiers arrived, and took possession of his house. He hastened back to the general, to inform him that some mistake had taken place. 'Oh no,' said Pichegru, 'I only removed my men from those vile Orangists, who, I knew, would ill-treat them, to place them in the house of a patriot like you, where I am sure they will be received hospitably.'

Cherry Feast.—There is a feast celebrated at Hamburg, called the 'Feast of Cherries,' in which troops of children parade the streets with green boughs, ornamented with cherries, to commemorate the following event:—In 1432, the Hussites threatened the city of Hamburg with immediate destruction, when one of the citizens, named Wolf, proposed that all the children of the city, from seven to fourteen years of age, should be clad in mourning, and sent as supplicants to the enemy. Procopius Nasus, chief of the Hussites, was so touched with this spectacle, that he received the young supplicants, regaled them with cherries and other fruits, and promised them to spare the city. The children returned, crowned with leaves, holding cherries, and crying, 'victory.'

Singular Marriage.—In the year 1799, there was married, at Wells, Mary Evans, a lady born without arms, (but who enjoys the use of her toes so as to be able to cut out watch-papers, and work at her needle, with singular facility; and who for many years has attended the principal provincial fairs as a show, and thereby acquired a fortune of nearly 800*l*.) to the driver of her caravan, a young man named Simpson, whom time had made familiar to her deformity. Some difficulty arose as to the manner of disposing of the ring, which part of the ceremony was at length omitted.

THE COUNTRY LITERARY CHRONICLE, price 10*d*.—a Stamped Edition of the same Work, with the Addition of a brief Summary of the News of the Week, which is sent on the day of Publication, by all Newsmen, to all Parts of the United Kingdom, Postage Free.

On the First of every Month, Price 1*s*. 6*d*.

THE CAMBRO-BRITON, a Monthly Miscellany, dedicated to the literati of WALES, and more particularly designed to disseminate amongst strangers a correct knowledge of the History, Language, Antiquities, Manners, Focetry, and general Literature of that interesting portion of Great Britain.

The Numbers, already published, will be found to contain, amongst other matter, much rare information on the subjects above mentioned and especially with reference to the ancient LITERARY REMAINS OF WALES, which are little known, and are yet of a nature so interesting and so valuable.

It forms a principal object of The Cambro-Briton to furnish accurate translations of these, accompanied by illustrative remarks: and too much cannot be said of their importance, as they tend to elucidate the early History of this Island.

ROYAL FAMILY OF ENGLAND.

A General History of the House of Guelf, or Royal Family of Great Britain, from the earliest Period in which the Name appears upon Record, to the Accession of His Majesty King George the First to the Throne. With an Appendix of Authentic and Original Documents. By Andrew Halliday, M. D. Domestic Physician to his Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence. 4to. pp. 472. London, 1821.

NOTWITHSTANDING the republican spirit of our political institutions, and the blossoms of British loyalty, we much doubt that there is any nation in which the attachment to the monarch and the monarchy is so strong or so sincere as in England. Such being the case, whatever relates to the reigning family cannot fail of exciting a deep interest in every Briton.

Gibbon, who wrote a Dissertation on the Antiquities of the House of Brunswick, published in his posthumous works, says, 'An English subject may be prompted by a just and liberal curiosity, to investigate the origin and story of the House of Brunswick, which, after an alliance with the daughters of our kings, has been called by the voice of a free people to the legal inheritance of the crown.' Gibbon unapparently did not live to finish his researches, but the House of Brunswick possesses such well-founded claims to antiquity and importance, that it has engaged a more than ordinary share of the attention of genealogists and historians. The celebrated Leibnitz, who passed the last forty years of his life at the court of the Duke of Hanover, became the architect of a monument which this family were ambitious of raising to the glory of their name. His labours were published in several volumes, and laid the foundation of 'Ecard's Origines Guelficæ', which form five folio volumes. The Italian branch has been illustrated by Muratori in his Antichità Estense. But, with the exception of the dissertation of Gibbon, which he unhappily did not live to finish, and some trifling histories of the family published on the accession of George the First, which were merely translations of the ancient Brunswick Chronicles, full of fiction and falsehood, we have had no general history of a family which, on account of its rank and antiquity, is so well entitled to notice, until the publication before us, which traces the direct descent of his present Majesty through a series of thirty-three generations, and the long period of a thousand years:—

'Thirty-three generations and a thousand years,' says the author, 'occupy most certainly a small space even in the historical period of the world; but all greatness is relative; and it may be added, that there is not one family in Europe which can establish, by clear and contemporary proof, a similar antiquity. The House of Guelf appears as sovereign princes from the earliest period of their history. If, therefore, antiquity and illustrious birth are entitled in any degree to respect, Great Britain may be proud of her present sovereign; and although George the First owed the crown more immediately to his female parent, the reader will find, by consulting the genealogical tables, that he was the only lineal descendant of the Plantagenet stem. The blood which warmed the heart of Bruce flowed also in the veins of the Elector of Hanover. It cannot fail to be remarkable, in the history of this family, that while its sons acquired wealth and honour by their union with the daughters of emperors and kings, the daughters adorned the thrones of the greatest potentates in Europe and Asia.

'Could the conjectural evidence of the German antiquaries be admitted, not less than five centuries might be added to the period of our history, and fifteen generations more, of probable ancestors; but the highest ambition of human pride may be satisfied with what is certain in the pedigree of the House of Guelf. There is no sovereign house in Europe, ancient or modern, that has not been connected with, or sprung from, some branch of this family.'

In the present work, the author has not only drawn largely on the authorities we have stated, but he has possessed advantages unknown to the previous historians of this illustrious family. It appears, that during the twelve months which the Duke of Clarence lately passed in Hanover and other parts of Germany, the history and antiquities of his family occupied a considerable share of his attention; and that a number of valuable documents were collected relating chiefly to objects which had in some measure escaped the notice of preceding inquirers. These documents are of considerable importance in illustrating many doubtful points in the family history, and they are now given in an Appendix to this work, as records of the House of Guelf.

Without inquiring for the present, whether a more judicious use might not have been made of the materials which Dr. Halliday possessed, we shall proceed to analyze his work, and give a brief but succinct history of the royal family of England.

There is much of fact connected with the early history of the Guelfs, yet the diligent inquirer will discover that, at a period when the present reigning families of Europe were unheard of, or merely rising into notice, the ancestors of our sovereign were reigning princes. About the middle of the fifth century, the name Wlph, or, as it is now spelt, Guelf, first occurs as a leader or prince of the tribe of the Sycryr, a body of warriors who formerly occupied the southern shores of the Baltic, and some of the Danish islands, but at this period were in possession of what was called Noricum, the ancient Rhetia, and present country of the Tyrol. In 1590, we find a Guelf commanding the Boinvarii, or Bavarians, under Childebert, King of the Franks, and acting as an auxiliary of the Romans against Antharius, the King of the Lombards. But for a century afterwards, the name chiefly occurs among the princes of the Bavarian nation, and the nobles of Lombardy, or as one of the great officers of the court of France. From 613 to 635, a Guelf was the chamberlain of Dagobert, King of France, and employed by him in correcting and arranging the laws of the Gothic nations. This prince is said to have married a German, and to have settled in Bavaria, and from him were descended Guelph, who was Count of Bavaria in 670; Otkarius, Duke of Burgundy; Adelburtus, Count of Bavaria, and ancestor of the Marquesses of Tuscany; and Ruthardus, ancestor of the Counts of Altdorf and kings of Burgundy or Arles. Wolfhardus was the son of Adelburtus. His name, in German, signifying the 'doer of good works,' was literally translated into the Latin records of the age, and Bonifacius, Governor or Count of Lucca, and of the whole province of Tuscany, makes no contemptible figure in the days of Charlemagne:—

'After the death of Charlemagne, Louis the Pious, who succeeded him, being then a widower, determined on a second marriage. The fairest and noblest dames of the empire were invited to his court; and the beauty and accomplishments of Judith, daughter of Guelph, Count of Altdorf, and the grand-daughter of Ruthardus, was rewarded with what Gibbon calls, "a fond and feeble husband," in the person of Louis. During ten years, from 819 to 830, this daughter of Guelph enjoyed and embellished the feasts of an itinerant court; and, after passing through many vicissitudes, she died in peace and honour, in 845, leaving a posterity which reigned in France for a century and a half.'

Ethico, or Edico, the elder brother of the Empress Judith, was succeeded in 830 by his son, Guelph, who was succeeded by his son Ethiro, of whose son, Henry, it is recorded,—

'That being much at the court of the Emperor Arnolph, and having consented to receive and to hold, as a fief of the empire, as much land as he could surround in one day with a chariot, he had a little vehicle made of gold, with which he mounted his fleetest horses, stationed at proper distances, and so acquired about four thousand mansi or measures of land, within the twenty-four hours. As these estates lay in Upper Bavaria, he was created duke thereof, and engaged to perform the homage of a faithful client. From this circumstance, he is styled, in the words of that period, Henry of the Golden Chariot. This degradation, for so it was considered, so disgusted his free and independent father, that in the height of despair, he retired with only twelve of his lords to the forest of Ambargau, where he erected thirteen single cells, and where he lived and ended his days, without ever seeing or forgiving his degenerate son.'

From the 'Records of the House of Guelph,' we learn, that, after the death of his injured father, Henry ventured to visit this place of mournful solitude. Moved by the sight of its miserable condition, he determined to honour the memory of his father by providing a more comfortable abode for the remaining partakers of his solitude. There was no time for building a new monastery; he therefore removed them to Altmunster, and began the building of a new abbey at Altdorf, between the years 920 and 935, in order to have the faithful friends of his late father near him.

A lineal descendant of Henry of the Golden Chariot, was Guelph, the fourth Count of Altdorf, and second Duke of Bavaria of that name. He died in 1030, after having bestowed his daughter Cuniga, or Cunigunda, upon his kinsman Azo, the second Marquess of Este, with a dowry of eleven thousand mansi of land, in the valley of Elisina, in Lombardy. Thus were the two branches of the House of Guelph re-united.

This Azo the Second holds a conspicuous place in history. He was the common father of the German and Italian princes of the Brunswicks and Este lines of the House of Guelph. As the representative of the emperor, he was officially recognized in Italy, and from his immense possessions, he was designated, among the princes of his time, by the epithet of the Rich. At the age of seventeen, he was proscribed as a rebel, with his grandfather, his father, and three uncles; but in his fiftieth year, we find him governing the cities of Milan and Genoa, as the minister of the Emperor, and styled by Pope Gregory VII. the most faithful and best beloved of the Italian princes. Up to his hundredth year, he continued active amidst the vicissitudes of peace and war.

Henry the Black, one of his descendants, united to the lines of Guelph and Este, that of Billung, by marrying Wilfilda, the daughter and heiress of Magnus, the last duke of the Billung race. His son, Henry the Proud, in right of his mother, was now the representative of this noble family, who had been hereditary dukes of Saxony; and, by his marriage with Gertrude, the only daughter and heiress of the last Count of Nordheim, he acquired not only a right to the remaining Saxon states, but also to the title of Duke of Saxony, and Sovereign of Supplingenburg, Nordheim, and Brunswick. The marriage of Henry the Proud was celebrated with great splendour:—

'The nuptial feast was held, on the banks of a pleasant river in the plain of Lechirain, and that extensive plain was covered with tents and wooden edifices. A general invitation, had collected twenty, or thirty thousand guests, consisting of princes, barons, and knights; who, with their numerous retinues, continued to keep up a festival which, by the profuse hospitality of the bridegroom, was prolonged for several weeks. In all the tournaments of chivalry Henry bore off the prize.'

By this marriage with the only lineal descendant of Wittikend, the last Saxon king, Henry also acquired a right to and assumed the armorial bearings of that sovereign; and the white horse was adopted as the crest of the Guelphic princes. In the feuds which took place in the empire, Henry distinguished himself by his bravery and his talents, but he was not successful in gaining the imperial throne to which he was entitled. He died in 1139, leaving an only son, also named Henry, Duke of Saxony, in the tenth year of his age. This child was a prince of great promise, and by his fortitude and courage very early obtained the surname of the Lion. His education was that of a Saxon and a soldier, and at the age of eighteen he was admitted into the diet of Frankfort, composed of men and princes, and received the order of knighthood, which had been newly instituted. Europe was then agitated with the preparations for the second crusade; but as the northern states of Germany, with their allies of Denmark and Poland, preferred a holy warfare less remote, a hundred and sixty thousand soldiers of the cross were speedily enrolled, to convert or exterminate the idolatrous Slavi of the Baltic:—

'The young Duke of Saxony, with a numerous body of vassals and followers, formed a part of this army; and though the first campaign was neither successful nor glorious, he showed himself on a splendid theatre to the Christians and Pagans of the north. On the return of the Emperor from the Holy Land, Henry endeavoured, but without success, to wrest Bavaria from his Austrian competitor; and while he was detained on the Danube, it was announced to him that Conrad had entered Saxony with a numerous army, to deprive him also of that dukedom. "Command my vassals," replied the dauntless Henry, "to assemble at Brunswick on Christmas Day; they will find me at their head." Though the time was short, the distance long, and all the passes guarded, yet this young duke, disguising his person, with only three attendants, darted swiftly and secretly through the hostile country; and appearing on the fifth day in the camp at Brunswick, forced his imperial adversary to sound a precipitate retreat.

From the Emperor Barbarossa Henry obtained restitution of Bavaria. His power now extended from the shores of the Baltic to the Mediterranean Sea, and he was the most opulent sovereign of his age; but he was destined to experience a sad reverse of fortune, principally owing to his ambition. He laid himself open to the censure of the empire; its law was put in force against him,—he was declared a rebel and an outlaw,—all his states were disposed of, and the country occupied by a powerful army. Henry had married the Princess Royal of England, the daughter of Henry the Second. This monarch sent an ambassador to the Emperor, but could obtain for his son-in-law no relaxation of the edict against him, except that he might leave Germany with as many of his vassals as chose to accompany him, and that Matilda should have the government of the whole of the patrimonial states restored to her and her children, to be freely and peaceably enjoyed for ever. Henry left Germany for some time, but afterwards returned and settled at Brunswick, and, assisted by Richard the First of England with a fleet and some forces, he recovered the fortress of Stade, and conquered the duchy of Holstein, but was unable to retain possession of it. Henry was afterwards enabled to make some return to Richard Cœur de Lion for this assistance. When this king, in his return from the Holy Land, was seized at Vienna by the Duke of Austria, it was decided that the king should not be liberated until security was given for a ransom of 150,000 marks of silver. Among the illustrious princes who came forward in behalf of the King of England, Otho and William of Brunswick stand conspicuous: they voluntarily offered themselves as hostages for the payment of his ransom; but Henry the Lion having negotiated the treaty for his liberation, his promise was accepted. Henry does not appear to have engaged in any further hostilities; the sovereignty of all the provinces beyond the Elbe was restored to him, and he passed the remainder of his life at Brunswick in acts of piety and benevolence.

As it is our intention to extend our notice of this work to two numbers more, we shall conclude, for the present, with a genealogical table, which traces the descent of his present Majesty in a direct line from Egbert, King of England, and Alpin, King of Scotland.

LINEAL Descent of His Majesty King George the Fourth, from Egbert, the First of the Saxon Kings of England, and from Alpin, King of Scotland.

George the Fourth, whom God long preserve.

From Matilda, the eldest daughter of Henry the Second, the Dukes of Brunswick and Luneburg are lineally descended as stated in the first column of the table; and George the First and James the Second stood exactly in the same degree of relationship (the sixteenth in descent) to their common ancestor, Henry the Second. It further appears that Robert Bruce, and Otho the Infant, first Duke of Brunswick and Luneburg, were related in the same degree to Malcolm the Third of Scotland; and had Otho been a Scotsman, his claim to the crown was as good as that of either Bruce or Baliol. The young Duke of Brunswick might claim a nearer alliance to the crown of England, as the descendant of an elder brother of the Plantagenet blood; and the King of Sardinia, as the representative of Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans, daughter of Charles the First, is, perhaps, the most direct representative of the Stuart race; but the union of both bloods in the present Royal Family renders their claim superior to every other, although the Act of Succession had never existed.

Picturesque Illustrations of Buenos Ayres and Monte Video; consisting of Twenty-four Views, accompanied by Descriptions of the Scenery, and of the Costumes, Manners, &c. of the Inhabitants of those Cities and their Environs. By E. E. Vidal, Esq. 4to. London, 1830.

THE events which have occurred in the Spanish provinces in South America, during the last ten or fifteen years, have imparted to them considerable interest. The capture of Buenos Ayres, by Sir Home Popham, in 1806, may be said to have laid the groundwork of that revolution which has since extended so widely over this vast continent. The inactivity and incapacity of the viceroy, the Marquis de Sobre Monte, who abandoned the city to a small British force, was compensated by the bravery of Don Santiago Liniers, a Frenchman, who, two months after, attacked the city on different points, with success, and took the British general and his little army prisoners. This fortunate result occasioned the first step to that revolution which has since separated these provinces from the mother country; for the people of Buenos Ayres, indignant at the conduct of their viceroy, insisted on investing their deliverer with the supreme civil and military authority, with the title of captain-general. In the following year, Monte Video was taken by a British force, under Sir Samuel Auchmuty, and afterwards ingloriously lost by General Whitelock, who, by an ignominious capitulation, agreed to evacuate the whole of the Rio de la Plata, including Monte Video.

The rank and popularity of Liniers excited the envy of Elio, the governor of Monte Video, who found means to persuade the people of the east bank to renounce their dependence on the captain-general, and to form a distinct junta, in imitation of those of Spain. Liniers was superseded by Don Baltazar Hidalgo de Cisneros, who made known to the inhabitants the declaration of the regency in Spain, which absolved the Americans from any further dependence on the Spanish government. A congress was assembled and a junta formed; but the Spanish chiefs in Paraguay opposed it, and Liniers, abandoned by the troops he had raised, was taken prisoner and executed.

In the beginning of the year 1811. Don Jose Artigas, a native of Monte Video, offered his services to the junta of Buenos Ayres, and obtained assistance, in arms, ammunition, and troops, for the purpose of exciting insurrection on the east bank of the Plata. He has been very successful, and has contributed largely towards establishing the independence of this province:—

‘With the exception of Monte Video, Artigas has possession of the whole of La Banda Oriental, which he governs independently; and a good understanding subsists between him and the congress, whose authority, after a long struggle, carried on with various vicissitudes against the royalists on the frontiers of Peru and Chili, is now acknowledged by the whole of the provinces of Rio de la Plata.

‘These provinces, twenty in number, are divided, according to their situation, into high and low. The former are, Moxos and Chiquitos, Apalobamba, Santa Cruz de la Sierra, La Paz, Cochabamba, Carangas, Misque, Paria, Charcas, Potosi, and Atacama; the latter, Tarija, Caltia, Paraguay, Tucuman, Cordoba, Cuyo, Entrerios, Monte Video, or Banda Oriental, and Buenos Ayres. The total population of this immense tract does not exceed one million three hundred thousand souls.’

Such is a brief sketch of the modern history of these provinces; we shall now notice some of their local peculiarities, as detailed in the work before us. Buenos Ayres is situated on the west bank of the Rio de la Plata, above two hundred miles from its mouth. Before it became the seat of a viceroy, it was considered the fourth city in rank in South America, but it has since increased so rapidly in opulence and population, as to be held inferior to none but Lima:—

‘It is regularly built, the streets being perfectly straight and broad, unpaved in the middle but having footpaths on each side. The houses are supposed to amount to six thousand; and the number of inhabitants, which used to be estimated at forty thousand, is now reckoned not fewer than seventy thousand. Most of the buildings, both public and private, formerly had mud walls; but a Jesuit, who was employed to erect the church of his college, between seventy and eighty years ago, instructed the inhabitants in the art of making bricks and lime, and the city has since assumed a very different appearance. The architecture of the cathedral, and of most of the churches, is likewise ascribed to the lay-brothers of that community, who employed the Indians under their care in the execution of these and many other public works. Thus, it is recorded, that in 1688 and the following years, five hundred of these people were engaged upon the fortifications, the port, and the cathedral of Buenos Ayres. The latter is a spacious and handsome structure, having an elegant cupola and a portico, the design and execution of which are highly extolled. The interior is profusely decorated with carving and gilding. The dome contains paintings in compartments, representing the Acts of the Apostles. The church of the Franciscans, and that belonging to the order of Mercy, are next in rank; both have steeples and cupolas, nearly in the same style as those of the cathedral.

‘The climate of Buenos Ayres is proverbial for its salubrity, as is indicated by its name. Situated between the 33rd and 35th degrees of south latitude, it enjoys a temperature nearly resembling that of the southern regions of Europe. It is considered as an ordinary winter when there are but three or four days on which water is slightly frozen; it is reckoned severe when this effect is more frequent. The winds here are three times as violent as at Assumption, the capital of Paraguay; the west wind, which is scarcely known at the latter city, being probably intercepted by the Andes, though more than two hundred leagues distant, is more common at Buenos Ayres. Here the winds are least boisterous in autumn, but stronger and more steady in spring and summer, when they raise clouds of dust; which sometimes darken the sun, and greatly incommode the inhabitants, soiling their clothes, and covering their apartments and furniture.

‘In this country the atmosphere is moist, and spoils the furniture, especially at Buenos Ayres, where the floors of rooms exposed to the south, are always damp; the walls which have the same aspect are covered with moss, and the side of the roof is overgrown with thick grass, nearly three feet high, so that it is necessary to clear them every two or three years, to prevent the water from lodging and soaking through. This humidity, however, is by no means prejudicial to health.

Near the centre of the city, a little to the north of the citadel, is constructed a mole of rough stone, intended for a landing place. It is about two hundred yards long, twelve wide, and six high. Notwithstanding this projection, the river is so shoal, that boats are very seldom able to approach it, and five or six carts are constantly plying for the purpose of landing passengers. The fare is two rials, or about fifteen-pence each trip, be the distance small or great; sometimes it is but a few yards, while at others the cart must go a quarter of a mile before it reaches the boats; for with northerly and north-west winds, particularly if strong, the water is driven out of the river to such a degree, that its bed is frequently dry for that distance. It has even occurred within the last ten years, that men have gone out on horseback, on the bed of the river, to the distance of five miles from the shore, during a strong north-west wind; nay, it is related, on the most respectable authority, that, about twenty-five years ago, during a strong northerly wind, the water disappeared, and left an horizon of mud to the people of Buenos Ayres. Such a circumstance might happen, since the river is here thirty miles across, and has no more than three fathoms water in the deepest part, excepting close to the opposite shore of Colonia, where is a narrow channel of four, five, and six fathoms. A contrary effect is produced by an easterly wind, which, if violent, always raises the water at Buenos Ayres; so that in a strong gale from that quarter, the mole is sometimes covered, with the exception of the extreme point, which is higher than the rest, and has a battery of three guns. Thus these winds, according to their direction, cause the river to rise or fall, perhaps not less than seven feet. Mention is made of a phenomenon still more extraordinary, inasmuch as no satisfactory reason could be assigned for it. On one occasion, when none of those winds prevailed, the water fell to such a degree, as to recede three leagues from the shore at Buenos Ayres; in this state it remained for a whole day, and then gradually rose again to its usual height.

The city of Buenos Ayres is regularly supplied with milk from the surrounding estancias, or farms, from one to three miles distant. It is brought on horseback, in earthen or tin bottles, four and sometimes six of which are carried by each horse, in hide pockets, attached to the saddle, and laced up with a piece of thong.

Butter, or, at least any thing that deserves the name, is never made by the natives of Buenos Ayres. What they principally use for the purposes to which we apply it, is the fat of beef melted into dripping, and packed in bladders, like lard; this they universally denominate mantecca—butter.

All vegetables are dear at Buenos Ayres, as is likewise fruit, with the exception of peaches, which, in the season, are sold from ten to sixteen for a medio, about three-pence. The water-melons are excellent, and the most reasonable in price of all the other kinds of fruit, which, however, are not very numerous; strawberries, grapes of many sorts, figs, apples, pears, and melons, compose the list. The oranges and other similar fruit are abundant, and very good. All our common vegetables thrive at Buenos Ayres, except potatoes, which never exceed marble-size, the soil being too stiff for them.

Monte Video is situated on a small promontory, on the east bank of the Rio de la Plata, with a spacious bay on its northern side, forming a tolerable harbour for small vessels:—

The town makes a handsome appearance from the harbour, being built upon an ascent, and the houses interspersed with trees and gardens. Few of the houses exceed one story; they are of stone and brick, and have flat roofs, without chimneys; the fire being generally kindled in the yard, or in a detached kitchen, and brought into the rooms in fire-pans, when the weather is wet or cold. The streets are broad, and intersect each other at right angles, but they are unpaved. Near the top of the town is the market-place, about three hundred yards square, and on the west a large church. There is also a convent of Cordeliers.

Monte Video is acknowledged to be an admirable station for trade, having a tolerably good harbour, a central position for collecting produce, and the navigation of the river so far being attended with little danger. It rose, in consequence of these advantages, to be a very flourishing place; but the political revolutions which have convulsed almost the whole of Spanish America, have involved Monte Video in ruin.

The city itself is gone to decay, and though the Portuguese, who have lately taken possession of it, are making some improvements, still, as the distracted state of the country has put an end to all commerce, the means for carrying into effect any plans for that purpose, are extremely limited. There was formerly a very extensive suburb, with many elegant villas belonging to the Spanish merchants of the city; but it has been so completely desolated during the contest for independence, that some broken walls and a part of a chapel are all that now remains of what once contained a population of six thousand souls. Previously to this struggle, there were fourteen thousand inhabitants within the walls; this number is now reduced to five thousand.

This country is never likely to become very populous, on account of the bad state of the roads rendering intercourse so difficult; and as no gravel or stone of any kind, not even a pebble, is to be found on the west bank of the river for a hundred miles, in any direction, from Buenos Ayres, it is impossible to make good roads. The soil is a very stiff black earth, extremely retentive of water, and the country one vast flat. Wood is nearly as scarce as stone. The ordinary mode of travelling is on horseback. Some few coaches are used in Buenos Ayres, and let out to perform a journey, but the vehicles and their equipments are a caricature on posting. There are no waggons, but all carriages of burden have only two high wheels. These carts travel in convoys of from five to twenty, for owing to the nature of the country, it would be impossible for them to perform the journey singly. When the convoy arrives at a paniano, or bog, the difficulty of passing it is surmounted by the united strength of the cattle:—

Six bullocks are always used; two are attached to the pole of the cart, and the other four close to each other, with a great interval between them and the two first mentioned. In this manner the four foremost oxen have passed through the paniano, and are on firm ground, by the time the other two have brought the cart into the bog. They all draw by a beam, lashed to the horns of each pair with hide ropes, leading from the centre of it to the pole of the cart, and to each other's beam. No reins are used, the animals being guided entirely by the enormous goad slung in front of the cart, which being balanced by a weight at its inner end, is managed by the driver with uncommon dexterity. It is a bamboo, thirty-two feet long, with a small stick eight feet more, attached to it, having a gad fastened to its extremity. At the place where they are united, there is a piece of iron in the shape of a long spear, terminating in a sharp point, which serves as a goad for the second pair of the team, and is made to act on them by the bamboo being rapidly lowered with the pulley by which it is slung. The beasts next to the cart are guided by a short hand-goad.

No care being taken to keep the hide ropes by which the cart is drawn from trailing on the ground, the smallest mismanagement in a paniano may be attended with serious danger; for the ropes, if suffered to be slack, are liable to get between the bullock's legs, and throw them down; hence it is not uncommon for some of the team to be smothered in the mud, and it is then fortunate if the cart and the goods escape. The panianos are often three or four feet deep, so that the men could not venture into them, if they were inclined. When, therefore, an accident of this kind happens, the driver's only resource is the goad, which he plies most unmercifully, until by some plunge the animal either clears himself, or falls down to rise no more; in which case the rope is cut, and he is left to his fate.

Of the costume of the females, we have the following notice:—

Within these few years, the ladies of Buenos Ayres have adopted a style of dress between the English and French, retaining, indeed, the mantilla, which still gives it a peculiar character. No hat or bonnet is ever seen on a native lady, unless she be on horseback, when she wears a beaver hat and feather, with a riding habit.

The mantilla is usually a piece of silk, about half a yard wide in the middle, and a yard and a half long, sloping to a point at each end, which is terminated by a tassel. It is worn over the head and back of the neck, and being brought over the shoulders, the ends hang down in front. No brooch or pin is used to secure it; but it is artfully and gracefully confined under the chin by one hand, or by the end of the fan, without which no woman ever stirs, and made to conceal all but the eyes, or to discover the whole face, at the pleasure of the wearer.

In cold weather, or when they pay visits at night, they use the rebozo, which is a piece of cloth a yard wide, as long as the mantilla, and worn in the same manner. The mantilla belongs exclusively to the mistresses; and the rebozo is always worn by servants, whose little vanity is displayed in this part of their dress, which they are solicitous to have, if possible, of the finest cloth and most delicate colour, sometimes embroidered, or bordered with velvet or satin ribbons.

The church dress has not undergone any change, but retains its Spanish character, and is always made of black silk, worn with white stockings and white satin shoes. It is considered indecorous to attend mass in coloured attire. Sometimes a white veil is used, and a little white is introduced into the dress of the young girls, whose clothes, being made in all respects like those of grown persons, give them an air of extreme formality.

The children of both sexes are generally beautiful, but after the age of fourteen years, the girls cease to improve in appearance; they marry from that age upwards, and at twenty-five few retain any appearance of youth.

An interesting account of the herdsmen shall form our last extract:—

Azara has drawn a curious and entertaining picture of the manners of the inhabitants of the estancias, and the herdsmen in general of these parts, who are the least civilized of all the inhabitants; nay, indeed, their mode of life has almost reduced the Spaniards, who have embraced it, to the state of savage Indians. These herdsmen, in the government of Buenos Ayres alone, are employed in tending ten millions of horned cattle, and about two millions and a half of horses. An estancia, no more than four or five square leagues in extent, is looked upon as considerable at Buenos Ayres. In the centre of these estancias, are placed the habitations of the herdsmen, almost all without doors or windows, for which at night they use ox-bleds as substitutes.

These people never accompany their flocks and herds to the field, as in Europe. All they do is, to go out once a week, followed by a number of dogs, and to gallop round their respective estancias, shouting all the while. The cattle, grazing around at liberty, begin to run and assemble at a particular spot, called rodeo, where they are kept some time, and then allowed to return to their pasturage. The object of this operation is to prevent the animals from straying away from the lands of their owner; and they pursue the same method with the horses, which they collect not in the rodeo, but in the farmyard. The rest of the week they are employed in cutting the young steers and foals, or in breaking their horses; but the greatest part of the time they spend in idleness.

As these herdsmen are four, ten, and thirty leagues distant from one another, chapels are rare; consequently, they very seldom or never go to mass, frequently baptizing their children themselves, or even deferring the ceremony till their marriage, because it is then absolutely required. When they go to mass, they hear it on horseback, on the outside of the church or chapel, the doors of which are kept open on purpose.

These herdsmen have in general no other furniture in their huts than a barrel to hold water, a drinking-horn, some wooden spits for roasting meat, and a small copper-pot to boil water for making maté. Some have no pot; and, in this case, if they want to make broth for a sick person, they cut into small pieces, and put it into a bull's horn full of water, which they boil by setting it in a heap of hot ashes. A few possess a kettle and a bowl, one or two chairs, or a bench, and sometimes a bed, formed of four poles fastened to four stakes, which serve for legs, and a cow's hide thrown over them; but, in general, they sleep upon a hide spread on the bare ground. Instead of using chairs, they squat upon their heels, or sit upon the skull of a cow or horse. They never eat vegetables or salad, which they say are fit only for cattle, and will not touch any food prepared with oil, for which also they have the strongest aversion. They live entirely upon beef, roasted in the manner described in a succeeding article, (Goucho of Tucuman,) and without salt. They have no fixed hour for their meals; instead of wiping the mouth, they scrape it with the back of the knife, and rub their hands upon their legs or their boots.

They never touch real, and never drink till they have finished eating. The ground about their cottages is always covered with bones and with the carcasses of cattle, which, being there left to rot, produce an intolerable stench; the ribs, belly, and breast, being all that they eat, the rest of the animal is thrown away. These carcasses attract a prodigious number of birds, the incessant cries of which are a great annoyance; and the consequent corruption engenders an immense multitude of flies and insects.

The bailiffs, master-herdsmen, or proprietors, and in general those who can afford it, wear a doublet, waistcoat, and breeches, white drawers, a hat, shoes, and a poncho. Their men, on the other hand, wear nothing but the chiripa, which is a piece of coarse woollen cloth fastened with a cord round the waist. Many of them are without shirt; but have a hat, white drawers, a poncho, and short boots, made of the skin of the legs of a foal or calf; others use wild cats' skin for this purpose. As they have no barbers, and shave themselves but seldom, and then only with a knife, they generally have very long beards. The women go barefoot, and are very dirty. Their dress commonly consists of nothing but a shift without sleeves, fastened by a girdle round the waist; very often they have not a second for change. In this case they repair occasionally to the brink of some stream, strip it off, wash it, and spread it out in the sun; when dry, they put it on again, and return home. In general, they are not engaged either in needle-work or spinning; their employment is confined to sweeping the house, and making a fire for roasting meat, and boiling water for maté. The wives of the master-herdsmen, or those who possess any property, are of course somewhat better clad.

Born and bred in a desert, and having but little communication with their kind, these herdsmen are strangers to friendship, and inclined to suspicion and fraud; hence, when they play at cards, for which they have a violent passion, they usually squat upon their heels, holding their horse's bridle under their feet, lest he should run away; and they often have a dagger or knife stuck in the ground beside them, ready to dispatch the person with whom they are playing, if they perceive any disposition to cheating, in which they are great adepts. They gamble away all they possess, and with the utmost coolness. When one of them has lost his money, he will stake his shirt, if it be worth playing for; and the winner generally gives him, if good for nothing, to the loser, because none of them thinks of keeping two. When a couple are about to marry, they borrow linen, which they take off as soon as they leave the church, and return to the lenders. They have frequently neither house nor furniture, and their bed consists of a cow-hide spread upon the ground.

'Uninterrupted practice, almost from their birth, renders them incomparable horsemen, either for keeping firm in their seat or for galloping continually without tiring. In Europe, they would probably be thought to want grace, because their stirrups are long, and because they do not keep their knees close, but stick out their legs, without turning their toes towards the horse's ears; but then there is not the least danger of their losing their equilibrium for a moment, or of being thrown out of their seat either in trotting or galloping, or even by the kicking, capering, or any other movement of the animal, nay, you would almost swear, that the horse and the rider formed but one body, though their stirrups are mere triangles of wood, so small as to admit only the tip of the toe. In general, they mount indiscriminately the first foal they lay hold of, even though a wild one, and sometimes they will ride bulls themselves. With the lazo fastened to the girth of their horse, they stop at the distance of eighty or ninety feet, and secure any animal whatever, not excepting a bull, by throwing the lazo at his neck and legs, and they never miss catching the leg at which they aim. If their horse should fall while going at full gallop, most of them would not receive the least injury, but pith upon their legs by his side, with the bridle in their hands, ready to prevent his escape. By way of exercise, they desire any other person to throw the lazo at the legs of their horse while at a gallop, and they are sure to light upon theirs, though the animal should have fallen after a thousand curvets. In the use of the balls, they are not less expert than the Pamirs.'

The embellishments of this volume consist of a series of interesting and well-executed views of the romantic scenery of La Plata; and the whole work furnishes a clever, and we believe accurate, description of the provinces of Buenos Ayres and Monte Video.

Specimens of the Russian Poets. with Preliminary Remarks and Biographical Notices. Translated by John Bowring, F. L. S. 12mo. pp. 240. London, 1821.

ALTHOUGH we were aware that Russia was making rapid progress in the arts and sciences, as well as in civilization and political importance, yet we were by no means prepared to expect she had advanced so far in elegant literature, and particularly in poetry, as this really curious and interesting volume proves she has done. This is the more singular, if we consider the almost universal ignorance which pervaded this immense empire a century ago, when Peter the Great gave it the first impulse towards civilization; and that Lomonosov, the father of Russian poetry, was at that time unborn.

The elegant translator and editor of the present work had it in contemplation to write a general history of Russian literature; but deemed it desirable, as a prior step, to publish a few translations. We trust that these will excite sufficient interest and patronage to induce Mr. Bowring to prosecute the task for which he has given evidence of being so well qualified. The poems here translated are the productions of thirteen different authors; namely, Lomonosov, Derzhavin, Zhukovsky, Karamins, Khemnitz, Bogdanovich, Kostrov, Batiushkov, Dmitriev, Krilov, Bobrov, Davidov, and Neledinsky Meletzky. Of the seven first, critical and biographical notices are added. From the pen of the illustrious Von Adelung; and an introduction is prefixed, which gives a brief notice of the progress of Russian poetry. As the subject is highly novel and interesting, we shall quote an extract from the Introduction, and then select what we deem some of the best specimens of Russian poetry:—

'Lomonosov' is the father of Russian poetry. It did not advance from step to step through various gradations of improvement, but received from his extraordinary genius an elevation and a purity which are singularly opposed to the barbarous compositions which preceded him. His works have been collected into six volumes; and his name, as well as that of his rival Somorokov, has already found its way, with some particulars of his life and writings, into our biographical dictionaries.

'Somorokov, whose productions are very voluminous, and were once considered models of grace, beauty, and harmony, has been much neglected of late years. His dramatic compositions are, for the most part, gross and indecent; his contemptuous jealousy of Lomonosov, though so greatly his superior, is often most ridiculously intruding itself; but in one point of view, at least, he is entitled to respect and gratitude. He is the eldest of the Russian fabulists; the introducer of a species of composition, in which Russian poetry possesses treasures more varied and more valuable than that of any other nation. It is no mean praise to say,

• Or Broken Nose.

† Under the engravings of Lomonosov, an eulogium is generally found, of which the following is a translation:

Where Winter sits upon his throne of snow,

Thus spoke the bright Pantheonian Deity:

"Another Pindar is created now,

The king of bards, the lord of music, he."

And Russia's bosom heaved with holy glow—

"My Lomonosov! Pindar lives in thee!"

and it may be said truly, that Russia can produce more than one rival of the delightful La Fontaine. Of the dramatic writings of Somorokov, the best is the tragedy Demitriy Samosvetskiy, or the False Demetrius.

'Von Visin, who seems to have made Moliere his model, improved greatly upon Somorokov. His two most celebrated comedies are Nedoroski, the Spoilt Youth, and Brigadir, the Brigadier.

'Kheraskov holds a high rank among the lyric poets of Russia. He died a few years ago. He was curator of the Moscow University. He published a collection of his poems, which he entitled Bathariana, ili Neisvestniy; Bachariana, or the Unknown; but his great work is Rossida, ili Russkushenie Kasanji; the Russian, or the Destruction of Kasan.

'But of all the poets of Russia, Derzhavin is, in my conception, entitled to the very first place. His compositions breathe a high and sublime spirit; they are full of inspiration. His versification is sonorous, original, characteristic; his subjects generally such as allowed him to give full scope to his ardent imagination and lofty conceptions. Of modern poets, he most resembles Klopstock; his Oda Bog, Ode on God, with the exception of some of the wonderful passages of the Old Testament, "written with a pen of fire," and glowing with the brightness of heaven, passages of which Derzhavin has frequently availed himself, is one of the most impressive and sublime addresses I am acquainted with, on a subject so pre-eminently impressive and sublime. The first poem which excited the public attention to him was his Felizia.

'Bogdanovich has obtained the title of the Russian Anacreon. His Dushenka (Psyche) is a graceful and lovely poem. He has also written several dramatic pieces.

'Bobrov was well acquainted with the literature of the South of Europe, and has transfused many of its beauties into his native tongue. Our English writers especially have given great assistance to his honest plagiarism. His Kherosnida, an oriental epic poem, is not so good as Lalla Rookh, but it is very good notwithstanding.

'The name of Kostrov closes the list of the most eminent among the deceased poets of Russia. He died, not long ago, in the meridian of his days. He had made an admirable translation of Homer, and was engaged in a version of Ossian, which he left unfinished: the conclusion has since been added by Gniedich.

'Of all the living writers of Russia, or rather of all the writers Russia ever produced, the most successful and the most popular is Karamins. Derzhavin called him, long ago, "the nightingale of poetry," but it is not to his poetry alone that he owes his fame. Standing on the summit of modern literature in Russia, he has been loaded with honours and distinctions, which, however, have not served to check his wonted urbanity, or to chill his natural goodness of heart. When a young writer, he was fond of imitating Sterne*; a very bad model, it may be added, since the peculiarities which characterize him are only tolerable because they are original. Karamsin's style was then usually abrupt and unnatural, and his sentimentality wearisome and affected. But he has outlived his errors, and established his reputation on their subjection. His great undertaking, the Rossiiskaja Istoriya (History of Russia) is, without comparison, the first and best literary work which has been produced in the country it celebrates. It was received with loud eulogiums throughout the Russian empire; it has been translated into several European languages, and will probably long maintain a pre-eminent rank among Russian classics, and become one of the standard authorities of history.

* The peculiar excellence of the Russian fabulists has been mentioned. Somorokov and Khemnitzer, Dmitriev and Krilov, are the most distinguished among them. Dmitriev, who is still living at Moscow, has published a great number of fables and ballads. His style is easy, harmonious, and energetic; some of his compositions have a sublimer character; his religious poetry is dignified and solemn; his elegies are tender and affecting.

* Critlor holds an office in the imperial library at Petersburg. He is well known to the bona vivans of the English club. His heavy and unwieldy appearance is singularly contrasted with the shrewdness and the grace of his writings. He has published one volume of fables remarkable for their spirit and originality. He now employs himself in translating Herodotus, having, at an advanced period of life, first entered on the study of the languages of ancient Greece and Rome.

* Zhukovskij has printed some poetical translations of peculiar excellence. His Lindmilla (an imitation of Leonora) is deemed more beautiful and forcible than the original itself. Bürger appears to have captivated him. He has written on a variety of subjects, and is now engaged as a companion to the Grand Dukes.

The Russian language may be adapted to almost every species of versification. It is flexible, harmonious, full of rhymes, rich in compounds, and possesses all the elements of poetry. One merit the present translation possesses, which it would be well if translators in general adhered to,—that the measure of the original has been generally preserved.—But we are detaining our readers from the poems themselves, for which, we doubt not, they already feel anxious.

The first poems in this selection are by Derzhavin, who was born in 1763.

* Especially in his Priglasenie (or Traveller.)

After serving some time in the army, he was made successively a counsellor of state, ambassador of the senate, president of the college of commerce, public cashier, and, in 1809, minister of justice. He has since retired on his full allowance to pass the evening of his days in the enjoyment of the fruits of his long and active labours. The productions of this poet, 'the Parnassian Giant,' as a brother bard calls him, have been so justly characterised by the translator, in the introduction we have quoted, that we need do nothing more than refer to it. The poem on God, by this author, has been translated into Japanese, by order of the Emperor, and is hung up, embroidered with gold, in the Temple of Jeddó. A similar honour has been done to it at China. It has been translated into the Chinese and Tartar languages, written on a piece of rich silk, and suspended in the imperial palace at Pekin. When our readers have read this poem, which we insert entire, they will have no contemptible opinion of Russian poetry, nor of the good taste of the Japanese, Chinese, and Tartars:—

GOD.

'O thou eternal one! whose presence bright
All space doth occupy, all motion guide;
Unchanging through time's all-devastating flight;
Thou only God! There is no God beside!
Being above all beings! Mighty One!

Whom none can comprehend and none explore!

Who fill'st existence with Thyself alone!
Embracing all,—supporting,—ruling o'er,—
Being whom we call God—and know no more!

In its sublime research, philosophy
May measure out the ocean-deep—may count
The sands or the sun's rays—but, God! for thee

There is no weight nor measure—none can mount

Up to thy mysteries; reason's brightest spark
Though kindled by thy light, in vain would try

To trace thy counsels, infinite and dark:
And thought is lost ere thought can soar so high.

Even like past moments in eternity.

Thou from primeval nothingness didst call
First chaos, then existence—Lord, on thee
Eternity had its foundation—all

Sprung forth from thee:—of light, joy, harmony,
Sole origin—all life, all beauty thine.

Thy word created all, and doth create:
Thy splendour fills all space with rays divine.

Thou art, and wert, and shalt be, glorious:
great!

Light-giving, life-sustaining Potentate!
Thy chains the unmeasured universe surround:

Upheld by thee, by thee inspired with breath:
Thou the beginning with the end hast bound,

And beautifully mingled life and death!
As sparks mount upwards from the fiery blaze;

So suns are born, so worlds spring forth from thee;

And! as the spangles in the sunny rays
Shine round the silver snow, the pagentry Of heaven's brighter silver glitters in Thy praise*.

A million torches lighted by Thy hand
Wander unwearied through the blue abyss:
They own Thy power, accomplish Thy command,
All gay with life, all eloquent with bliss.
What shall we call them? Piles of crystal light—

A glorious company of golden streams—
Lamps of celestial ether, burning bright—
Suns lighting systems with their joyous beams?

But Thou to these art as the noon to night.

Yes! as a drop of water in the sea,
All this magnificence in Thee is lost;—
What are ten thousand worlds compared to Thee?

And what am I then? Heaven's unnumber'd host,

Though multiplied by myriads, and arrayed
In all the glory of sublimest thought,
Is but an atom in the balance weigh'd

Against Thy greatness, is a cypher brought Against infinity! What am I, then?—Nought!

Nought! But the effluence of Thy light divine,
Pervading worlds, hath reach'd my bosom too;
Yes! in my spirit doth Thy spirit shine,

As shines the sun-beam in a drop of dew.
Nought! but I live, and on hope's pinions fly
Eager towards Thy presence: for in Thee

I live, and breathe, and dwell; aspiring high,
Even to the throne of Thy divinity.

I am, O God! and surely Thou must be!

Thou art! directing, guiding all, Thou art!
Direct my understanding then to Thee;
Control my spirit, guide my wandering heart:

Though but an atom 'midst immensity,
Still I am something, fashioned by Thy hand!

I hold a middle rank 'twixt heaven and earth,
On the last verge of mortal being stand,
Close to the realms where angels have their birth,

Just on the boundaries of the spirit-land!

The chain of being is complete in me;
In me is matter's last gradation lost,
And the next step is spirit—Deity!

I can command the lightning, and am dust!
A mounch, and a slave; a worm, a God!

Whence came I here, and how? so marvellously

Constructed and conceiv'd? unknown! this clod
Lives surely through some higher energy;
For from itself alone it could not be!

Creator, yes! Thy wisdom and thy word
Created me! Thou source of life and good!

Thou spirit of my spirit, and my Lord!
Thy light, Thy love, in their bright plenitude
Filled me with an immortal soul, to spring
Over the abyss of death, and bade it wear

The garments of eternal day, and wing
Its heavenly flight beyond this little sphere,
Even to its source—to Thee—its Author there.

O thoughts ineffable! O visions blest!
Though worthless our conceptions all of Thee,

* The force of this simile can hardly be imagined by those who have never witnessed the sun shining with unclouded splendour, in a cold of twenty or thirty degrees of Reaumur.

A thousand and ten thousand sparkling stars
Of ice, brighter than the brightest diamonds, play on the surface of the frozen snow; and the slightest breeze sets myriads of icy atoms in motion, whose glancing light and beautiful rainbow-hues dazzle and weary the eye.

Yet shall Thy shadowed image fill our breast,
And waft its homage to Thy Deity.

God! thus alone my lowly thoughts can soar;
Thus seek Thy presence—Being wise and good!

'Midst Thy vast works, admire, obey, adore;
And when the tongue is eloquent no more,
The soul shall speak in tears of gratitude.'

There is much beauty and simplicity in the following song, with which we must conclude our extracts from the poems of Derzhavin:—

“SONG.

Golden bee! forever sighing,
Round and round my Delia flying,
Ever in attendance near her:
Dost thou really love her, fear her,
Dost thou love her,
Golden bee!

Bring insect! he supposes,
That her lips are morning roses;
Breathing sweets from Delia's tresses,
He would probe their fair recesses.

Purest sugar
Is her breast!

Golden bee! for ever sighing,
Ever round my Delia flying;
Is it thou so softly speaking?
Thine the gentle accents breaking, “Drink I dare not,
Lest I die!”

Batinshkov's address to his Penates, introduces, in a very agreeable manner, the most eminent of the Russian poets, and contains some allusion to Russian manners. Our limits will not, however, permit us more than the concluding passage:—

“Soon shall we end our pilgrimage;
And at the close of life's short stage
Sink smiling on our dusty bed!
The careless wind shall o'er us sweep;
Where sleep our sire, their sons shall sleep
With evening's darkness round our head.
There let no hired mourners weep;
No costly incense fan the sod;
No bell pretend to mourn; no hymn
Be heard 'midst midnight's shadows dim—
Can they delight a clay-cold clod?
No! if love's tribute ye will pay,
Assemble in the moonlight ray,
And throw fresh flow'ers o'er my clay:
Let my Penates sleep with me;
Here bring the cup I loved—the flute
I played—and twine its form, though mute,
With branches from the ivy tree!
No grave-stone need the wanderer tell,
That he who lived and loved so well,
Is sleeping in serenity.”

Lomonosov, ‘the father of Russian poetry,’ was the son of a sailor, and born in 1711. He studied Latin and Greek, rhetoric and poetry: his productions, which have been published in sixteen volumes, exhibit a rare diversity of subjects, including history, poetry, philosophy, philology, &c. &c. Only two of his poems are printed in the present volume. They both exhibit a strong religious feeling, which, indeed, pervades most of the effusions of the Russian bards. There are poems in this collection which we prefer, but it would be an ill compliment to the first Russian poet not to give one of them a place in our present notice; we, therefore, select the shortest:—

‘THE LORD AND THE JUDGE.

‘The God of gods stood up—stood up to try
The assembled gods of earth. “How long,”
he said,

“How long will ye protect impiety,
And let the vile one raise his daring head?”

Tis yours my laws to justify—redress
All wrong, however high the wronger be;
Nor leave the widow and the fatherless
To the cold world's uncertain sympathy.

Tis yours to guard the steps of innocence,
To shield the naked head of misery;
Be 'gainst the strong, the helpless one's defence,
And the poor prisoner from his chains to free.”

They hear not—see not—know not—for their eyes
Are covered with thick mists,—they will not see:

The sick earth groans with man's iniquities,
And heaven is tired with man's perversity.
Gods of the earth! ye kings: who answer not
To man for your misdeeds, and vainly think There's none to judge you!—know, like our's, your lot
Is pain and death:—ye stand on judgment's brink.

And ye, like fading autumn-leaves, will fall;
Your throne but dust—your empire but a grave—

Your martial pomp a black funeral pall—
Your palace trampled by your meanest slave.

God of the righteous! O our God! arise,
O hear the prayer thy lowly servants bring:
Judge, punish, scatter, Lord! thy enemies,
And be alone earth's universal king.”

From the poems of Karamsin, the historian of Russia, we select one beautiful specimen:—

‘LILEA.

‘What a lovely flower I see:
Bloom in snowy beauty there—
O how fragrant and how fair!
Can that lily bloom for me?
There to pluck, be mine the bliss,
Place upon my breast and kiss!
Why, then, is that bliss denied?
Why does heaven our fates divide?

Sorrow now my bosom fills;
Tears run down my cheeks like rills;

Far away that flower must bloom,
And in vain I sigh, “O come!”

Softly zephyr glides between,
Waving boughs of emerald green;

Purest flow'ers bend their head,
Shake their little cups of dew:—

Fate unpropitious and untrue,
Fate so desolate and dread,

Says, “She blossoms not for thee:—
In vain thou sheddest the bitterest tear,

Another hand shall gather her—
And thou—go mourn thy misery.”

O flower so lovely! Lilea fair!
With thee I fain my fate would share,
But heaven hath said, “It cannot be.”

As it is our intention to make our readers pretty well acquainted with Russian poetry, we shall extend our notice of this volume to another number.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Memoirs of the Rebellion in 1745 and 1746. By the Chevalier de Johnstone.

(Concluded from p. 87.)

At the battle of Culloden, the Chevalier de Johnstone charged on foot, leaving his horse in the care of a servant, and when the day was lost he could neither find horse nor man. He was so much fatigued that he was scarcely able to keep on his legs, when, fortunately, he got a horse, mounted it, and escaped. He wandered about some time in the disguise of a beggar, generally, eating very freely when victuals were set before him, and often without appetite, thinking that, though he was not hungry then, he would be so, and that perhaps when he had no means of satisfying it. In consequence of a dream, he determined, contrary to the advice of his friends, to go to Edinburgh. At Broughty, he was rowed over the Frith by two young girls, the daughters of the landlady of the ale-house there, when the boatmen had refused. When he reached St. Andrews, he called on a Mrs. Spence, who was too much suspected to afford him an asylum; and, therefore, she gave him a letter to her farmer to lend him a horse, but he refused. ‘Mrs. Spence,’ said he, ‘may take her farm from me and give it to whom she pleases; but she cannot make me profane the Lord's Day, by giving my horse to one who means to travel upon the sabbath.’ This refusal draws from our author a severe tirade against the Presbyterians, whom he designates as a ‘holy rabble.’ Near Wemyss, he was secreted in a cavern which, on account of the following circumstance, has been called the court cave:—

‘This cavern is one of the most remarkable of the antiquities of Scotland, and, according to tradition, was, in former times, a heathen temple. It is dug under a hill. Its entrance is about five feet high, and three wide; and the foot of the hill is about thirty paces from the seashore. It is very high and spacious within, and appears to be of an immense depth. An adventure, which happened in this cavern to King James the Fourth of Scotland, has given celebrity to it. The king, who used to amuse himself in wandering about the country, in different disguises, was overtaken by a violent storm, in a dark night, and obliged to take shelter in the cavern. Having advanced some way in it, he discovered a number of men and women ready to begin to roast a sheep, by way of supper. From their appearance he began to suspect that he had not fallen into the best company; but, as it was too late to retreat, he asked hospitality from them till the tempest was over. They granted it, and invited the king, whom they did not know, to sit down, and take part with them. They were a band of robbers and cut-throats. As soon as they had finished their supper, one of them presented a plate, upon which two daggers were laid in form of a St. Andrew's cross, telling the king, at the same time, that this was the dessert, which they always served to strangers; that he must choose one of the daggers, and fight him whom the company should appoint to attack him. The king did not lose his presence of mind, but instantly seized the two daggers, one in each hand, and plunged them into the hearts of the two robbers who were next him; and running full speed to the mouth of the cavern, he escaped from their pursuit through the obscurity of the night. The king ordered the whole of this band of cut-throats to be seized next morning, and they were all hanged.

On reaching Edinburgh, the Chevalier found an asylum in the house of Lady Jane Douglas, where he remained two months, and then travelled to London, on horseback, as a Scotch pedlar. Nothing of any interest occurred in the journey, or during his residence in town; this part of his narrative being nothing but a very silly account of his attachment to a young lady, his 'charming Peggy.' He afterwards embarked at Harwich with Lady Jane Douglas, as her servant, and reached Helvoetsluis in safety. He repaired to Paris, towards the end of the year 1746, where he received a pension of two thousand two hundred livres, out of the fund of forty thousand livres, ordered to be distributed, annually, among the Scots who had escaped to France. He afterwards received a commission as ensign, in the troops detached from the marine to the island of Cape Breton. He embarked at Rochelle in a vessel which was not seaworthy, and encountered more imminent dangers than he had done when a fugitive in Scotland. After remaining at Louisbourg until 1751, the Chevalier returned to France, but again went to Louisbourg, where he remained until it was captured by the English in 1758, when he escaped to Nova Scotia and thence to Canada; until the subjection of these provinces again obliged him to return to France.

These memoirs, it will be seen, differ very much from the accounts that hitherto have been published of the Rebellion, particularly from the history of Home.* If Home was led to exte-

rected, the Chevalier has set down much in malice; and his account of the rencontres between the English and the Highlanders are often most preposterous and extravagant. Be this as it may, we suspect the Highlanders owed little to the personal courage or exertions of the Chevalier, who seems to have had an instinctive horror of wanting a dinner, or of making his final exit from this life by the assistance of the hangman. In one place, he says,—

'I bitterly regretted that I did not meet my fate in the battle of Culloden, where I escaped so narrowly; and envied the fate of my comrades who remained dead on the field of battle. The horrible idea of the hangman, with a knife in his hand, ready to open my body whilst yet alive; to tear out my heart and throw it into the fire, still palpitating,—the punishment inflicted on all those who had the misfortune to be taken and condemned,—always haunted my imagination. I could not get rid of the impression that I should also be taken; and the prospect of perishing in this manner, on a scaffold, in presence of a cruel and brutal populace, almost tempted me to abridge my days upon the banks of the stream.'

We have nothing further to add respecting this work, than that it contains many curious and interesting details, which, although they must be received with due caution, form an important addition to the history of a very extraordinary enterprise.

REVIEW EXTRAORDINARY.

The Rev. T. Smith and his Book.

We learn that the Rev. T. Smith has called at our office and threatened our publisher with a prosecution for the notice of his work contained in the Literary Chronicle of the 3d inst. We understand that the Reverend gentleman was in a violent passion, which is certainly not a Christian virtue,—tu te faches Jupin, tu as donc tort; this we should have noticed, but that he has since sent his son or agent on a similar errand. We do not know whether Messrs. Williams, Hilliard, rected by a member of the royal family. We have reason to believe it was the case; and in a conversation with that amiable and elegant writer, the late Theophilus Swift, Esq. on this subject, he related the following anecdote:—

When Mr. Home was writing his history, Dr. White presented him with several MSS. respecting the family of the Stuarts; which, after some little hesitation, Mr. H. promised to make use of; but, on the publication of the work, Dr. White finding that they were wholly omitted, called on Mr. H. to know the reason; and was answered, that it was at his Majesty's request.—REV.

and Hastings, Mr. Smith's solicitors, view the case as he does, but, to justify ourselves in the eyes of the public, our best patrons, we print the review sent to us with the book, and the letter of our cotemporary accompanying them; it will then be seen whether we had not some reason for saying what we have done in trying to put down direct personal puffing in a vain man; and sure we are that the Rev. T. Smith would applaud our conduct, did the case relate to any other person than himself.

'Lit. Gazette Office, 29th Jan.

'The envelope of the accompanying book was addressed to the Literary Gazette; as it seems likely, however, from the title to the MS. that it was meant for the Literary Chronicle, the Editor loses no time in transmitting it, with his compliments.

REVIEW. FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.

'A New and Improved Edition of Walkington's Tutor's Assistant: with considerable Additions, and an Appendix on Circulating Decimals.

By the Rev. T. Smith, of St. John's College, Cambridge. pp. 208, 12mo.

'Among the various treatises of arithmetic that have been published within the last hundred years, some of them by men of the first eminence, none has met with a more favourable reception than Walkington's Compendium. As a proof of the general estimation in which it is held, it is in the hands of almost every arithmetician, young and old, having passed through numerous impressions edited by different persons highly skilled in the science of numbers. Mr. Smith, the master of a large and respectable boarding school in the vicinity of London, has just favoured the public with a new stereotype edition of this author, but containing, together with Walkington's text, a vast quantity of new matter, consisting of valuable observations, tables, and notes by the EDITOR, and an excellent collection of upwards of 1000 very ingenious questions not to be found in any other work. Some of the questions require a thorough knowledge of fractions, and an acquaintance with the higher rules of arithmetic for their solution; and cannot fail of proving extremely serviceable, as they must impart to students not studying the mathematics, a portion of the spirit of that recondite branch of analysis. Our limits will not allow us to enter into all the merits of Smith's edition of Walkingame, and we shall, therefore, conclude this article, with two of the new questions as a specimen:—

“Water runs into a cistern by three different pipes, and is drawn out again by two pumps. By the first pipe the cistern is filled in eight hours; by the first and second pipes together, in five hours; and when all the pipes are open it is filled in three hours. Now the first pump empties the cistern in an hour, and the second in seventy-three minutes. The question is, if both pumps begin to work when the cistern is full, in what time will they empty it, providing the second and third pipes keep running?”

“There are two meadows of equal extent, the one in the form of a square 1390 links of Gunter's chain on a side, and the other in the form of a parallelogram 800 links in breadth. Required, the length of the parallelogram, and the aggregate content of both meadows in acres and roods?”

Let Mr. Smith now state, and our columns are open to him, what we were authorised to conclude under such circumstances.—Ed.

Account of the Voyage of Discovery and Circumnavigation performed in 1818, 1819, and 1820.

(Concluded from p. 60.)

Having sailed from Rakaw on the 5th of January, 1819, the Urania stretched towards the Ayon isles, which they saw on the 6th and 8th of the same month.

The dysentery continued still to torment the crew; it was not long before it was joined to fevers; one of the first victims of which was M. Labiche, the second lieutenant, an officer full of merit, and of the most amiable character. This was the second loss of the kind during the voyage, and it was keenly felt.

After having visited several of the Caroline isles, which are not pointed out on the maps, and having received throughout the most flattering reception from the islanders, M. de Freycinet arrived, on the 17th of May, in sight of the Isle of Guam, and cast anchor on the night of the same day in the roadstead of Humata. This delay, and that which the corvette made at Port San Louis in the same island, restored health to the crew; thanks to the generous eagerness with which the governor, Don Jose de Medinilla y Pineda, anticipated all the wants of the expedition, by procuring them refreshments and comforts of all kinds.

M. de Freycinet appears to have collected, respecting the people of the Marianne Islands, information more extensive than that with which preceding voyagers have enriched their accounts. He gives various details respecting their manners, language, and laws, as well as that singular government of which much has been said, and in which the women act an important part. He communicates to us interesting notions respecting the arts which they practise, respecting their money, which is established on principles absolutely different from ours, and respecting their architecture, of which he still saw numerous ruins at Tinian.

Two months were employed in making these researches; and at the same time they were occupied with those observations and experiments which formed the principal object of the expedition. M. de Medinilla had, during all this time, the kindness to provide the corvette abundantly with fresh provisions, to which he added provisions for the voyage, and for which he afterwards refused to accept any reimbursement.

The course of the Urania, from Guam to the Sandwich Islands, presents nothing remarkable. On the 5th of August, 1819, she made the island of Owhyhee, and anchored in the bay of Harahona in three days after.

Tamabaha, king of the Sandwich Isles, was dead; his palace had been reduced to ashes, and almost all the hogs on the island had been slaughtered on account of his obsequies, according to the custom of the country; which was a real disappointment in the re-victualling of the corvette.

Uno Rio, the eldest son and successor of Tamabaha, enjoyed at that time but a badly-established authority. The chiefs compelled to submit to the arras of his father, raising extraordinary pretensions, caused him to dread an approaching war. He came with his wives and a numerous suite on board the Urania, on the occasion of the baptism of one of the principal chiefs of the island. That ceremony was performed with much pomp by the Abbé Quelin, chaplain of the vessel.

The Sandwich Islands were, like the Marianne, the object of the assiduous researches of M. de Freycinet and of the officers under his command. Numerous observations were made in search of the magnetic equator, and its inflexions, in the Great Ocean.

On the 30th of August the Urania sailed for Port Jackson, passing through the islands of the Austral Polynesia.

By taking this track, the position of the dangerous isles of Byron was rectified, as well as that of the island of Pyletant, the most southerly of the Friendly Islands; and also that of Howe Island.

A new island, surrounded by dangerous reefs, was discovered to the east of Tonga, which M. de Freycinet named Rose Island.

The Urania anchored in Port Jackson on the 18th of November, 1819; she remained there till the 25th of December, and this interval was employed, as at all the preceding stoppages, in scientific inquiries. M. de Freycinet speaks, in this respect, with gratitude for the assistance afforded to him by Mr. Macquarie, the governor of the colony.

On quitting Port Jackson, the course of the corvette was shaped to pass between Van Diemen's Land and New Zealand. On the 7th of January, 1820, the southern extremity of the latter island was doubled in sight of Campbell's Island.

From that moment until nearing the coast of Terra del Fuego, the winds were constantly favourable. The Urania reached 59 degrees of south latitude; and she found floating ice in the 54th degree.

On the 5th of February the coast of Terra del Fuego was seen in the neighbourhood of Cape Desolation; the season was as frightful as the adjoining shores. In the impossibility of reaching Christmas Harbour, it became necessary to make for the Bay of Good Success, in the Straits of Lemaire; but hardly had the anchor dropped, when a furious storm began to cause the corvette to drive: there was not a moment to be lost in cutting the cable, and setting sail with all speed, in order to get out of the Bay, by skirting at a very short distance the rocks and breakers which lie upon its north point.

This dreadful tempest lasted for two days, and made the corvette drift considerably to the northward; which determined M. de Freycinet to bear up for the Falkland Islands, in sight of which they arrived on the 14th of February, according to their reckoning, but the 13th according to European time, they having gained a day in circumnavigating the globe.*

* Our readers are already acquainted with the loss of the Urania, in consequence of striking on a sunken rock, at the entrance of French Bay, in the Falkland Islands, and of their being taken off by an American whaler, and brought first to Rio Janeiro, and afterwards to Harve de Grace, where they arrived in safety.

In expectation that more detailed accounts (proceeds the narrative) will make known all the importance of their labours, it will suffice to give a rapid glance at them.

1st. The observations on the pendulum, which formed one of the principal objects of the voyage, have been made with the greatest care at every place where they stopped, and in every situation throughout the voyage which would permit. The stations where these experiments were made are nine in number, viz. Rio Janeiro (first stay); the Cape of Good Hope; Port Louis, in the Isle of France; the Island of Rawak; the Island Guam; the Island of Mowia, in the Sandwich Isles; Port Jackson; the Falkland Islands; and at Rio Janeiro (second stay).

2d. Each day during the voyage, two officers, at least, took by rotation the necessary astronomical observations to ascertain the situation of the vessel at sea, and, on shore, the positions of the different observatories; to regulate the chronometers, &c. All these observations have been transcribed into journals destined for that purpose.

3d. The magnetic phenomena were at the same time the object of constant and multiplied studies, as well at sea as in all the places which they touched at. They comprise observations on the magnetic declination and inclination; on the intensity of both when tried by the horizontal needle, or the needle of inclination; and also on the hourly and periodical variations in the declination.

4th. Comparative observations on the temperature of the air, with that of the sea at its surface, were made every two hours during the whole course of the voyage. This considerable mass of results may be useful to determine the isothermic lines on the terrestrial globe.

5th. More than sixty specimens of sea-water, taken in the seas which they traversed, were put into as many flasks, perfectly sealed up, in order to be analysed on their return. Each flask was labelled with the latitude and longitude of the spot where the water was drawn.

6th. A meteorological journal kept every hour during the whole voyage, will show in methodical order all the observations on the thermometer, the barometer, and the hydrometer, which they made both by sea and land. They will also show the indications of the prevailing winds, and their degrees of force, the electrical and aërial phenomena, &c.

with most of the collections made during the voyage.—See Literary Chronicle, No. 64.

7th. The barometrical variations could not be observed with precision, except in the places which they touched at. The results of them have been consigned to a particular register.

8th. It was not possible to observe the tides and currents, except at a small number of points; but the data acquired at Rio Janeiro, at the Isle of France, at Rawak, and at Guam, are not without interest.

9th. The number of charts formed during the voyage is about thirty. A part of them have already been completed; but the whole of the materials collected on this subject, and classed with great care, will give every facility desirable for carrying on this work.

10th. Notwithstanding the shipwreck at the Malouin or Falkland Islands, which caused the loss of eighteen cases of specimens of natural history, there remain still about forty. These contain a great number of specimens out of the three kingdoms of nature; and especially almost the whole of those which were collected at the Marianne Islands, yet little known in that respect to naturalists.

11th. The number of drawings made during the voyage amounts to several hundreds; the greater part admirable for the beauty of the situations which they represent, or for the correctness of the portraits, and the graces of their composition.

12th. In short, the observations on the manners and customs of the people whom they visited, have been collected in very great number by all the officers employed in the expedition. All of them have been drawn up in the same spirit, and after the same plan, in order that they may connect themselves easily with the general account of the voyage.

It is above all to be remarked, that this is the first expedition of the kind, in which all the scientific operations have been performed entirely by officers attached to the service of the Royal Marine of France.—Phil. Mag.

ON PAINTINGS IN CHURCHES.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Sorry am I to enter my protest against the sentiments of a person of so great and noble mental endowments as your able and elegant essayist, W. H. Parry, when I find him deploring the banishment of the ornaments of painting from our places of public worship, in his second essay on the Fine Arts.

You may be assured, Mr. Editor, that Tyro as I am, I have not the arrogance to advance my opinions as perfectly just; but am induced rather to state my sentiments, to the end of having my scruples removed, together with the clouds of ignorance and prejudice that may overshadow my intellectual faculties.

Now, I confess I am not only an admirer of the Fine Arts, but would consider it an honour to be in any way instrumental in supporting and encouraging them. However, I deem it a mystery how painting could ever afford support to piety or devotion, and I much doubt if the sensations or sentiments produced from contemplating the best executed or happiest conceived painting, are either those of piety or devotion, such as are inculcated in the holy Scriptures.

Long may the arts flourish, and long may painting be our national boast,—numerous may the shrines be that are devoted to it, and numerous its devotees; but may the pure spirit of devotion and piety be ever instilled and firmly fixed in the heart of every Briton, from the contemplation of the inspired word of God, and the boundless productions of nature; and may music ever lend her aid to raise the soul in ecstasy to anticipate the joys of heaven!

It is much to be feared, that having in our view objects so capable of arresting our attention and exciting our admiration as the finely executed paintings of our great professors, would rather interfere with the proper discharge of our devotional duties, if not greatly endanger us, by inducing us imperceptibly to pay greater adoration to the works of the creature, than worshipping the creator.

'Principius obsta' is a motto we should do well to bear in mind at all times. Who knows but that, at last, the mists of our natural prejudices may be so far cleared away, and we become so refined in our sentiments of devotion, that Mr. W. H. Parry may deem it expedient to suggest the propriety of introducing scenic apostolic representations, and scriptural enactments, at the shrine and altar of our temples, by some of the theatrical characters, whom he has criticised with such keen discrimination, as most congenial with the taste of refined religion; while our priesthood shall fly excommunicated from the desk and the pulpit.

It would afford me great satisfaction to see the subject discussed and elucidated by some of your enlightened readers, who may be more competent than,

Sir,

Your constant reader

HAPPINESS DEPENDENT ON OURSELVES.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR.—The writer who desires to be popular will avoid touching upon any subject which 'the many' seldom take into consideration, but he who writes from principle will find pleasure in obtaining the attention of an intelligent circle, whether they approve or condemn his theory. The admirable spirit in which your paper is conducted, induces me to offer my humble assistance to diversify its columns, and, believe me, should this effort prove worthy of acceptance, I shall feel peculiar pleasure in its being placed on record in the Literary Chronicle.

A theologian of some celebrity† describes man to be made up of three essences: the substantial or physical; the internal, or moral or metaphysical; and the immortal; and adds, in illustration, that you may destroy the body in lingering tortures, yet, while life remains, the moral or internal man may continue not only uninjured but rise to its highest point of excellence; and that, although the internal properties naturally die with the body which they have directed, the immortal spirit remains, and will for ever remain, indestructible. These outlines I consider sufficiently clear to be generally admitted, but to the inquiring mind not sufficiently minute; they give no idea of man's means of action, they develop none of the causes which prompt him to pursue a particular course, nor do they define any thing but that which the practice and habits of mankind seem to admit. In attempting to go farther, I am not without hope that the subject may excite more able pens to lay open the construction of the human frame, so that man may at length know himself. Our wonderful construction must strike every one capable of reflection with admiration, but to the philanthropist or to the intelligent and benevolent practical anatomist, I leave it to be deservedly eulogized, and pass to the position,—that with the general use and physical properties of the body all are sufficiently acquainted to acknowledge, that it is capable of a state of composure, happiness, sorrow, and wretchedness. My opinion being that these sensations, though resulting from the mind, a metaphysical essence, are still generally subject to our own control, and I shall attempt to show that the assumption is not totally without foundation.

* We confess that we differ much in opinion from our respected correspondent; and have always regretted that the plan suggested by Sir Joshua Reynolds and Mr. West, for adorning the interior of our temples with appropriate pictures, was not carried into effect.—Ed.

† I avoid giving his name—in all argumentative pieces, argument should have weight, not name.

Sensation is the proof of existence, and the complicated phenomena of sensation, or feeling, I have never seen familiarly or sufficiently explained. Of the external senses, we are told, there are five; their existence is admitted, and little more, in general, is thought upon the subject. Are not these senses the immediate effect of our state of existence? Some possess them all in a very acute degree: see better, hear quicker, feel sooner, taste more exquisitely, and scent more immediately than persons in general; and, that these are all, more or less, under the control of the judgment, must be allowed, though still subject to the general laws of nature. The senses thus spoken of are admitted to be the outward senses, but still they form only one branch of sensation. By the light of the mind, which is the essence of life, and the cause of which life is not to be understood by the light which is obtained from it, the internal senses may be discovered: a sense of feeling, a will, memory, imagination, and judgment.

When man is perfect in his kind, he has all these inward and outward senses in perfection—a circumstance of rare occurrence. This being the constitution of man, every event may be referred to these qualities. By means of the judgment, aided by the experience of memory, a man has reason; by the exercise of this reason, he discovers his own worth or worthlessness, his consistency or inconsistency; and this forms conscience; and the light of the mind being ever operative when the body is awake, man is of necessity compelled to see his own actions. The imagination or inventive quality may be considered as the cause of his happiness or misery, for if it prompt his will to decree in opposition to his memory and judgment, i. e. his reason, to which he is often induced by external sensation, upon reflection he will condemn himself, and his suffering will be in proportion to his internal sensibility.

That the laws of nature compel a man to action cannot be denied, and so far as he is compelled, he cannot severely condemn himself; but the principal actions of life, which result from the imagination, are not acts of necessity, consequently matters of choice, and these chiefly affect his state of being whether comfortable or otherwise; hence I conclude that a man's happiness or misery depends principally upon himself. I am, &c.

Original Criticisms

ON

The Principal Performers of the Theatres
Royal Drury Lane & Covent Garden.

No. XI.—MRS. EGERTON.

'Fix'd in one frame of features, glare of eye,
Passions like chaos in confusion lie;
Her voice no touch of harmony admits,
Irregularly deep, and shrill by fits.'

CHURCHILL.

AMONG the many various changes which are constantly taking place in our great city, those in theatrical life are not the least wonderful. For instance, who would imagine that Mrs. Egerton, the inimitable representative of Meg Merrilies, &c. was in the habit of enacting, eight or ten years since, the tender love-sick Juliet, and other characters of a similar nature. This lady particularly excels in depicting the fierce, the majestic, and the malignant. Her voice, which was once soft and melodious, has now acquired considerable force and power; indeed, her whole appearance is well adapted for those vigorous and commanding characters which she has of late years assumed. Her Helen Magregor, calling forth almost masculine powers, and affording so much scope for the contemptuous disdain of a haughty spirit, is an admirable performance, though, we think, she finds a powerful rival in Mrs. Faucit, whose representation is entitled to the warmest possible eulogy.—Her Madge Wildfire possesses considerable merits; her dying scene is particularly excellent, but in this character she is certainly far surpassed by Miss Copeland. Mrs. Egerton is much too old, nor does her voice possess that sweetness which the wild yet plaintive airs of the heart-broken Madge require. But whatever admiration her performance of these characters may elicit, she certainly far surpasses those exertions in her exquisite delineation of Meg Merrilies. Here she possesses no equal; indeed, her judicious action, her commanding figure and powerful voice, place her far above all her competitors.

We can conceive nothing of its kind finer than her attitude, when, standing on an eminence, she beholds Hatteraick and his party about to attack Henry Bertram; when she waves her hand to the gipsies, they really appear to shrink from her as something super-human;
her sudden exclamation,—‘and what d’ye fear from her,’ on finding Glossin and Hatteraick conversing about her, has its due effect; but her masterpiece is the mingled look of rage, exultation, and convulsive agony, which she casts on the smuggler in her dying moments;
it is indeed the acmé of melodramatic perfection. But if Mrs. Egerton is once put out of this peculiar line, like some other of our principal performers, her conception has no boldness of fancy, no prominence, no variety; she cannot express more than simple passions; her grief is a monotonous incessant whine, and her dignity is comprised in a lofty toss of the head, and a sudden elevation of the voice. We know but of one character in tragedy which she plays finely; we allude to Elvira; she portrays this part in all the fierce caricature of the original. Regan is a character which can never be rendered effective on the stage, but through the excellence of its representative; Mrs.
Egerton, however, contrives to look, dress, and act the character more like a waiting woman, than the proud, vindictive, unnatural daughter of old Lear.
Her performance of Laura, in the tragedy of Montalto, did not please us;
there was much scope for good acting,
particularly in the concluding scenes;
her despair, on finding her ambitious designs blighted, as well as her subsequent remorse, might have afforded an ample field for a display of genius, but Mrs. Egerton was seized with a fit of indolent languor, and gave us nothing but a caricature of Meg Merri-lies in its worst form. In the Comtess de Morville, in the new melodrame of ‘Thérèse,’ she has a trifling character, and plays it as badly as possible.
This lady is certainly a very limited actress; in comedy she completely fails:
indeed, we are astonished why she so often appears before us in such parts as Miss Vortex, Mrs. Changeable, Clarinda, &c. We delight to see her in her wild and fanciful characters, but as these performances can necessarily occur but seldom, we have too frequently the pain of witnessing representations which neither reflect credit on herself or the theatre.

NO. XII.—MRS. GLOVER.

‘Her faults in her seem what she cannot change,
Than what she chooses.’—SHAKESPEARE.

Malgré her unyielding person, we confess we cannot but experience a great degree of pleasure in witnessing Mrs.
Glover’s performances. In exhibiting cool contemptuous defiance, as in Es-tinfia, for instance, or downright violence or anger, affecting coolness, as in Mrs. Oakley, her features can assume a vixen-like expression that accords admirably with the character she is representing. Indeed, we have no actress any way equal to her in either of these parts. We think her Estinfia will never be surpassed; her easy and unrivalled assurance chills even the impudence of the Copper Captain.—
She makes the character the most amusing Jezebel that ever trod the stage; she positively leads her husband up and down by the nose, cheats, and fairly laughs at him to his face, and actually convinces him that he has been fooled for his own good. Were Cooke himself to rise from the grave, he could not abuse his enemy with more bitter contemptuous sarcasm, than Mrs. Glover rails at my ‘Mahound cousin.’— Never were the advantages of impudence so happily portrayed. Second only to her excellence in this character, is her inimitable representation of the jealousy and hysteric violence of Mrs.
Oakley; our attention is kept intensely alive by the airs she gives herself, and her fantastic behaviour in the situations in which she is placed. She makes an admirable Mrs. Candour; so excellently does she manage her voice and countenance, that her scandal carries complete conviction to all around her.
Her humour is admirably adapted for this affectation of truth, and is of that dry nature, which a casual observer would naturally mistake for seriousness.
Although she is rather too embonpoint,
she contrives to give every fascination and blandishment to the execrable Millwood; perhaps its only fault is a too strict resemblance to nature. We have, in a former number, observed, that all our actresses completely fail in Lady Macbeth; we shall, therefore, without expatiating more fully on Mrs.
Glover’s performance of the character, content ourselves with observing, that,
however short she may fall of Siddonia excellence or grandeur, she is decidedly the best representative of the day. She imparts wonderful effect to the few passages of Emelia, nor will we forget the force she gives to the repulsive disgusting character of Goneril, or her excellence in the haughty Tullia. On her performance of Queen Margaret, in Richard III. we can bestow almost unqualified praises. There are, perhaps, few things finer or more affecting than the scene in which she takes leave of her children, when they are torn from her by the mandate of the tyrant;

it is only to be excelled by her lamentation after their murder, or the keen and cutting irony with which she answers Glover’s interrogatories. Mrs.
Glover’s figure is now much too large and matronly to represent youthful characters or passions. We trust that, for the future, she will relinquish such characters, as Donna Violante, Flora, in the ‘Midnight Hour,’ Mrs. Racket, &c. &c. which are neither suited to her age or abilities. W. H. PARRY.

EPICRAM

On hearing that Miss Dance is expected to appear in Tragedy at Covent Garden.

THERE’S nothing novel in this age

To see a dance upon the stage;

But ‘twill, indeed, be novelly

To see a Dance in tragedy! TONT.

THE FASHIONABLE MISSES.

‘I make the cap but not the head to wear it!’
Q. IN THE CORNER.

AN EPISTLE TO —.

You say I’ve not written—you know not how long—

Thou’st once was so partial to proing;

Either sonnet, epistle, or little love song—

That my muse and myself have been doing.

But were I to tell you what aights I have seen,

How much in gay circles I lately have been—

Among charming ladies, who deem themselves

If the world can but see them fantastic!—dret!

In feathers and furbelows, bouques and lace—

Neglecting the mind to embellish the face—

You’d forgive me, and say, that I’d plenty to do,

And excuse me for not having written to you.

You know Mr. G——? he’s as honest a man

As e’er got a fortune by prosperous trade—

Well, his daughters—sweet creatures!—would die if a man

(Unless in fine clothes he an overture made.)

Were to give them a glance,—and a kiss—lack shy me!

(From a tradesman’s eternal perdition would be!

Miss Susan is tall, and considered genteel

By those who have not in her company been;

And some say her sister has got the best head—

(Of her foot they say nothing)—that over was seen!

Thus pair’d, they together with staidness

walk—

With—yes, mum,—and—‘he, he,’—the chief of their talk,

If they meet with a neighbour that's willing to chat—
As they glance first on this side and then upon that;
But if—as they once were—the person they meet,
Who hails them with—'how-d'-ye-do'—in the street—
Be bumble in life—what a stigma 't would be,
To be seen by the world in such low company.
When a party they give, not a tradesman is there—
No whisper of sugar—no dresser of hair—
No ladies who throw the steel bar to and fro—
No gentlemen married—for full well you know
That both these sweet misses are dying to wed,
Asid care not how soon they by Hymen are led.
If vulgar mechanics were ever allow'd
To mingle with fashion's immaculate crowd,
And they were, by chance, their professions to name—
Oh! how would some people recover their shame?
Dear creatures—to fancy esteem can be caught,
Like light on a mirror, by beauty alone;
That blaze of attraction, where delicate thought
On a brow of divinity raises her throne!
The world might a lesson these pretty ones' teach—
(And acquirements are surely not out of their reach.)
That the mind should be staped to perfection before,
The mask of a moment they're bade to adore!
A butterfly's wing in its gay colours drest,
How beautiful, ere by the finger 'tis prest—
But strip of its fine painted feathers—how few
Would admire the gay thing as in sunshine it flew!
And she, who imagines that beauty—frail thing—
Will always attract, and never take wing—
That exquisite features affection will bind
Without the sweet charm of a well tutor'd mind,
Will find, at the last, to her sorrow, that she,
Like the butterfly's wing, disregarded will be!
You need not a lesson, dear girl of my heart,
To teach thee to play a divinity's part.
To charm and be loved thou wert given to me—
For knowledge are blended in these!

WILFORD.

The Drama.

SURREY THEATRE.—The popularity of the novels attributed to Sir Walter Scott, and the success of Mr. Dibdin in adapting them to the stage, attracted a very crowded and elegant audience to this theatre on Wednesday night, to witness the first representation of a new grand melodramatic historical romance, under the title of 'Kenilworth, or the Countess of Leicester,' founded on the so recently published romance of that name. When Mr. Dibdin produced his 'Heart of Mid Lothian,' he modestly disclaimed every other merit save that of an amanuensis; but we think that a faithful condensation of the story of the incidents of three volumes into an acting drama of three hours, is entitled to a much higher praise, and exhibits great skill and judgment. This is the case with Kenilworth, and as the story must be well known to all our readers, we shall not detail it. We need only observe that the tale is closely followed during the whole drama up to the catastrophe, in which Mr. Dibdin has ventured an alteration, which is certainly an improvement. The piece opens with a scene at the Black Bear Inn, is thence transferred to Tony Foster's house, and the whole of the interesting incidents relating to the Countess of Leicester,—her interviews with her lord, with his follower Varney, and Tressilian,—her escape from Cumnor, and her meeting with the Queen in the gardens of Kenilworth, are given in the very language of the romance. The adventures of Tressilian at the inn—with Wayland Smith at Cumnor—at court, and at Kenilworth, are introduced with the same fidelity. The reconciliation of Leicester and Sussex, by the Queen,—her visit to Kenilworth, and her protection of the unfortunate Amy, are all retained in the drama. We now come to the last scene, in which our readers will recollect, that the countess is, by the novelist, made to fall down a trap-door designedly left open from her apartment, into a dreadful abyss below. This scene in the drama is managed with great skill; there is a curiously constructed mechanical staircase, which ascends to the apartments of the countess; Varney, before he lowers the trap-door, goes up to see if the countess is in her room. In the mean time, Janet Foster gets the key, and winds down the trap-door, in order to aid the countess in her escape. Varney, unconscious of it, falls into the spare he had prepared for the countess, and the Earl of Leicester, arriving at the moment, rescues his wife.

The piece, which is got up with great splendour, combines the whole strength of the Surrey company, and is extremely well acted. England's 'Maiden Queen' was admirably personified by Mrs. Dibdin, who looked and acted the character to the life. In her rebukes of the haughty Leicester, her jealousy, and the assertion of her power as Queen of England, she gave great effect. The villain Varney afforded Huntley an excellent opportunity of displaying his talents and judgment. Miss Taylor appeared to much advantage in the Countess of Leicester; the struggle between her affection for her husband and her duty to her father, displayed all that tenderness and sincerity of heart which she can so well express: her treatment of the miscreant Varney was very spirited, and her interview with the Queen in the garden at Kenilworth, in which the dread of exposing her husband so chastened her indignation at Varney, was admirably performed. Bengough supported the dignity of 'England's proudest earl;' and Fitzwilliam was quite at home in the double character of Lawrence Goldthred, 'the cutting mercer of Abingdon,' and the coxcomb, Nicholas Blount. Wyatt elicited much applause in the braggadocio, Michael Lambourne; and Miss Copeland played Janet Foster very prettily. The other characters were well sustained. The dresses are quite appropriate, and carry us back at once to the 'glorious days of good Queen Bess;' and the scenery is very excellent. The piece was received with immense applause, and will, no doubt, long continue a favourite.

ADELPHI THEATRE.—This house has also produced its Kenilworth, which is well got up and well played; and, what to the proprietors is of still more importance—is well attended every night.

EAST LONDON THEATRE.—The company of this house has lately received a great acquisition in the person of a Mr. Serle, who is acting the prominent characters in the most popular of our standard tragedies. We saw him on Monday evening in the character of Romeo, and were really very much pleased with him. His performance of the character was respectable throughout, and, in some scenes, highly effective. Mrs. Payne's Juliet, also, deserves a very favourable notice; in the last scene, where she recovers from her sleep, she surpassed any thing we could expect to witness in a minor theatre.

Literature and Science.

Deafness cured.—The Narrateur de la Meuse states that M. Delun, a doctor of medicine, established at Mibiell, perforated with dexterity and success the meatus auditorius on Mademoiselle Bivier, aged sixteen, and the Sieur Toussaint, aged twenty-eight, both till then deaf and dumb. The girl takes notice of the least sounds, and begins to articulate words. She incessantly humming various airs. The young man hears as well as his comrades, and makes constant efforts to pronounce all sorts of words. M. Delau is constructing an instrument, which will afford the facility of finishing the operation in three minutes, by which its success will be rendered more certain. By means of this instrument, he will raise on the tympanic membrane substance, enough to prevent the necessity of introducing probes into the perforation during from thirty to forty days. He is of opinion that he can restore the hearing of all those who have been deprived of it by the obstruction of the Eustachian organ, and by the obesity of the membrane of the tympanum.

The editor of the Monthly Magazine, who has just completed the fiftieth volume of that excellent periodical, announces a general index to the whole, and a selection of the curious, valuable, and original papers, in five volumes. The index and selections will be published separately.

Pompeii.—In prosecuting the excavations of Pompeii, a late traveller, Mr. Williams, informs us, that the streets of the city are getting daily disencumbered. He entered by the Appian Way through a narrow street of small tombs beautifully executed, with the names of the deceased plain and legible. At the gate was a centry-box, in which the skeleton of a soldier was found with a lamp in his hand; after passing into several streets he entered a coffee-house, marks of the cups being visible on the stone. The streets are lined with public buildings and private houses, most of which have their original painted decorations fresh and entire. The pavement of the streets is much worn by carriage wheels. A surgeon's house, with surgical instruments; an ironmonger's shop, where was an anvil and hammer; a sculptor's, and a baker's shop; an oilman's; a wine shop, with money in the till; a school, with a pulpit with steps up to it, in the middle of the apartment; a great theatre, a temple of justice, an amphitheatre, two hundred and twenty feet long; various temples; a barrack for soldiers, the columns of which are scribbled with their names and jests; wells, cisterns, seats, trigluniums, beautiful mosaic altars, inscriptions, and fragments of statues; pipes of terra cotta, to convey the water to the different streets, and stocks for prisoners, in one of which a skeleton was found; are among the many striking vestiges of the arts of ancient Italy. The houses are in general low, not more than ten feet high. The principal streets are about sixteen feet in width, with side pavements of about three feet; some of the subordinate streets are from six to ten feet wide, with side pavements in proportion; these are occasionally high, and are reached by steps.

We see a new edition of the Rejected Addresses is announced. This is one of the most popular works that has been published for many years, more than twenty thousand copies having been sold.

LOCUSTRUS.

The Oak.—The use of the oak has been lately revived for the purpose of furniture; and among the fashionable and expensive luxuries of the present day, has become not only the rival of some of the beautiful woods of distant countries, but, in point of expense at least, has acquired a high character. To establish this fact, it is only necessary to mention, that a set of dining-tables, made of English oak, by a London cabinet-maker, brought the enormous sum of 600*l.* sterling.

One of the Corent Garden actors, who has lately been on a strolling expedition in the country, cautioned the ladies, in one of his bills, not to fall in love with him, as it always hurt his benefit, by making the gentlemen jealous of him.

Episcopal Benevolence.—Richard de Berry, Bishop of Durham, in the reign of Edward III., had every week eight quarters of wheat made into bread for the poor, besides his alms-dishes, fragments of his house, and large sums of money which he bestowed in his journeys.

West, Bishop of Ely, in 1532, set two hundred poor people daily at his gates: and the Lord Cromwell usually the same number.

Robert of Winchelsea gave, every Friday and Saturday, a loaf of bread of a farthing price to every beggar that came to his door. Stowe says the loaf was sufficient for the day. In time of dearth, there were usually five thousand applicants, and in a plentiful time not less than four thousand loaves were distributed on a day.

SUCH IS THE WORLD. A Novel, in Three Vols. 12mo.

'I hold the world but as the world, Gratiano,
A stage where every man must play his part.'

Merchant of Venice.

The characters in this novel, which embrace "all ranks and degrees of men," from a duke down to the hostler of an inn, are drawn with a fidelity and correctness, which none but a person who has mixed much in the world could have sketched. Another merit this novel possesses, in which we should be happy to see every work of the kind resemble it; we mean, that of having a good moral tendency. There are no coarse ribaldries—no indecent allusions—no double entendres, to raise a blush on the cheek of youthful innocence. Virtue and vice are so faithfully portrayed, that we do not fear our juvenile friends, adopting the forms in the model of their future conduct in life—Literary Chronicle, Jan. 27.

Review of New Books.

Journal of an Officer in the Commissariat Department of the Army: comprising a Narrative of the Campaigns under his Grace the Duke of Wellington, in Portugal, Spain, France, and the Netherlands, in the Years 1811-15; and a short Account of the Army of Occupation in France, during the Years 1816, 1817, and 1818. 8vo. pp. 501. London, 1820.

This work is anonymous to us and to the public. As we are never influenced either by the name of an author or of a bookseller attached to any works, but view them solely on their own merits, we do not like the present volume the worse for the author being unknown to us, especially as from the numerous list of subscribers, it would appear that he has an extensive and a very respectable acquaintance in other quarters.

We are such lovers of peace, that we would gladly convert 'swords into ploughshares and spears into pruning hooks,' did not the restless spirit of the rulers of nations admonish us now and then to polish up our armour in case of being suddenly called on to use it, and not to suffer that military spirit which Englishmen so gloriously obtained, to degenerate, while it is watchfully kept alive by our neighbours. Such being the case, we may be allowed to travel a short way with a new friend, over the laurel-strewed fields of Spain and Portugal, and to take a glance at the olive rear'd on that—place of skulls

The grave of France—the deadly Waterloo.

We shall not, however, fight these battles over again, nor attempt to follow our author in a regular narrative of the campaigns in which he shared, but select what appears to us the most novel and interesting in the volume before us.

As the author has very modestly said nothing for himself, either by way of dedication or preface, we must say something for him, and this we do with the greater pleasure, as it will be favourable. His journal is a 'plain unvarnished tale,' strongly characterized by the fidelity and the connection of its details, and furnishing an interesting narrative of a most eventful period in the military history of Great Britain. The traveller's privilege has, we believe, not been exercised, and the author has been satisfied with exhibiting truth in her nakedness, rather than putting her into borrowed clothing, which the delicacy, we suppose, of too many travellers induces them to do.

The work embraces the events of upwards of eight years, in all of which the author was an eye witness or a participator, from his joining the British army soon after the battle of Busaco, in 1810, to its quitting France, in 1818. The details are generally very minute in a military point of view, as to the order of attack in the several battles,—the divisions engaged, and the names of the officers who commanded them; the number of killed, wounded, &c. The details of the various battles of the peninsula have been so often told, and are so well remembered, that we shall pass them over, and quote the author's account of the Duke of Wellington's triumphal entry into Madrid, on the 13th of August, 1813:—

'Madrid, the celebrated metropolis of Spain, and seat of the Spanish government, is seated in an open country, upon the banks of the little river Manzanares. The palaces and other public buildings are superb beyond any thing I remember having seen, and the parks and beautiful avenues of trees which encircle the court end of the town, conspire to make it a very agreeable residence.

The King's palace is built of white stone, upon a little eminence near the river, along the banks of which spread the royal gardens, bounded by meadows, and the view terminates in the lofty mountains of Guadarama, at a distance. The arrival of Lord Wellington and his victorious army at the gates of Madrid, was marked with all those demonstrations of public joy which such an event was calculated to produce; and, although it would be difficult, if not impossible, to describe the enthusiastic animation which prevailed, it is with pleasure one recalls to mind the henours and caresses which were so lavishly heaped upon us. All business was suspended, the shops closed, and people of all ranks quitting their occupations, assembled in the public streets or the parks, and even in the fields for some miles distant from the town, bearing branches of laurels and oak-boughs to meet the army, exhibiting a scene at once so flattering and pleasing, that it was difficult to suppress the feelings of honest pride and exultation which it created. Having marched from Torres les Donas as soon as it was light, we reached the gates of Madrid about seven o'clock. Upwards of fourteen thousand troops, encamped in the meadows under the palace, were just then falling under arms, an order having come down to throw open the royal gardens, where many thousands of people now assembled, with laurel boughs and banners bearing the words "Wellington," "Victory," "Salamanca," and "England and Portugal for ever," and other mottoes of a similar description. The children's hats and caps were decorated with the words, "Wellington and Salamanca;" and where a general officer was recognized, or the shattered colours appeared, the air rang with acclamations. Wherever an English woman passed she had her full share of notice; and, on one occasion, I was greatly amused at the embarrassment of an officer's lady, who, on alighting from her horse at one of the gates of the garden, was for several minutes exposed to the most immoderate caresses and unreserved embraces of at least twenty Spanish girls. Leaving the 5th division marching through cheering crowds, accompanied by my friend T—, I forded the river not far from the palace, and entering the town by the gate near the Inquisition, went in search of a coffee-house to breakfast, by which we avoided much of the bustle; but we were every where saluted with the cry of "Viva España, viva Inglaterra." The bells were ringing, and the "Calle Mayor," or high street, exhibited throughout the day a scene of public rejoicing impossible to describe. Lord Wellington was conducted to the King's Palace, where he and his personal staff were lodged. Colonel Gordon, quarter-master general of the army, occupied the palace of the Prince of Peace. At night there was general and brilliant illumination, and the weather being remarkably fine, the "Calle Mayor" and the other principal streets were thronged with people. There were few transparencies; but illunations in Spain are rendered peculiarly striking by an immense display of rich tapestry suspended from the balconies and windows, in such a manner as to hide the whole front of the buildings, and which, with the reflection of the variegated lamps, produces a very pretty effect. These illuminations were repeated for three nights successively.

In the winter, between the campaigns, the British officers frequently got up plays, particularly the light division officers, who often performed before the Duke of Wellington. The author gives a copy of a play-bill, in which the comedy of 'She Stoops to Conquer,' and the farce of the 'Apprentice,' were played by British officers; the female characters, as in the early history of the stage, being supported by men. Lord C. Spencer, of the 95th regiment, played the maid in the comedy, and Charlotte in the farce. The British troops had, however, generally more serious employment, and often played in tragedy than in comedy, while in the peninsula.

The field of Vittoria, where the British gained so important a victory, had already claimed a notice in history, from a memorable engagement fought there by Edward the Black Prince; and there is still a mound called Allura de los Ingleses, the English Hill. An interesting anecdote is related of Sir John Doyle, at the battle of Irun:—

'A division of Spanish troops attacked and carried a redoubt at the foot of the high and rocky mountain of Le Rhon, not far from the village of Zarra. The Spanish General, Sir John D*, had a horse shot under him, and was himself wounded in the affair. This officer, who is a native of Scotland, has in the course of a few years experienced a series of extraordinary adventures. When the Spanish revolution broke out, he raised a regiment, called the Legion of Estremadura, of which he was made colonel by the Spanish Junta, and thus attached himself to the Spanish service. His bravery and apparent devotedness to the cause, together with the attachment and partiality which he manifested towards every thing Spanish, recommended him to the notice of the Spanish government, so that he was soon advanced to a command with the rank of brigadier-general, and became so distinguished, that the town of Seville presented him with the sword of the famous Pizarro, which he wears to this day. In one of his attacks against the enemy at Seville, he had been wounded and taken prisoner, on which occasion the French general in command suffered him to be most shamefully insulted and severely beaten, a treatment which he could never forget; and it was singular enough that upon his joining Lord Wellington he happened to be posted in that part of our line where the same French general was opposed to him, upon learning which he sent a challenge to the Frenchman, offering to fight him in single combat in face of the two respective forces, but received no answer.'

Although the battle of Waterloo is an often-told tale, yet we cannot resist quoting a few passages from the interesting account of it related by this author. Speaking of Hogoumont, he says,—

'Every tree in the orchards and gardens had been sharply contested for, and the troops in the house having loop-holed the walls, poured forth such an incessant shower of musketry, while those at the gates charged with the bayonet, that the most terrible carnage spread itself on every side, and all the approaches to the chateau were heaped with slain. In the mean time, the right and right centre of the French having crossed the ravine between the two armies, had attacked our left and left centre, and there the conflict was throughout the day of the most murderous and terrific nature. The enemy's attacks were made by such immense columns both of infantry and cavalry, sometimes together and sometimes separate, that it required all the skill and exertions of the generals and commanding officers, and all the characteristic devotedness of both officers and soldiers, to bear up against them. No sooner had one body of troops been repulsed than another advanced. The French cavalry charged our squares of infantry time after time with the most frantic valour, shouting, "Vive l'Empereur!" and notwithstanding the terrible defeats they sustained, still returned to the attack, and being met by our cavalry, a most terrific scene of havoc and confusion prevailed on all sides, and thousands of men and horses fell. The armour of the enemy's cuirassiers received no impression either from our volley of musketry or cavalry swords, and thus defended, they were dealing destruction in every quarter, and galloping round our hollow squares, sometimes charged all four faces of them at once. Our men were ordered to fire low: this, together with the bayonets of the front line, brought down many horses, and hurled their riders to the earth. At length our heavy cavalry appearing through the clouds of fire and smoke, suddenly charged them with all the weight they could carry, which brought several squadrons of them at once to the ground, with a tremendous crash, and for the moment cleared that part of the field; still, however, the battle continued with the same terrific violence. Two, three, and four o'clock came, and found things in the same undecided state, notwithstanding that the enemy had again and again attacked the ridge occupied by the 3d and 5th divisions, and after a most dreadful contest had taken the farm of La Haye

Sainte. This post, from the commencement of the conflict, had been gallantly defended by a part of the King's German Legion and some Hanoverian troops sent from the 3rd division. The French had for two hours been directing their chief attacks against it, by which the ammunition of the garrison being exhausted at a time when it was impossible to send them a fresh supply, they were compelled to surrender or sell their lives as dearly as they could, and they chose the latter; for when the gates of the farm were carried by the enemy, a sanguinary contest with the bayonet was maintained in the yard and house, as long as there was a German left upon his feet. By the loss of this place, the position occupied by the 3d and 5th divisions, had become seriously exposed, and the enemy, under a heavy cannonade, was now preparing to attack the heights near the highway, above Mont St. Jean, where the veteran warrior, Sir Thomas Picton, with his invincible division, was posted. Regardless, though not altogether unconscious, that this would prove his dying hour, with calm composure he viewed the storm approach, and resolved to meet it like a man ready to die for his country. The French were crossing the ravine in solid squares, their cavalry and artillery moving by the highway; for awhile their march was considerably impeded by a destructive fire from our artillery, posted behind a hedge on the left of our position, and some Belgian troops on the slope of the hill; but these being at length compelled to give way, the shock of steel now awaited the 5th division, which at first fell into squares to receive the French cavalry, and then into line to meet their infantry. The French troops advanced with their drums beating, colours flying, and eagles soaring over their heads, the cries of "Vive l'Empereur!" resounding from every mouth as they approached the British columns:—

"But on the British heart were lost

The terrors of the charging host;
For not an eye the scene that view'd,
Chang'd its proud glance of fortitude."

WALTER SCOTT.

'At length, after a terrible carnage, the enemy gained the ridge, where Sir Thomas Picton had formed the whole of his division into one grand line for a charge with bayonets. A shock then took place too dreadful to contemplate, in the midst of which General Picton fell; a musket-ball which passed through his head closed his warlike career. For a quarter of an hour it was not known that the general had fallen, so close and terrific was the fight. Hundreds were falling around him; and his aid-de-camp, poor Captain Chambers, who was also with the old 3d division in the peninsula, fell by his side. For some time the work of destruction was such on all sides, that it was impossible to say which way the scale of success would turn, and the oldest officers could not but look forward to the issue of this struggle with terror and alarm. While these dreadful events were passing with the divisions of Picton and Allen, a scene no less appalling presented itself at Hougoumont, the towers of which edifice, (from the shower of shells and cannon-balls poured down upon it,) were now on fire, and the whole mansion soon after became one mass of smoking ruins; at the same time the enemy surrounded the courtyard and gardens, and attempted to carry them at the point of the bayonet. The field-marshal himself being on the spot, rallied the troops around the burning edifice, and in person led on the guards to a charge in which they drove back the enemy with dreadful carnage.

We conclude with an interesting adventure, which occurred to an officer of the medical staff in the British army:—

'In the retrograde movements made by the British army in Spain after the battle of Talavera, this gentleman, who then belonged to the 23d light dragoons, and some other officers, were surprised and made prisoners at Placentia, and conducted to Madrid, where, by the exercise of his professional skill, he rendered such service to the French wounded, that Bonaparte, upon his subsequent arrival in France, not only gave him his liberty without exchange, but presented him with a gratuity of "twelve hundred francs," (fifty pounds sterling,) from the public purse. The prisoners, both Spanish and English, after remaining at Madrid two months, early in October, 1809, marched for France, under a strong escort appointed to convey them to the frontiers. In passing over the Sierras de Guardarama, by St. Ildelfonso to Segovia, the attention of this officer was attracted by the interesting appearance of a little boy, about six or seven years old, riding in a waggon, apparently under the care of a Spanish woman, who appeared to act the part of a mother to him. Observing, however, that there was something in the child's countenance and complexion which indicated that he was a native of a more northern climate than Spain,—he asked it a few questions in Spanish, and to his surprise was answered in the same language; but, upon further inquiry, it appeared that he was under the protection of the French officer commanding the escort—that he was the orphan child of a Sergeant McCullen, of the 42d regiment, (Highlanders,) who fell in the battle of Corunna, and that the mother, in the retreat from Salamanca upon Lago, had died upon the road, through excessive privations and fatigue, when the poor child fell into the hands of the enemy's advanced guard, fortunately commanded by this humane officer. Upon learning this story, which was fully corroborated on every hand, the British prisoners unanimously petitioned the French officer to give up the child to them, as its more natural protectors, that they might forward it to England, where its former case would claim for it an asylum from some humane institution. The French officer, however, refused to part with the boy, but promised to take care of him and use him well, and the English, in their own destitute situation, as prisoners of war, had of course for the present no alternative but to submit. On their arriving at Tolosa, in the Pyrenees, an order met them, which directed that the English prisoners should be marched into France, but the Spanish conducted to the fortress of Pampeluna, and the French officer herein alluded to being ordered upon the latter duty, the British officers with much regret parted from the little orphan. The author of the narrative having, (as before mentioned,) been recommended to the special notice of the Emperor Napoleon, for the service he had rendered the French wounded, was ordered to Paris to receive his discharge; while he was there waiting for his dismissal, a Captain H, of the 23d light dragoons, arrived in Paris, a prisoner also from Madrid, having under his care the little orphan boy, whom, on his passing Tolosa, he had there found in the most forlorn condition, forsaken by both his foster-father and mother. The former, it appears, had found a difficulty in conveying his prisoners to Pampeluna as ordered, from the enterprising spirit of the Spanish Guerillas under Espoz y Mina, who were resolved to liberate their countrymen; and the Spanish woman dreaming their resentment for attaching herself to a Frenchman, had fled. Under such circumstances, Captain H had, without hesitation, brought the child with him to Paris, where he now very providentially met the very officer who had been the first to identify and interest himself for it, just obtaining his passport for London: it was agreed, therefore, that the poor little boy should go to his native land with him, and Captain H wrote letters to the War Office, to the Duke of York, and also to the Marquis of Huntly, (the colonel of the regiment,) on the subject. Arriving in London with his little orphan, Mr.  immediately left the letters at the Horse Guards and Richmond House, and that same evening received a note, intimating that the Duke of York would be happy to see him and his little protégé on the following morning at ten o'clock; accordingly they went to York House at that hour, and were very graciously received. The Duke of York condescendingly conversed with the child in German and French, both of which languages, as well as Spanish, he had learnt; the first he had acquired from his foster-father, the second from a Saxon servant, and the last from the Spanish woman. His Royal Highness was altogether so much pleased with the child, and so affected with his interesting story, that he resolved to put him into the Military Asylum, under his own patronage. He had about this time resigned the office of commander-in-chief, but with that humanity and condescension for which his Royal Highness is distinguished, he wrote to Sir David Dundas, drawing his notice to the circumstance, with a view that the parties might, with the least possible delay, be furnished with the necessary certificates, and pursue their respective interests. At length nothing was wanting for the admission of the child into the school for soldiers' orphans, but a certificate from the Marquis of Huntly, when Mr.  and the poor little fellow, in proceeding one morning to Richmond House for this document, overtook, near the Horse Guards, a sergeant of the 42d regiment, with a letter in his hand, addressed to the Marquis of Huntly. Under an impression that the man might give him some information which would assist him in his interview with Lord , Mr.  inquired whether he had served in the late campaign in Spain, and being answered in the affirmative, then asked if he knew his comrade, Sergeant McCullen, who was killed at Corunna. The man, evidently much agitated, replied that he knew no comrade of that name killed at Corunna, but begged to know why the gentleman asked this question. Because, said Mr. , this is his orphan child, whom I found in Spain. He was soon interrupted with the simple but emphatic exclamation of, "Bless your honour, Sir, I am the man! it's my child!" Then turning to the child, who had still a faint recollection of his father, he was deeply affected; indeed, we can well conceive that the feelings of each party may be better imagined than described. It afterwards proved that the unseen letter which the soldier was carrying to the Marquis of Huntly, was from Colonel Stirling, commanding the regiment then lying at Canterbury, informing him that Sergeant McCullen was not (as supposed) killed at Corunna, but wounded, and got safe off, and that he had sent the man to London, that he might answer personally for himself any questions which might be put to him. Thus ends this affecting narrative, which I conclude with the hope that this poor fellow has not since fallen in some one of the several bloody fields in which his regiment has subsequently been engaged in the Peninsula or at Waterloo. The child, I understood, was placed in the Military Asylum.

Specimens of the Russian Poets, &c.

(Concluded from p. 105.)

HAVING introduced our readers to Russian poetry and Russian poets, in our last number, and given some specimens of the productions of the most favourite bards, we shall proceed to make them acquainted with the remaining poets of Russia. Dmitriev, who is still living, and has published several small poems, combines energy with tenderness. The following lines, on the grave of Bogdanovich, the author of Psyche, of whom we shall speak by and by, are elegant and affecting :—

* Here love, unweary, when sinks the evening sun, Wets the cold urn with tears, and mournful thinks,

While his sad spirit, sorrow-broken, sinks—
None now can sing my angel Psyche—none ?

The next poem, which is the only one we shall quote from Dinitriev, is powerfully descriptive :—

'DURING A THUNDER-STORM.

It thunders! sons of dust, in reverence bow!
Ancient of days! Thou speakest from above:
Thy right hand wields the bolt of terror now;
That hand which scatters peace and joy and love.

Almighty! trembling like a timid child,
I hear thy awful voice—alarmed—afraid—
I see the flashes of thy lightning wild,
And in the very grave would hide my head.

Lord! what is man? Up to the sun he flies—
Or feebly wanders through earth's vale of dust:

There he is lost 'midst heaven's high mysteries,
And here in error and in darkness lost:
Beneath the storm-clouds, on life's raging sea,
Like a poor sailor—by the tempest toss'd
In a frail bark—the sport of destiny,
He sleeps—and dashes on the rocky coast.

Thou breakest :—and th' obedient storm is still:
Thou speakest :—silent the submissive wave:
Man's shatter'd ship the rushing waters fill,
And the husht billows roll across his grave.
Sourceless and endless God! compared with Thee,

Life is a shadowy momentary dream;
And time, when view'd through thy eternity,
Less than the mote of morning's golden beam.

Krilov, the Russian fabulist, affords us but one extract, which we insert, as a favourable specimen of that species of composition in which the Russian poets are so excellent :—

'THE ASS AND THE NIGHTINGALE.

An ass a nightingale espied,
And shouted out, "Holla! holla! good friend!"

Thou art a first-rate singer they pretend :—
Now let me hear thee, that I may decide,— I really wish to know—the world is partial ever—

If thou hast this great gift, and art indeed so clever—

The nightingale began her heavenly lays;
Through all the regions of sweet music ranging,

Varying her song a thousand different ways;
Rising and falling, lingering, ever changing:
Full of wild rapture now—then sinking off
To almost silence—melancholy, soft.

As distant shepherd's pipe at evening's close,
Strewing the wood with lovelier music :—
there

All nature seems to listen and repose;
No zephyr dares to disturb the tranquil air,—
All other voices of the grove are still,
And the charmed flocks lay down beside the rill.

The shepherd like a statue stands—afraid
His breathing may disturb the melody,
His finger pointing to the harmonious tree,
Seems to say, "Listen!" to his favourite maid.

The singer ended—and our critic how'd
His reverend head to earth, and said aloud,—

"Now that's so so;—thou really hast some merit;

Curtail thy song, and critics then might hear it.
Thy voice wants sharpness; but if Chauntecler

Would give thee a few lessons, doubtless he Might raise thy voice and modulate thy ear;

And thou, in spite of all faults, may'st be
A very decent singer."—

The poor bird

In silent modesty the critic heard,
And wing'd his peaceful flight into the air,
O'er many and many a field and forest fair.

Many such critics you and I have seen :—
Heaven be our screen!—

Of Khemnitz, another distinguished fabulist, we shall only relate an anecdote or two. He is remarkable for his carelessness, unoffensiveness, and absence of mind :—

* When in Paris, he once went to see the representation of Tancrède. On Le Kain's appearance, he was so struck with the noble and majestic presence of that renowned actor, that he rose from his seat and bowed with lowly reverence. An universal roar of laughter brought him back to himself. One morning, a friend for whom he had the highest regard, related to him an interesting piece of news. Khemnitz dined with him afterwards, and as a piece of remarkable intelligence narrated to his host that which his host had before communicated to him. His friend reminded him of his forgetfulness. Khemnitz was greatly distressed, and in his perplexity, instead of his handkerchief, he put his host's napkin into his pocket. On rising from table, Khemnitz endeavoured to slip away unnoticed; his friend saw him, followed him, and tried to detain him. Khemnitz reproached him for unveiling his weaknesses, and would not listen to any entreaties.

"Leave my napkin then, at least, which you pocketed at table," said the other. Khemnitz drew it forth, and stood like a statue. The loud laugh of the company recovered him from his trance, and with the utmost good nature he joined in the general mirth.

Bobrov is the author of an oriental epic poem, the Khersonida, which is said to bear a strong resemblance to Moore's Lalla Rookh, though inferior. The address to the Deity, from the poem we have mentioned, would not, however, disgrace the bard of Erin. We quote it,—

O thou unutterable Potentate!
Through nature's vast extent sublimely great!
Thy lovely form the flower-decked field dis-closes,

Thy smiles are seen in nature's sunny face :
Milk-coloured lilies and wild blushing roses
Are bright with Thee;—Thy voice of gentleness Speaks in the light-winged whispering zephyrs playing

'Midst the young boughs, or o'er the meadows
straying:

Thy breath gives life to all; below, above,
And all things revel in Thy light and love.

* Literally—"three times nine."

But here, on these gigantic mountains, here Thy greatness, glory, wisdom, strength, and spirit,

In terrible sublimity appear!

Thy awe-inspiring voice is heard,—we hear it!
Th' Almighty's fearful voice; attend, it breaks
The silence, and in solemn warnings speaks :
His light tones that whisper 'midst the trees;
His, the whistling of the busy breeze;
His, the storm-thunder roaring, rattling round,
When element with element unites war,
Amidst the echoing mountains; on whose bound
Whose highest bound he drives his fiery car Glowing like molten-iron; or enshrin'd
In robes of darkness, riding on the wind
Across the clouded vault of heav'n: What eye
Has not been dazzl'd by Thy majesty?

Where is the ear that has not heard Thee speak!
Thou breakest!—forest-oaks of centuries
Turn their uprooted trunks towards the skies.
Thou thunderest!—adamantine mountains break,

Tremble, and totter, and apart are riven!
Thou lightenest! and the rocks inflame; Thy power

Off fire to their metallic bosom driven, Melts and devours them!—Lo! they are no more—

They pass away like wax in the fierce flame,
Or the thick mist that frown upon the sun,
Which he but glances at and they are gone;
Or like the sparkling snow upon the hill,
When noon-day darts its penetrating beam.
What do I say? At God's almighty will,
The affrighted world falls headlong from its sphere—

Planets and suns and systems disappear!
But Thy eternal throne—Thy palace bright,
Zion—stands steadfast in unchanging night;
Zion—Thy own peculiar seat—Thy home!
But here, O God! here is Thy temple, too:
Heaven's sapphire arch is its resplendent dome;
Its columns—trees that have for ages stood;
Its incense is the flower-perfumed dew;
Its symphony—the music of the wood;
Its ornaments—the fairest gems of spring;
Its altar is the stony mountain proud!
Lord! from this shrine to Thy abode I bring Trembling devotion's tribute—though not loud,
Nor pomp-devoiated: Thy praise I sing,
And Thou wilt deign to hear the lowly offering.

English poetry scarcely boasts a pretier gem than Bobrov's—

'CHILDREN'S OFFERING ON A PARENT'S BIRTH-DAY.

* Not the first tribute of our love,
Not the first fruits of infant spring,
But flames from love's long kindled fire,
And oft-repeated prayers we bring
To crown thy natal day.

Tis not to-day that first we tell (When was affection's spirit mute?)
How long our hearts have loved—how well—
Nor tune our soft and votive flute,
Nor light the altar's ray.

That altar is our household shrine—
Its flame—the boom's kindly heat:
Its offering, sympathy divine;
Its incense, is the may-day sweet!

Accept thy children's lay.
* I have endeavoured to imitate the singular adaptation of words to sound, of which the Russian language affords so many striking examples.—Original—

Of Bogdanovich, the Anacreon of Russia, the translator has given an interesting biographical notice, from Karamsin's Vestnik, a periodical journal. Bogdanovich was born 'under the beautiful heaven of Little Russia,' in the year 1743. He was the son of a respectable physician; and was, from his childhood, passionately fond of music and poetry:—

'He was brought to Moscow in 1754, and placed in the college of justice. The President Shrejbashsky noticed the active and inquiring spirit of the boy, and allowed him to attend the mathematical school, which was, at that time, in the neighbourhood of the senate. But mathematics were nothing to him;—the sweet poetry of Lomonosov, who now began to captivate his countrymen, was dearer to his mind than all the transpositions of lines or figures. Nothing, perhaps, is so likely to produce a strong and permanent impression on the heart of a young enthusiast, as the pomp, parade, and poetry of the drama. What wonder then that a fiery boy, introduced for the first time to its witcheries, should be led to some act of giddy imprudence! A youth of fifteen once presented himself to the director of the Moscow theatre, modestly, and almost unwillingly, owning—he was a nobleman—he would be an actor. The director had some conversation with him, and soon ascertained his love of knowledge and his poetical ardour. He painted in strong colours the incompatibility of an actor's character with that of nobility,—he urged him to inscribe himself in the university, and to visit him at his house. This young man was no other than our Bogdanovich,—that director was neither than Michael Matveevich Kheraskov, the poet of the Russian. Thus did a lucky accident bring this scholar of the muses to their favourite bard; one who, possessed of extraordinary talent himself, was not slow to discover and to honour it in others. From him did Bogdanovich learn the rules and the ornaments of poetry; he studied foreign languages, and acquired whatever else might give strength and encouragement to his natural powers. Study, it is true, is no creator of genius, but it serves to exhibit it in all its most beautiful and mighty influence. Kheraskov gave him examples, precepts, encouragements; and in the university-journal of this period, Polemos Uchebnye, we find many specimens of the powers of the young bard. These, though yet far removed from perfection, are striking proofs of his ability to reach it.

'Besides Kheraskov, our young poet possessed, while he remained at the university, another invaluable protector in Count Michael Ivanovich Dashkov. The favours conferred by rank and influence on talents just developing themselves, create a grateful and well-rewarding return; while, on the other hand, the fair and delicate flowers of youthful genius are but too often and too early blasted by the cold winds of neglect. But let it be said in Russia's honour, that talent has never wanted patronage there, especially if accompanied by moral worth. This was eminently the case with Bogdanovich. Like La Fontaine, in whose poetical steps he seems to have trodden, he was distinguished by the most attractive ingenuousness. Ere he was eighteen he held his station in the great and busy world, but held it with the simplicity of a child. Whatever he felt he uttered, whatever pleased him he did; he listened willingly to the wisdom of others, and fell asleep during the tiresome lessons of folly. It was our young bard's good fortune to live with a poet who exacted the productions of his muse as the price of his protection and his counsels, leaving every thing else to his own waywardness. His open heartedness often led him into perplexities, but no sooner did he perceive that his conversation had inflicted on any a feeling or thought of sorrow than he lamented his inconsiderateness with tears. He determined again and again to talk more warily; the resolution was, however, soon forgotten, and succeeded by regret and repentance and renewed vows.

'He was not rich; he often had nothing to give the poor but sympathy. Is not this often more grateful to the receiver, and always more honourable to the giver than the pieces of gold extorted by misery from the coldness of pride and of affluence? Towards his friends and acquaintance he was kindness and urbanity itself. On one occasion, a fire broke out in the neighbourhood of one of his connexions. Bogdanovich sprang from his bed, and, in spite of the bad weather and the distance, hurried to the assistance of his friend, clad only in his night garment.

'His dwelling was with an inestimable family, who treated him as a near and dear relative, and he returned their kindness with ever-active affection.

'We must here linger a little on one mark of character, common indeed to all genuine poets;—a lively sensibility to female charms, a sensibility which has been the creator of some of the sweetest songs of the choir of bards. In one who, like Bogdanovich, was born to be the poet of the graces, this mighty sympathy could not but be early developed among the sensibilities of his character. In its origin it is timid and unpretending—in him it was peculiarly so. He saw, he felt, he supplicated, he blushed—and uttered his emotions in his harmonious songs. Stern, indeed, must have been the beauty that could not be moved by that melodious lyre!

Bogdanovich was, when only eighteen years of age, appointed inspector of the Moscow University. He commenced a journal, entitled 'Innocent Recreation,' and translated several of Voltaire's poems. In 1766, he went with Count Beloselsky, as secretary of legation, to Dresden; and it was here that he commenced his chief poem, the Dushenka (Psyche), which was published in 1775, of which his biographer Karamsin speaks with rapture, and inquires, 'where exists the Russian who has not read Dushenka?' Bogdanovich always spoke with enthusiastic delight of that part of his life which had been employed in this work. Karamsin says,

'His abode was then at Petersburg, on the Fassilostrov, in a silent solitary dwelling, wholly wrapt in poetry and music, enjoying an enviable and care-divested liberty. He had agreeable acquaintances;—he sometimes went out, but always to return with keener pleasure to a home where the muses welcomed him with renewed fondness, with hope and fancy's fairest flowers. The tranquil, unuttered, unutterable joy of the poet is perhaps the sweetest and brightest that this world can witness. How triumphantly do the favoured sons of song scatter the misty shades of vanity and the more palpable array of earth-born passion! Who that ever tasted the charm of such enviable moments, does not turn away from the sparkling follies of the substantial world to the memory of those holy hours of rapture? One energetic and harmonious line—one well-conveyed emotion—a gentle graceful transit from one thought to another—can fill the soul of the poet with innocent and natural delight, leaving behind it a soft and placid gladness which will be doubly grateful if it can be participated by some sympathising and sensible friend, who can enter into its enthusiasm and forgive its excess. It is indeed a guiltless and a spiritual joy, created by an effort, which effort is in itself enjoyment: and then it brings the prospect of the approbation, the encouragement of the wise and good!—But envy! envy!—the pitiful efforts of every itself only make its triumphs the more splendid—they dash and murmur like the little waves against the firm foot of the mountain, on which true merit raises itself in its own majesty, for the glory of its country and of mankind.'

Karamsin compares the Dushenka of the Russian poet with the Psyche of La Fontaine. He says 'La Fontaine had more of art, Bogdanovich of nature; and the current of the latter flows, in consequence, more refreshingly. This production,' he continues, 'must not be weighed in the scales of Aristotle. It is a display of the powers of a gay and joyous imagination, directed by good taste. It is sportive, excursive, ingenuous, faithful:—

"Why must rules of art be intruded here?"

Karamsin's eulogium, great as it is, appears to have been confirmed by public opinion; for, still speaking of the Dushenka, he says,

'Is it surprising that such a poem produced so great an impression? Six or seven sheets thrown uncalled for into the world, wholly changed the fate of the author. Catherine was then reigning in Russia. She saw, she admired the Dushenka—sent for the poet, and inquired of him how she could gratify him.—It was enough—who doubts the taste of a sovereign? Nobles and courtiers learnt Dushenka by heart, each rivaling the rest in the attentions showered upon the author. Epistles, odes, and madrigals in his honour were scattered profusely. He was mounted above the clouds.—Alas! that the destructive influence of such distinctions should have overshadowed him in the brightest epoch of his poetic talents. He was thirty years old—he abandoned the muse—and the garland woven for him by his Dushenka was the only one that encircled his brow in his listless lethargy. It is an imperishable wreath, no doubt, but the friends of poetry mourn that it should have satisfied him. Even the thirst for fame may be quenched. Our poet afterwards wrote much, but against his own will and against the will of his inspiring genius. Perhaps he would set up no rival to his beloved Dushenka.'

Bogdanovich died in January, 1803, 'mourned by his acquaintance and friends, and by every friend of the literature of his country.' From his last production, which the translator says is 'a graceful and lovely poem,' we have only two short extracts, which we eagerly transfer to our pages.

'Twere vainly daring through dark time to range,
Seeking those sounds, which in eternal change
Were consecrate to beauty: its short day
Of fashion once possessed and passed away:
But let the poet be allowed to say,
That the fair royal maiden, youngest child
Of th' eastern monarch, whom with passion wid

So many sighed for day and night,
Was by the Greeks called Psyche—meaning (According to our learned ones' explaining)
A soul, or spirit—our philosophers

Thinking that all that's tender, fair, and bright,

Must needs be her's,
Named her Dushenka";—thus
A word so sweet, so musical to us,
With all the charm of novelty,
O, loveliest Psyche! was conferred on thee.
Conveyed from tongue to tongue, its throne it found.

In memory's archives—its melodious sound
Now breathes the angel-harmony of love,
A music and a radiance from above.'

'Dushenka: Dushenka! the robes that thou wearer

Seem ever most lovely and fitting;

'Dusha—Dushenka its diminutive, a word expressing great tenderness and fondness.

Whether clad like a queen of the east thou appear'st,
Or plain as a shepherdess sitting
By the door of her cottage at evening's calm tide,
Thou still art the charm of the world and its pride.

Thou fairest of saints that devotion has sainted,
Divinest of all the divine:—
All the pictures of beauty that art ever painted
Can give no idea of thine!'

We insert another extract from the
the same poet, which, though of a very different description, yet possesses great beauty and simplicity:—

'THE INEXPERIENCED SHEPHERDESS.

(A POPULAR SONG.)

I'm fourteen summers old I trow,
'Tis time to look about me now:
'Twas only yesterday they said,
'Is a silly, silly maid!—
'Tis time to look about me now.

The shepherd swains so rudely stare,
I must reprove them I declare:

'Thy talk of beauty—'that of love—
'I'm such a fool I can't reprove—
I must reprove them I declare.

'Thy strange—but yet I hope no sin;
Something unwonted speaks within:
Love's language is a mystery,
And yet I feel, and yet I see,—
O what is this that speaks within?

The shepherd cries, "I love thee, sweet!"
"And I love thee," my lips repeat:

Kind words, they sound as sweet to me
As music's fairest melody;
'I love thee," oft my lips repeat.

His pledge he brings,—I'll not reprove;
O no! I'll take that pledge of love;
To thee my guardian dog I'd give,
Could I without that guardian live:
But still I'll take thy pledge of love.

My shepherd's crook I'll give to thee;—
O no! my father gave it me—
And treasures by a parent given,
From a fond child should ne'er be riven—
O no! my father gave it me.

But thou shalt have yon lambkin fair—
Nay! 'tis my mother's fondest care;

For every day she joys to count
Each snowy lambkin on the mount;—
I'll give thee, then, no lambkin fair.
But stay, my shepherd! wilt thou be
For ever faithful—fond to me?

A sweeter gift I'll then impart,
And thou shalt have—a maiden's heart,
If thou wilt give thy heart to me.'

We have been so much delighted with this volume, that we have dwelt on it at greater length than is usual with us; we shall, therefore, only necessitate one poet more, Kostrov, the translator of Homer's Iliad. It is said that he offered the last six books of his Homer to a bookseller, and the liberal tradesman offering him only one hundred and fifty roubles (about 7. 10s.
sterling) for his labours, the offended poet threw the translation into the fire.
The first six books are the only ones which have been collected. With the following we close our extracts:—

'THE VOW.

'The rose is my favourite flower:
On its tablets of crimson I swore,
That up to my last living hour
I never would think of thee more.

I scarcely the record had made,
Ere Zephyr, in frolicsome play,
On his light airy pinions convey'd
Both tablet and promise away.'

In closing our notice of this work, we should be ungrateful if we did not thank Mr. Bowring for the gratification he has afforded us by making us acquainted with the treasures of the Russian muse, and we are much mistaken if the success of the present volume is not such as to call on him, very speedily, to furnish complete translations of the poems, of which he has only given extracts; and to prosecute his extensive plan of writing a general history of Russian literature.

A General History of the House of Guelph, &c. By Andrew Halliday.

In our last, we brought down the history of the Guelphs to the death of Henry the Lion. His son Henry, who, in his youth, was a boy of what the French call très grande espérance, defended Brunswick, in the life time of his father, with such spirit and judgment, that the Imperialists were obliged to withdraw from the contest.
This prince enlisted under the banner of the cross, in the third crusade, and greatly distinguished himself at the capture of Joppa, and in many other places in Asia. On his return from the Holy Land, he visited Venice and other cities in Italy, claiming the sovereignty of the states that belonged to his family, and renewing the charters which had been granted by his ancestors to the descendants of the younger branches of his house. In 1200, he accompanied his brother William to England, to demand from King John the legacies which had been left him by their uncle, Richard the First. In 1215, in consequence of a quarrel with Frederick the Second, he was publicly proscribed, and the palatinate given to Louis, Duke of Bavaria, but it was, in a few years, restored to him. Henry died in 1227, leaving only two daughters: one married to Herman, Margrave of Baden, and the other to Otto, Duke of Bavaria.

On the death of Henry the Sixth, Otto, of Guelph, the second surviving son of Henry the Lion, was elected King of the Romans; he afterwards seized on Aix-la-Chapelle, where the Archbishop of Cologne crowned him Emperor. The partisans of the late emperor were not inactive, and Frederick, the only son of Henry the Sixth, a child of three years of age, was declared the head of the empire, and Philip, his uncle and guardian, was, at a diet, elected King of the Romans. War was carried on some years with great vigour, when, through the mediation of the Pope, a reconciliation was effected. Philip agreed to bestow his daughter Beatrix upon Otho, and to secure him the succession, and he consented to waive all pretensions to the crown during the lifetime of Philip. The untimely end of this emperor, who was murdered by the Count Otho, of Wittelsbach, left the son of Henry the Lion in the undisputed possession of the imperial crown, within the year after the family compact was made. Beatrix gave her hand to Otho four years after her father's murder, but only survived the ceremony four days. The claims of the young Frederick were afterwards supported by France, and Otho withdrew from the contest and died in retirement, at Brunswick, in 1218. William of Winchester, the youngest son of Henry the Lion, was born while his father was an exile in England; he married Helen, daughter of Waldemar, King of Denmark, and dying in 1212, left issue, Otho, then in his eighth year, under the guardianship of his widow.

We are now arrived at a period when the descendants of the Guelphic race, robbed of their hereditary states, and deprived of the titles of their ancestors, appear in the ordinary rank of German princes. After some severe struggles, in which Otho was taken prisoner, he resigned the whole of his possessions into the hands of the emperor, and was reduced to the rank of a feudal duke, whose territories scarcely exceeded one fiftieth part of the states governed by his grandfather. He, whose ancestors had created princes and ordained bishops, was made Duke of Brunswick and Luneburg, by charter, instead of allodial right. Otho died in 1252, leaving his son, Albert I. his successor, who was styled 'the Great,' but whether from his stature or his noble deeds, is not altogether certain. After being continually at war with his neighbours, in which he was generally successful, he added greatly to his dominions, and dying in 1279, left them divided among his three sons, who, as usual, contended with each other, when the duchy of Brunswick ultimately fell to the second son, Albert II. who, marrying Richenza, a daughter of Henry, Prince of Merle, in Mecklenburg, had a family of nine children. His states were divided at his death, in 1318, between his sons Otho, Magnus, and Ernest. Magnus the First, surnamed the Pious, inherited Brunswick, who, dying in 1369, was succeeded by his son Louis, and afterwards by his second son, Magnus II. who was called Torquatus, or the chain-bearer, from the following circumstance:—

'This prince, in his younger days, being very insolent and troublesome to his subjects and neighbours, it was made known to his father, who sent many letters and divers messages to reclaim him, but in vain; so that, at last, he was obliged to use threats, and let him know, that if ever he took the field again in a hostile manner, he would hang him at the next tree. The son, who was of a very active spirit, and daring, only laughed at his father's menaces, and, in derision, always wore a silver chain about his neck, that there might, as he said, be no lack of a thing to hang him with.'

The Duchy of Luneburg, which had been separated from that of Brunswick since the death of Albert the Great, in consequence of the failure of issue, reverted to Magnus II., who got possession of it, but, in the contest, meeting his rival, Albert, in the field of battle, they engaged in single combat; and, during this encounter, Magnus was basely murdered by one of the attendants of the Count of Schaumburg, who stabbed him in the back.

The death of Magnus, in 1373, did not put an end to the contest respecting the succession of the states of Luneburg. His sons, Frederick, Bernard, and Henry, had agreed to reign conjointly, and were determined to maintain their right to the inheritance of their ancestors. Frederick, the eldest, was esteemed one of the ablest princes of his day, and when Wenzelau, by his bad conduct, forfeited the crown of the Caesars, and was removed from the throne, he, by the unanimous voice of the empire, was elected King of the Romans; but was murdered on his way to Frankfort to receive the crown.

Bernhard and Henry agreed upon a division of their states. The latter took Luneburg and Calenberg for his share; while the former had Brunswick, including Hanover, Everstein, and other provinces. Before we notice the issue of Bernhard, we shall make an extract relating to a collateral descendant of his, William, Duke of Brunswick, Wolfenbüttele, who was summoned to a diet at Spire. Among other charges against him was the following, which is quoted from a History of the House of Brunswick, printed in London, in 1716:—

"The Duke had married the Lady Mary, sister to Ulrich, Duke of Wittenberg, who, among other ladies that waited on her, had one Eve Trotting, a young lady of extraordinary beauty and noble family. The Duke began to be desperately smitten with her, and, at length prevailing, had some children by her; but that the intrigue might not be discovered, and that he might still enjoy her company, he put a stragem into her head, that she should pretend to return home to her parents; and he furnished her with a wagon and horses and all things necessary for her journey; but, when the people thought she was really returned home, she was conducted another way to a castle of his, whereof the governor was beforehand instructed by him what to do, and had a woman or two, in whom he most confided to assist him in the plot. Some days after Eve came there, she took to her bed, pretending to be very sick. Now the Duke had before prepared an image to be made of wood, representing the head, neck, and breast of a dead body; the other parts of the body were done and shaped in linen, which the women stuffed with dust or earth, that so it might seem to be solid, and then fitted the wooden head and bust to it, which was likewise covered over with the linen cloth. Being thus ordered and wrapt in a shroud, it was laid on the floor, and presently one of the women ran to the governor's parlour door, crying out that Eve was dead; upon which he presently ordered a coffin to be made to put the body in; and, to scare people from approaching the corpse, it was given out that she died of the plague, and juniper berries and other oculatorous things were burnt to perfume the room. Afterwards, the corpse was carried in funeral pomp to the Grey Friar's Church, where it was honourably buried; the Franciscans performing all the usual ceremonies, and praying for the soul of the deceased, as they did for a whole year after, and, in their sermons, exhorted the people to do the like. There was also, by the Duke's orders, a funeral office performed for her in the chapel of the castle, where it was said she died, priests being invited thither from the neighbourhood; the same was done in the castle of Wolfenbüttele. His wife, the Duchess, was present at this office with her women and maids all in mourning. Many priests were invited to it, who had, afterwards, a dinner, and every one of them a piece of money in gratuity; according to the ancient custom observed among the papists.

"In the meantime, Eve, whose death was lamented by so many, was in the castle of Stauffenburg, where she was still visited by the Duke, who, since that time, had seven children by her; he also persued his Duchess to write to Eve's parents and relations to acquaint them with her death.

"But when afterwards a rumour was raised that she was still alive, and kept in Stauffenburg, the Duchess's jealousy put her upon making a strict inquiry of the servants about the truth thereof; but the Duke gave orders, that none of those should come near her that could give any information. However, her suspicion stuck to her as long as she lived, which put her upon writing many letters to him to lament her misfortune."

Reverting to the elder branch of this family, we find that Bernhard left two sons, Otho and Frederick. The first succeeded his father in 1434, and reigning twelve years, died without issue. He was succeeded by his brother Frederick, surnamed the Just, who delivered up the government of the Duchy to his two sons, Bernhard and Otho, and retired to a convent. Otho was engaged in a contest with his nobles, and died during the lifetime of his father, leaving a son, Henry, three years of age. Bernhard, now emerged from the cloister and assumed the reins of government, as the guardian of his grandson. His second reign was as peaceable as his first had been, and he died in 1478, leaving the young Henry, then ten years of age, sovereign of the country.

This Henry was an active and enterprising prince. He succeeded from the church, and greatly promoted the reformation; a circumstance which involved him in war with his cousins Erick and Henry of Brunswick Wolfenbüttele, whom he took prisoners. He was put under the law of the empire, and, to avoid the effects of this prescription, he resigned the duchy to his three sons, and fled to France, where he remained an exile for several years. On making proper submission, he was allowed to return, and became active in suppressing the insurrection occasioned by the extravagancies of Mun of Stollberg, the Apostle of the Anabaptists.

Ernest the Second, son of Henry, who, on the resignation of his brother, succeeded to the Duchy, was called the Confessor, on account of the active and zealous part he took in the reformation. In the diet at Augsburg, his voice had a powerful influence in persuading the princes to support the cause they had adopted, and to reject the flattering and tempting promises of the emperor. He ably supported the exhortations of Luther, and was amongst the first to propose the league for their mutual defence against all aggressors, and by which the Protestant states of the empire were formed into one regular body. Ernest was an able negotiator and a sound politician: and his commanding eloquence could at all times confirm the wavering spirit of the Elector of Saxony, or calm the violence of the Landgrave of Hesse, the acknowledged heads of the Protestant league. Henry resided in the Castle of Celle, and took the title of Duke of that city, in preference to that of Duke of Luneburg. He died in 1546. He was succeeded by his eldest son, Francis Otho, in the dukedom of Celle. Henry, his second son, received the principality of Danneberg; and William, the youngest, had the duchy of Luneburg.

Characteristic Portraits of the various Tribes of Cossacks attached to the Allied Armies in the Campaign of 1815. Taken from the life at Paris, and accompanied by Historical Particulars, and Authentic Descriptions of their Manners, Costume, &c. 4to. pp. 52. London, 1820.

In another part of the present Number, we exhibit striking proofs of the progress of civilization, and of the cultivation of the polite arts in Russia, and we are now called upon to shew the dark side of the picture, in an account of the rude and unrefined Cossacks, whose personal appearance is as various as their tribes or the countries they inhabit. The Don, Ural, Zaporogian, Buschkir, Grebenski, Kirguis, and Tcherkasses, or Circassian, Cossacks, with the Nogays and Mongols, all form distinct tribes and differ from each other. But, generally speaking, all the Cossacks have something Asiatic in their habits and physiognomy. They are of the middle stature, but of a robust constitution, inured to fatigue and every vicissitude of climate; hence the formidable resistance they made to the French, not only in their own 'frightful country' but in the south of Europe. Almost all the Cossacks have blue eyes, brown hair, cut short in the neck, and the beard more commonly red than black. Though the Cossacks are really subjects, yet they are not amenable to the general laws of the state; and it seems doubtful whether they can ever be brought into a state of civilization. They are, in general, registered for the military service at the age of eighteen, and not discharged till they are fifty. The Russian government alone possesses the power of appointing or removing the Hetman and the principal officers, but the others are still elected by their equals; and, when once they have taken rank in the Russian army, they cannot be cashiered, except by the Emperor.

When they are in active service, they receive a ration of flour, millet, or oatmeal, and are paid from twelve to fifteen rubles a year; and as they are obliged to find their own arms, horses, equipments, and subsistence, it is pretty clear that they must live almost entirely at the expense either of their enemies or of their allies. Their dress, which is left to their own choice, is a motley mixture of every colour. They are armed with a carbine, sabre, and pistols; but their principal weapon is a pike, from fifteen to eighteen feet long, which they manage with great dexterity, and which alone is sufficient to make them formidable. But besides these, some of the Cossack corps carry a singular and not less dangerous weapon. This is a rope, from fifteen to eighteen feet in length, with a noose at one end, which they fling with such expertness and rapidity over a flying enemy, that, provided he be within reach, they entrap him in the noose as securely as the lazomen on the River La Plata catch the wild bullocks in precisely a similar mode. In this manner, at the time of the invasion of Russia, the French General Segur was caught, and dragged from his horse, by a Cossack, after he had cut his enemy's lance in two with his sword.

The author of the present work, after giving a general description of the Cossacks, proceeds to describe the different tribes, which are illustrated by some good lithographic engravings, and by characteristic anecdotes. Our extracts will rather be of a general description; we cannot, however, omit noticing the excessive voracity of the Buschskirs, of whom we are told that—

'One man will eat at a meal fifteen pounds of meat, and drink eight quarts of kumiss. One of their favourite dishes is the bishbarmak, or five-finger dish, so called because it is swallowed by handfuls. It consists of hashed horseflesh. Buschkirian politeness requires each person to cram a handful of this hash into his neighbour's mouth; and when they have public entertainments, every one strives to introduce a handful into the mouth of the chief, who has nothing to do but digest what he is so liberally supplied with. If the mistress of a house is going to treat her guests with sheep's feet, she throws some dozens of them on the fire; takes them off when they are half broiled, and brings them by armfuls to the table. With this ravenous disposition, the Buschskirs find themselves rather straightened in winter; it is said that their condition during that season is truly piteable; that they look like spectres, and do not begin to recover their flesh till spring.

We shall now give a few of the most characteristic anecdotes which this pleasing little work furnishes. It is necessary to premise that they relate to the Cossacks when at Dresden, in 1813:

Love of Music.—It appears that these rude people are by no means insensible to the charms of music, for which they manifest a strong predilection. A party of them, attracted by the solemn peal of the organ, entered a church, and while it was playing, continued fixed in silent attention. Its tones ceased, and the officiating clergyman commenced his sermon. This address, in an unknown language, soon began to excite symptoms of impatience in the strangers; one of whom, stealing softly up the steps of the pulpit unobserved by the minister, startled him not a little by tapping him on the shoulder in the midst of his harangue, and inviting him, as well as he could by signs, accompanied with all sorts of grotesque gestures, to descend, and no longer interrupt the gratification which the organist afforded to himself and his companions. Notwithstanding the solemnity of the place, the gravity of the minister and his congregation were not proof against this attack, and it was some time before the former could so far recover from its ludicrous effect, as to resume his discourse.

A young lady, of a respectable family, was seated at her piano-forte, playing and singing. She was heard by a Cossack who was passing under her window. As if enchanted, he followed the melodious sounds, pursued his way up stairs, from room to room, and, after traversing several apartments, discovered the right one. He entered, and stood listening behind the lonely musician, who, half dead with fear on perceiving the figure of her martial visitor in a mirror, would naturally have run away. He detained her, and, in unintelligible language, but with friendly gestures, begged for la da capo; and without ceremony, fetched his comrades out of the street. The music soon relaxed the joints of the bearded warriors, and in a few moments they struck up a charming Cossack dance, in the best room in the house. The trembling girl was obliged to summon up all her courage and strength, that her fingers might not refuse to perform their office in this critical juncture. She returned sincere thanks to heaven when the dance was over, and was not a little surprised when one of the delighted performers, with the most cordial gestures, laid a piece of gold on the piano forte. It was to no purpose that the young lady refused it; the donors retired, leaving behind them the piece of money, which the fair owner will doubtless preserve with care, as a memorial of the lovers of dancing and music from the deserts of Asia.

Politeness.—A Cossack, surrounded by a legion of boys, whom he sometimes took by the hand, and sometimes set a running, by throwing his cap for them to bring back again, met a lad selling cakes. He immediately laid an embargo on the whole stock of the itinerant trader, which he divided among his merry companions, reserving for himself about a dozen cakes, which he put into the pockets of his wide breeches. Whilst occupied in housing them, he spied an elegant lady coming towards him, but who was about to turn off to avoid the crowd of boys. The Cossack ran up to her, pulled the cakes three at a time out of his magazine, and offered them to the lady, half dead with fright. "Mamsell, good!—Dobie, mamsell!" said he, with a friendly smile. When, however, neither kind words nor gestures could prevail on mamsell to accept the cakes, he thrust them into her ridiculous, and respectfully kissed her fair hands, in spite of all her endeavours to disengage them from his grasp. The lady made a precipitate retreat, and the Cossack watched her, as long as she was in sight, with a look of concern.

A Cossack's Word.—The Cossack colonel, Prince Gn, was quartered with a lady of rank. The footman of the latter, going out of the house one evening about nine o'clock, observed a Cossack before the door, holding two horses. To his utter astonishment, he soon discovered that it was no other than Prince G., his mistress's guest.—"Good God!" said he, "is your highness holding horses?"—"Yes; a Cossack, who did not know me, just as I was coming out of the house, asked me to hold them for a moment. I did not like to refuse him; but the fellow stays rather too long. I have been standing here almost an hour."—"Let me take the bridle; I will hold the horses."—"No; I must keep the promise which I have given to the Cossack. A Cossack never breaks his word." Whilst the servant was expressing his surprise at this kind of observance of the word of a prince, the Cossack came up, recognized the illustrious horse-holder, and threw himself at the feet of his colonel, who, mildly said, as he went away, "Another time, don't stay so long."

The Ural tribes in Siberia have four fisheries every year, when tickets are given to the Cossacks registered for the military service. The Attamans receive four, the Starchines three, the other civil and military officers two, and the private Cossacks one; but these tickets may be transferred or sold for the year. The first of these fisheries is the most important, the most productive, and the most curious; and we therefore close our extracts with an account of it:—

About the 3d or 4th of January, the registered Cossacks are assembled: inquiry is made if those who have been absent on business are returned, and where the most fish have been observed; for the

sturgeons and belugas begin to ascend the river so early as the middle of autumn. The experienced fishermen, who watch them at the time the ice begins to form, assert, that these fish sport and play about the spot which they fix upon for their winter abode, where they lie torpid on the sand. A day is then fixed for opening the fishery. The wished-for day is ushered in by the discharge of artillery. The Cossacks, provided with tickets, mounted on sledges, and furnished with iron hooks of all dimensions, set out before sunrise, and range themselves in a line as they reach the appointed rendezvous. An attaman, elected for the season, reviews them, and examines if they have their hooks, and their arms to withstand the Kirguises, by whom they are frequently attacked; the jeassous, or aides-de-camp, recommend order, and the party proceed to the designated spot. The part of the river destined for the winter fishery is about four hundred versts in length, following the winding course of the Ural. Every day a certain space is set apart for operations. Each Cossack has his place, which he chooses as he arrives, and which he may change with his neighbour if it suits them, or if one of them quits his situation; but none of them can begin to fish till the attaman has given the signal, by a discharge of musketry. At this signal, each man makes a hole, the dimensions of which are nearly defined in the ice at the spot which he has chosen. He thrusts the largest of his hooks down to the mud of the river, which is sometimes fifteen or sixteen fathoms deep. The fish, roused from its torpor by another hook which the fisherman holds in his left hand, strives to burrow deeper, and falls upon the first hook, which the Cossack instantly pulls up upon the ice. It sometimes happens that two neighbours catch the same fish, or that they have need of assistance to draw up the largest; in such cases they divide the booty. Some of them will catch ten sturgeons a day, several of which will weigh as much as five puds, (a pud is thirty-three pounds weight, and belugas of above eight hundred pounds weight. Others are so unfortunate as not to catch any thing for several days; and, perhaps, do not take altogether sufficient to defray the expenses which their preparations for the fishery have occasioned, and which they often make upon credit. They never fail to ascribe this ill luck to some spell that is set upon them, and, if, by accident, a frog should be brought up by their hook, they immediately desist from fishing, convinced that some fatality would attend them.

The costumes of the different tribes are well represented, and the work is interesting, without having much pretension to literary merit. Indeed, the letter-press has only been considered as an auxiliary to the engravings, though to us it is the most important feature.

The New Pronouncing and Spelling Book, accompanied by a Series of Instructive and Interesting Lessons. By John Bigland, Author of 'Letters on History,' &c. &c. pp. 160. Derby, 1820.

HAVING observed, the other day, fine specimens of penmanship, exhibited in a window, with these words, 'Spelling Writing, and Aritmetic, conscientiously taught on moderate terms;' we feel it our duty to select a work which, if consulted, will make a bad writer to be respected, and a good one celebrated.

Many of the old spelling books have been so artfully pirated and badly printed, that they have neither ability nor correctness to recommend them. The putting of such books into the hands of children is like giving them an ignorant guide that will lead them into perpetual error. An accurate spelling book, then, is of the utmost importance, and we cheerfully occupy a nook of our columns to give Mr. Bigland the commendation which he merits. The work before us is divided into six parts, and subdivided into tables for spelling and lessons for reading, with occasional remarks for elucidation.

The first part is more immediately designed to remove a false pronunciation, and we think it the most difficult part of the book, at least to a child's comprehension. The second and third parts contain a sketch of monosyllables and polysyllables, with 'moral lessons.' The fourth and fifth are equally valuable; the last of which contains lessons on natural history, with a cut to each lesson. The sixth part relates principally to punctuation and abbreviation. Method and correctness are the attributes of the whole book; its sentiments are moral, and its tendencies excellent.

NECESSITY OF A NEW TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—More than two hundred years have rolled on since the present translation of the Bible was made. Now it must be acknowledged that, during this period, custom and education have tended much to the alteration of words in their application. Words which were used by old writers, and considered as intelligibly correct and strictly moral, are now either obsolete, or, if, used, admissible in the language and writings of that day, would be considered as highly improper and immoral. If we but refer back to the dramatic authors, and even later poets, we may read them; but from the tenor of expressions which they contain, we should be sorry, and deviate from our principles of duty and obligation to our children, to put them into their hands, and entirely on this account. Whereas, the finest productions of antiquity and philological research are hidden in obscurity, or but faintly seen, because the language is not tolerated under our ideas of delicacy.

I am led into these observations, Sir, from a very simple, but, nevertheless, I consider, important reason. After church, last Sunday, my little girl, whom I endeavour to instruct in the paths of virtue and affection, said to me,—'Father, don't you think our clergyman is a very wicked man?' 'Why, my dear?' I rejoined. 'Because, I'm sure, he said very naughty words when he was reading the lesson out of the Bible; and you say that is a good book.'

Now, Sir, you may imagine the reply; I was obliged to enter into an explanation which was not pleasant, or suffer the innocent curate, who was but performing his duty, to become the object of even a child's reproof. This cannot be said to be the way 'to train up a child in the way he should go, that when he is old he may not depart from it.' I am your's, &c.

EPITAPHS.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

'When some proud son of man returns to earth,
Unknown to glory but upheld by birth,
The sculptor's art exhausts the pomp of woe,
And storied urn record who rests below;—
When all is done, upon the stone is seen,
Not what he was, but what he should have been.

LORD BYRON.

SIR,—Inhuman, indeed, must he be who could refuse the consolation, which relatives derive for the loss of their dear connexions from the circumstances of tombstones, epitaphs, &c. There is a certain joyousness, in the midst of our tears, arising from the satisfaction of having, to the extent of our abilities, paid the last duties to departed worth, in reference to the solemnities of interment, and in the after act of placing over their remains a memento, which shall tell that once they lived. It is not, therefore, of these interesting peculiarities which I would complain; but of that system of exaggerated eulogy, which converts the tablets of our cemeteries into so many fulsome orations over dust and ashes. Every allowance should be made for the intensity of feeling, which generally dictates these records; and it is chiefly on the epitaphs of the rich and great that censure should fall, rather than on the enlarged expressions of private feeling and affection. When a man dies, whose narrow spirit, proverbial penuriousness, and grudging severity on the poor, have been as notorious as his possessions were extensive, the eye sullens at the engraved marble, which proclaims the liberality of his hand, the sympathy of his heart, and the boundless generosity of his habitual conduct, which procured for him the esteem of all. Nor is it the vulgar prejudice existing against the rich in general, that draws forth these remarks. Providence, by a system as mysterious as it is unerring, has instituted a distinction of ranks, possessions, and enjoyments; and it is only the meanest and most paltry envy, which can abuse the rich, only because they are rich. A fact, however, occurred in Scotland, which may, in some measure, justify these comments; a wealthy baronet, of whom not one act of benevolence is known, died some time ago; and, after all the 'pomp and prodigality' of funeral honours, a monument was erected to his memory. First appeared the deceased's name and titles, then the family lineage, followed by a recital of numerous acts of liberality (now for the first time heard of upon the most shallow authority), which would raise a memorial more lasting than stone or marble. The whole was finely wound up with the following scripture quotation:—'Whoso giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord; and whatsoever he giveth, the same shall he receive;' underneath which was written very soon afterwards,—

'The Lord owes the baronet—NOTHING!'

Severe indeed! but not more severe than true; a satire applicable, it is feared, to many a sculptured slab.

'When the last trump shall sound—the trembling base,
Of towers, of temples, pyramids be riven,
And all the dead arise before the hosts of heaven!

Oh! in that awful hour, of what avail
Unto the "spiritual body" will be found
The costliest canopy, or proudest tale
Recorded on it!" —BERNARD BARTON.

• This anecdote was related by the Rev. Dr. Waugh, at the last dinner of the Scottish Corporation.—Ed.

It is to be lamented that, by the excess of praise, which gives distaste, we feel disinclined to give even the share of merit to which they are justly entitled. Let moderation in this, as in other matters, be exercised; and then, when we walk through our churchyards and cathedrals, instead of the disgust now generally excited by the empty effusions of lettered marble, we shall behold them with due solemnity and respect, and be able fully to enter into the feelings of Addison, when he wrote his admirable 'Reflections in Westminster Abbey,' which may be found in the Spectator.

I am, Sir, your's truly,

The Family Trunk,

No. III.

BY MOSES VON MUCKLEWIT, GENT.

SUPERSTITIOUS TRIALS.

WHEN, about three years ago, the subject of Trial by Battle underwent so much discussion, I was more than once on the eve of communicating to the world some of the curious information which my father had collected on this point. A good deal, however, of what my legacy comprised on this subject, has since transpired, from other sources; and the subject itself has, besides, lost all that interest which it derived from the temporary occurrences, that caused its public investigation at the time I have mentioned. For these reasons, I shall not here enter into any particular examination of this antiquated mode of determining guilt or innocence, but intend to devote this paper to a general view only of those trials, which were common to the ages of barbarism and superstition, and among which the trial by battle held a distinguished place. And, in doing this, I shall only so far avail myself of the assistance of my FAMILY TRUNK, as to select from it the materials of this lucubration, which, in all other respects, I desire may be regarded as the bona fide composition of me, MOSES VON MUCKLEWIT.

These superstitious trials, or, as they were anciently called, the judgments of God, were chiefly of two sorts: 1. Trial by battle; 2. Trial by ordeal. The latter consisted again of three subdivisions: ordeal of hot iron—ordeal of hot water—and ordeal of cold water. There were, likewise, some subordinate modes of trial, as the judgment of the cross, and the judgment by Scripture, similar to the Sortes Virgiliae, practised in this country within the last two centuries; but the last-mentioned custom had no reference to criminal matters.

Various opinions have been expressed at different times as to the origin of the trial by battle, but all writers are agreed as to its antiquity. And, as has been remarked with respect to the English constitution, this usage may also be said to have had its birth in the woods of Germany. It appears, indeed, to have been the most usual mode of determining controversies among the primitive northern nations. For we learn from Saxo Grammaticus and others that it was anciently common in Scandinavia; and Velleius Paterculus informs us that all those questions which were decided among the Romans by legal trial, were determined among the Germans by arms. And, upon the final subjugation by the Goths of the western portion of Europe, this barbarous custom was introduced into the conquered countries, where a passion for arms, united with the superstitious notions of the times, contributed, for several centuries, to its preservation. Thus we find in Cassiodorus, a letter from Theodoric, one of the Gothic sovereigns, exhorting some of his subjects to lay aside duelling, and to have recourse to the legal tribunals for the settlement of their disputes. This practice grew afterwards very common in Italy in the time of the Lombards, and which has been ascribed to the barbarous laws enacted in that country during the seventh century. Rotarius and the succeeding monarchs frequently enjoined single combats; and, afterwards, the French and Germans, whose laws were, in a great degree, founded on those of Lombardy, decreed on several occasions that disputes should be decided by duel. The emperor Frederic II., when he published his Sicilian Constitutions, declared, that the laws of Lombardy should be preferred in Sicily to the Roman; and, in conformity with this spirit, he provided, amongst his decrees, for the particular manner in which single combats should be conducted.

It was in France, however, that this practice appears to have found its most congenial abode, and where, nursed by the spirit of chivalry, it long maintained its ground. Montesquieu informs us that it was even countenanced by the clergy; but this must apply to those of an inferior degree only, since the popes and other dignitaries are known on many occasions to have opposed it. Thus, by a decree of the third council of Valence, held in the year 855, all persons engaged in single combat, even though under the sanction of a Court of Justice, were anathematized and excluded from Christian burial. A similar decree was also passed at the fourth council of Lateran; and there are extant Bulls of Innocent II. and Innocent IV. in 1137 and 1255, prohibiting an indulgence in this barbarous custom. The inferior orders of clergy were, however, to have frequently declared in its favour, and of which many instances are recorded in the history of France. Thus, when Louis IX. published an edict, forbidding the practice, the Prior of St. Peter le Montier obstinately determined to maintain it in his own district. And it was even common among the clergy to bring their champions into the field, to contend in their name, the prevalence of which practice it was that occasioned the decree of the council of Lateran already alluded to. We are informed, too, by Selden, in his treatise, entitled the 'Duello,' that many instances of the same custom occurred also amongst the English clergy. Their brethren in France, however, appear to have been more resolute in its observance; for, in order to elude the canonical laws on this point, they were accustomed to substitute clubs and cudgels for lances and swords.

Our Henry I., among temporal monarchs, laid some of the earliest restrictions on this ancient practice; but his decrees extended only to the prohibition of trial by battle concerning property of small value. Louis VII. of France imitated his example: and he was followed by St. Louis, whose regulations, however, were confined to the royal domains. Other kings of France adopted the same course, until, about the close of the fifteenth century, when a duel was no longer regarded in that country as a judicial proceeding, but resorted to only, as now, to avenge an injury, or to determine an imaginary point of honour. In England, trial by battle, in civil matters, was finally abolished so early as the time of Henry II., by the introduction, in its stead, of the Grand Assize, a substitute which is generally ascribed to the invention of Glanville. It was reserved for our own times, however, to witness the total extinction in criminal as well as in civil matters, of this remnant of superstition and barbarism.

It may not be uninteresting to state here, that St. Drausin, who had been bishop of Soissons, was long regarded in France as the tutelary saint of duellists. It is, accordingly, observed, in some of the Breviaries of this saint, that 'all sorts of people flocked to his tomb, and that those who were under any engagement to fight implored his assistance in a more particular manner, and that such as continued a night in prayer were always wont to have the advantage in their encounter.' Nor was this superstitious usage confined only to single combatants; the shrine of St. Drausin was also frequented by military men of all degrees, and was the general resort of those adventurers, that were about to engage in the Holy Wars. We learn too, upon the authority of John of Salisbury, that Thomas à Becket made a pilgrimage to Soissons for the express purpose of ingratiating the saint on some important occasion; and the same writer adds, that 'it was a common opinion in his time, that St. Drausin rendered these men invincible, who spent the night at his tomb before they fought, inasmuch that warriors came from Burgundy and Italy to Soissons on that account.' He also relates, that the Earl of Montfort, before his combat with the Earl of Essex, spent a whole night at St. Drausin's shrine.

I shall conclude this paper with a brief account of the manner in which the trial by battle was formerly conducted in France, as it is described in a work, published in 1713, entitled, 'Les Mœurs et Coutumes des François, dans les différens Temps de la Monarchie.'

'When the combat had been authorized by the sentence of the Court, the judge appointed a day for it. If the combatants were to fight on foot, they had only a sword and shield; if on horseback, they were armed cap-a-pée. The arms were carried by the judge with the sound of files and trumpets, and afterwards received in the middle of the field the priest's benediction, which was bestowed with great ceremony. The champions then swore, before they approached each other, that they had no charm about them, and that they would conduct themselves as loyal and worthy knights. Their swords were afterwards girt on them, and their horses and lances brought, and a proclamation was then made by the heralds, forbidding the spectators to favour either of the combatants. The champions now gave the lie to each other several times, after which, upon the sound of trumpet, the encounter commenced; and, when they had struck as many blows as were specified in the cartel, the judge threw a wand into the air to apprise the champions that the combat was at an end. When it happened to last until night with equal success, the party accused was regarded as the victor, and his antagonist was condemned to the punishment assigned to the crime with which the other had been charged.'

The unexpected length of this paper obliges me to postpone to a future occasion, the observations I have to offer as to the other species of superstitious trials, to which I have above alluded.

ON DUELLING.

THE following letter against duelling, which was written by Joseph, late Emperor of Germany, has just found its way to the world, in a work at Leipzig, entitled, 'a Collection of unpublished Letters of Joseph II.' :—

'GENERAL.—I desire you to arrest Count K. and Captain W. immediately. The count is of an imperious character, proud of his birth, and full of false ideas of honour. Captain W., who is an old soldier, thinks of settling every thing by the sword or the pistol. He has done wrong to accept a challenge from the young count. I will not suffer the practice of duelling in my army; and I despise the arguments of those who seek to justify it. I have a high esteem for officers who expose themselves courageously to the enemy, and who, on all occasions, shew themselves intrepid, valiant and determined in attack, as well as in defence. The indifference with which they face death is honourable to themselves and useful to their country; but there are men ready to sacrifice every thing to a spirit of revenge and hatred. I despise them: such men, in my opinion, are worse than the Roman Gladiators. Let a council of war be summoned to try these two officers, with all the impartiality which I demand from every judge; and let the most culpable of the two be made an example, by the rigour of the law. I am resolved that this barbarous custom, which is worthy of the age of Tamerlane and Bajazet, and which is so often fatal to the peace of families, shall be punished and suppressed, though it should cost me half my officers. There will be still left men, who can unite bravery with the duties of faithful subjects. I wish for none who do not respect the laws of the country.'

Vienne, Aug. 1771.

JOSEPH.

SCOTTISH CUSTOMS OF THE LAST CENTURY.

MR. Barclay, in his relation of the most memorable things that passed in his father's house, from the beginning of the century to the year 14, in which his father died, says, 'My brother was married in the year 4, at the age of twenty-one; few men were unmarried after this time of life. I myself was married, by my friends, at 18, which was thought a proper age. Sir James Stuart's marriage with President Dalrymple's second daughter brought together a number of people related to both families. At the signing of the eldest Miss Dalrymple's contract, the year before, there was an entire hog-head of wine drank that night, and the number of people at Sir J. Stuart's was little less. The marriage was in the President's house, with as many of the relations as it would hold. The bride's favours were all sewn on her gown, from top to bottom, and round the neck and sleeves. The moment the ceremony was performed, the whole company ran to her, and pulled off the favours; in an instant she was stripped of them all. The next ceremony was the garter, which the bridegroom's man attempted to pull from her leg, but she dropt it on the floor; it was white and silver riband, which was cut in small morsels to every one in company. The bride's mother then came in with a basket of favours belonging to the bridegroom: those and the bride's were the same with the bearings of their families: her's pink and white, his blue and gold coloured.'

The company dined and supped together, and had a ball in the evening; the same, next day, at Sir James Stuart's. On Sunday there went from the President's house to church twenty-three couple all in high dress; Mr. Barclay, then a boy, led the youngest Miss Dalrymple, who was the last of them. They filled the galleries of the church from the King's seat to the wing loft. The feasting continued till they had gone through all the friends of the family, with a ball every night.

As the baptisms was another public place, he goes on to describe it thus:—

'On the fourth week after the lady's delivery, she was set on her bed, on a low footstool, the bed covered with some neat piece of sowed work or white satin, with three pillows at her back, covered with the same, she in full dress, with a lappit head-dress, and a fan in her hand. Having informed her acquaintance what day she is to see company, they all come and pay their respects to her, standing or walking a little through the room, for there are no chairs; they drink a glass of wine and eat a piece of cake, and then give place to others. Towards the end of the week all the friends were asked to what was called the Commerfealls: this was a supper where every gentleman brought a pint of wine to be drank by him and his wife. The supper was,—a ham at the head, and a pyramid of fowls at the bottom, hens and ducks below, partridges at top: there was an eating posset in the middle of the table, with dried fruits and sweetmeats at the sides. When they had finished their supper, the meat was removed, and in an instant every one flies to the sweetmeats to pocket them, on which a scramble ensued, chairs overturned, and every thing on the table, wrestling and pulling at one another with the utmost noise and violence. When all was quiet, they went to the stoups, (for there were no bottles for the wine) of which the women had a good share: for, though it was a disgrace to be seen drunk, yet it was none to be a little intoxicated in good company. A few days after this, the same company were asked to the christening, which was always in the church, all in high dress, a number of them young ladies, who were called maiden cimmers; one of them presented the child to the father. After the ceremony, they dined and supped together, and the night often concluded by a ball.

Original Poetry.

SONG FROM THE GAELIC.

CHORUS.

SWEET the rising mountains red with heather belles;
Sweet the bubbling fountains and the dewy
dais;

Sweet the snowy blossom of the thorny tree;
Sweeter is young Mary of Glensmole to me.

Sweet, O sweet! with Mary o'er the wilds to stray,
When Glensmole is dress'd in all the pride of May,—

And, when weary roving through the greenwood glade,
Softly to recline beneath the birken shade.

Sweet the naing mountains, ah.

There to fix my gaze in raptures of delight,
On her eyes of truth, of love, of life, and light—
On her bosom, purer than the silver tide,
Fairer than the caana on the mountain side.

Sweet the rising mountains, ah.

What were all the splendour of the proud and great
To the simple pleasures of our green retreat?

From the crystal spring fresh vigour we inhale;
Rosy health does court us on the mountain gale:
Sweet the rising mountains, ah.

Were I offered all the wealth that Albion yields,
All her lofty mountains and her fruitful fields,
With the countless riches of her subject seas,
I would scorn the change for biases such as these.

Sweet the rosy mountains, ah.

(The Reply to WILFORD.—Literary Chronicle,
p. 110.)

Your letter arriv'd in the Literary Chronicle,
And Polly declares you're a quiz and ironical;
But Polly is cross'd in her passion as usual,
For aunt Debby's declaring her sweetheart's refusal;

As for father, he's well, and out shooting the grouse;

And for mother, she's darning the hose in the house;

Old uncle still lame and asleep in the corner
O'erwearied by toil, but as happy as Horner;
And I, ———, like a bird in a desolate nest,
Live without you, dear Wilford! in dutiful rest.
You have strange girls in London, and dandies
no doubt,

Who are lash'd by your satire when ferretted out,

And deserv'ing the lashes of all of their kind,
When adorning their body, neglecting their mind;

But e'en at this distance, though foggy and
dear,

Nature's odd ones come hopping and rope-danc- ing here,

Though the hops are in Kent and the ropes in our stable,

And, like Hop with their anchor, extended in cable,

We've a curious old lady and daughters come down

To the doctors for health, from a nook of your town;

They have caused such commotion, diversion,
and joke,

All the heads of the parish are under their yoke;
They have asses for riding, have clogs for the dew,

Dress thrice in the day, and take breakfast at two;

And to give their coarse manners the air of genteel,

They gabble bad French while partaking each meal;

E'en the footman's instructed the meaning of bread,

Though to spell his own name has ne'er entered his head;

And he calls it due pain, while they echo due
pain;

Till his thoughts are suspended like felons who hang.

O the dipping at church! O the dealing of cards!
Though they never baptize, or deal generous rewards;

And the kissing of babies—the outward esteem—

The neglect of the poor—which is fashion, they deem;

And their greatness is never more finely display'd,

Than when they refuse the starv'd peasant their aid.

They are flirting all day,—they are dancing all night,

With their bounces, like steps, to the mansion's fair height,—

The crimp'd jackets behind, like the eaves of a barn,

Fancy's knockers to beauty and ugliness too;
Black ribbons cross'd over the ankle, to warn
The fool not to trust to the Frenchified shawl;

And the sky-lights where eyes are not tar'd for a look,

Unless Ma's aged envy sweet looking rebuke.
Once a fortnight there's preaching—and such are the views

Of the people who go then,—'tis merely for news;

Not the 'Gospel's glad tidings,' but news of the day,

To know if the King and the Queen are at bay—
Or, what will they do!—Or, what's next to be done?

Will their quarrels turn out, like our quarrels,
in fun?

Lover's journeys, in meeting, says Shakespeare,
will end,

So Wilford, farewell! till next letter you send.

BRITISH GALLERY.—No. II.

'Whence art by practice to perfection soars.'
Mason's Translation of Du Fresnoy.

WE continue our notice of the British Gallery by a few observations on some of its most striking pictures. We commence with those contained in the north division of the exhibition.—Of these, the most attractive, from its novelty of idea, magnificence of conception, and splendour of execution, is J. Martin's picture of Belshazzar's Feast, No. 72. It was certainly the first time in our lives that we ever felt disposed to quarrel with genius of any kind; but we could not refrain from feeling a little chagrin at the difficulty which we found in obtaining a view of this painting in a proper light, and at a desirable distance. The concourse of amateurs, by which it was closely encircled, almost made it an impossibility to catch a glimpse of this performance, unless it were absolutely 'à quatre occhi.' Such an opportunity, however, did occur, and it was not without feelings of great pleasure, that we beheld a performance so highly creditable both to the talents of the artist, the research and reading of the costumist, and we think we may add, the feelings of the poet; for a similar imaginative power must have been at work in that soul which could conceive and combine the images of sublimity and beauty, of description and of narration, which this work presents to the attention of the spectator. The idea of the heaven-traced characters being portrayed in lines of flames, and (instead of being confined to one small circle, and dimmed by the lustre of royal magnificence,) of each sublime denunciation being girded by a ring of living fire, and stretched along the whole extent of the court of Belus, and from thence pouring forth a stream of celestial terrific splendour, such as to blast the madness of the impious rites below,—is a conception, though so perfectly original, yet so grand and natural, as to force us rather to wonder that it should never have suggested itself before, than to stop at the admiration which we feel at the genius and talent which has at length embraced it, and adorned its execution by the utmost glow of imagination and the warmest perfection of skill.

The superb union of the Jewish, the Egyptian, and the Indian styles of architecture, warranted, as it is in this instance, by the most authentic inferences, that of the most indisputable history, has been made use of by Mr. Martin in a way which reflects the greatest lustre on his taste, at the same time that it takes nothing away from the promise of his judgment.

The gigantic sublimity of those mighty halls, or rather open courts, in which it is known that the princely magnificence and ostentatious superposition of Babylon delighted; the long, colossal, and ponderous, yet grand and awe-inspiring arcades, leading to other halls of equal splendour, and afterwards continued till they are lost in the infinitude of distance, are objects which astonish and bewilder the mind accustomed to dwell upon the graceful elegancies of European architecture, and unprepared to scan the appalling and super-human amplitude of Eastern gorgeousness; and all these have been brought forward by the artist in his representation of that pride-humbling dispensation by which all these have now been swept away, with the vast empire they adorned, like a mighty vessel sunk beneath the waves, overwhelmed by the very element which had seen the beautiful sublimity of his majestic course, and which had pealed to the thunders of its triumphant arms, sunk in the fathomless abyss without a warning, without a struggle, without a vestige remaining of its existence.

The sight, too, of a mighty multitude, the beauty, the majesty, the defences of a victorious dynasty, such as this picture presents to us, is at any time an imposing spectacle; more especially at a moment when we reflect that, of all the hearts now bounding with animation or thrilling with suspense, a few short hours, and every one will be still, burst in the agonies of blasted patriotism or pierced in the cruelty of triumphant hatred.

Such are the objects which Mr. Martin has combined in the delineation of this stupendous visitation; need we say how well?—The length at which we have already dwelt on this work will say it for us. We will mention one other episode, by which the artist has improved his poetic conception, and we have done; we will then offer a few remarks on the execution and technical skill in which he has embodied the offspring of his imagination. Amid the lurid clouds and forked lightnings which accompany the irrefragable warning of Heaven,—

‘Still over head, the Moon, regardless of the stir of this low world, Holds on her heavenly way.’

This beautiful circumstance is finely introduced, and forms a delightful contrast to the scene of confusion and terror which is enacting below.

The execution of this splendid picture is in general worthy of the subject: it is gorgeous, magnificent, and sublime; the brilliancy of gold and silver, the polish of the red marble, so common in eastern edifices, are worked up with a beauty which cannot but strike every beholder, and with a richness, yet softness of colouring, which is only exceeded by the knowledge of perspective and the exquisite management of the lights and shadows. The atmosphere, rich with the splendid influence of princely magnificence, forms a fine and appropriate medium for the back-ground, which represents the hanging gardens and the mighty tower of Belus, seen as it is indistinctly through the darkness of night and the misty glare of the illuminated walks, and frowning in gigantic uncertainty upon the scene of luxury beneath:—

‘That sacred pile, so vast, so high, That whether ’tis a part of earth or sky Uncertain seems, and may be thought a proud Aspiring mountain or descending cloud.’

We could have wished that the cedars upon the hanging gardens had been marked by a more sombre and natural appearance; and we cannot but remark that the attitudes of the figures have, in general, too much of the theatrical cast; to which we might add, that the inspired interpreter of Heaven loses considerably in point of character and solemnity, by being curtailed in his fair proportion of height.

Upon the whole, we trust that this picture will not be the last or best with which Mr. Martin means to aggrandise his art; that this, however, we are certain, that it is a work which never will disgrace him, even if he should arrive at the highest pinnacle of his profession.

From the length to which we have unintentionally been drawn by the peculiar novelty which characterizes this painting, we are compelled to waive all further remarks on this exhibition till a future opportunity. W. H. PARRY.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—We have, of late years, been doomed to witness so many dull and heavy productions brought forward under the name of tragedies, that the mere announcement of a new one excites rather painful than pleasurable emotions. It was with some portion of this feeling that we went to ‘Old Drury’ on Wednesday night, to witness the first performance of Conscience, or the Bridal Night; but we were most agreeably disappointed, when we found it to be one of the purest and most classical tragedies that has been produced for many years, and one that surpasses the general offspring of the tragic muse of late, as much ‘as the rapidity of instinct outstrips the tardiness of instruction.’ The scene of the tragedy, which is purely of a domestic nature, is laid at Venice; and the plot, which possesses much originality, is very skilfully managed.

The hero of the piece, Lorenzo (Mr. Wallack), the last of a noble house, is dispossessed of his estate by the arts of his guardian, the uncle of Elmira (Mrs. West), to whom he is much attached. The guardian dies, leaving the whole of his ill-gotten wealth to Orsino (Mr. Cooper), Elmira’s father, who, from the situation in which he stands, conceives the most deadly hate for Lorenzo, his late brother’s ward, and promises his daughter, who had been plighted to Lorenzo in marriage, to another. Elmira, on hearing the determination of her father, is driven to despair, and quits his house, marries Lorenzo, and returns to ask forgiveness of her father. Orsino refuses to forgive her, except on the condition that she leaves her husband, a proposition which she rejects, and joins Lorenzo; who is obliged to fly the city to escape the pursuit of his numerous creditors, the consequence of profligate habits fostered by Alfiero (Mr. Bromley), an unprincipled tutor. The fugitives are accompanied in their flight by Julio (Mr. Barnard), a faithful friend. They are beset by a gang of banditti, against whom they make a desperate resistance, until the swords of the bandits are arrested by their leader, who is recognized by Lorenzo as his depraved tutor, Alfiero. At this moment, a party of soldiers arrive, and take the whole gang prisoners. Alfiero charges Lorenzo to save his life, and the lives of his associates, by interceding with the senate, and threatens, if he fail to do so, to make a disclosure affecting his life and honour. Lorenzo had, it appears, in an unguarded moment, consented to the proposition of Antonio, to poison his unprincipled guardian. Lorenzo's attempted intercession fails, and Alfiero, to save his own life, discloses his secret to Orsino, who, for the purpose of revenge on Lorenzo, obtains the respite of the bandits. Orsino and Alfiero go to seize on Lorenzo, who finds means to secure them, in consequence of which he is charged of murdering the former, and even Elmira is accused of being an accessory. Lorenzo can bear no more, he hastens to vindicate his wife by the acknowledgment of his own guilt, and determined that when his 'shame begins, the world shall end.'—takes poison; his wife dying before him, broken-hearted, on hearing of his guilt.

No tragedy was ever more independent of stage effect than this; there were no clap-traps, no artificial appeals, but the story developed itself naturally and smoothly. The malignant passions have little to do in the story which portrays the softer emotions of the heart. The language is of a very superior character, and possesses much poetic merit. There were several passages which might be quoted as models of excellence, and, though we dare not trust to our memory in recording them, we cannot omit one, the force and beauty of which every one must feel. It is when Lorenzo is urged to resentment, and declares he will wait until that period,—

'When the graves are opened,
And the cold populace of buried nations
Stalk to the general doom.'

In another passage, where the despoison of the grave, over successful ambition in every walk of life, is illustrated, there is a faithful appropriation of metaphor and a tone of philosophy worthy of our best dramatists. Mr. Wallack, in Lorenzo, was very successful; but Elmira, one of the finest drawn characters we ever witnessed, was very unequally sustained by Mrs. West. Mr. Cooper undertook the character of Orsino against his wish, as old characters are not his forte. The tragedy was completely successful, and that too under every disadvantage. For justice was not done to the author in the performance; and the manner in which it has been got up is disgraceful to the managers of the theatre.

There was not a single new scene, nor a new article of costume in the piece. The tragedy is the first production of Mr. James Haines, a gentleman whose name, though hitherto little known in the literary world, cannot longer remain in obscurity, after the proof he has given of possessing such splendid talents. The prologue was spoken by Mr. Cooper, and the epilogue by Mrs. Edwin.

COVENT GARDEN.—On Tuesday night, Beaumont and Fletcher's excellent comedy of The Chances was performed at this theatre, in an operatic form, under the title of Don John, or The Two Violettas. The success which has attended similar alterations of The Twelfth Night, and The Comedy of Errors, and the consciousness that the company is stronger in opera than in comedy, have, no doubt, induced the managers to revive this old play in its present shape. The principal attraction of the evening was the appearance of Miss Halland, as the first Violetta, and, we are happy to say, she met with a most flattering reception. Destitute of the charms of a fine face or person, the deportment of the fair debutante was not ungraceful. She possesses a fine voice, and a correctness of ear rarely witnessed in one whose talents are yet imperfectly developed, and whose musical education is yet incomplete. Although she was extremely embarrassed in her first two songs, yet she displayed such gleams of skill and power in their execution, as decided, even thus early, her success. Her third song was Shield's favourite air of 'The Maid of Lodi,' arranged for her by Mr. Ware, and which she gave with great success. She sang two duets with Miss Stephens, both in excellent style; and gave such proofs of musical talents, as to place her in a high rank among English singers. Miss Stephens, in the second Violetta, displayed her accustomed supremacy. A song introduced from the beautiful French opera of Chaperon Rouge, she sang in a most enchanting style, as she did a bravura of more difficult execution. Mr. C. Kemble's Don John is one of his best performances in that line, in which he is so excellent, gay and genteel comedy. The other characters were well sustained. The music is partly selected and partly original, or rather adaptations from the Italian operas, by Bishop and Ware, but does not possess much merit. The drama is got up with the utmost taste and splendour of scenery, and it was completely successful, though not to the extent the following disgraceful puff in the play-bill would have us believe. Drury Lane does pretty well in puffing, but this really out-herods Herod, and deserves the severest reprobation. Ecce signum: 'Don John, or the two Violettas,' was received throughout with roars of laughter and shouts of applause—and the acting of Mr. C. Kemble, Mr. Liston, Mr. Jones, Mr. Abbott, &c. &c., was hardly surpassed even in the days of GARRICK.—The music absolutely enchanted and electrified the audience (almost every piece being encored); and whilst Miss Stephens, in the second Violetta, so exceeded all her former successful efforts as to add another laurel even to her high reputation. Miss Halland, in the first Violetta, made as TRIUMPHANT A DEBUT, as ever was made by any singer on the English stage!

A new farce was produced at this theatre on Friday night, entitled A Figure of Fun, but the audience saw no fun in it, and very unceremoniously damned it the first night.

SURREY THEATRE.—Mr. Dibdin's new melo-drama of Kenilworth improves on acquaintance. Some of the scenes have been shortened, and the actors have become more intimately acquainted with their parts, which the rapidity of Mr. D.'s motions allows them little time to study. It attracts fashionable audiences every night, and promises a long and successful career.

Literature and Science.

Diminution of the Sun.—Baron Lindeneau, who recently published some observations respecting the diminution of the solar mass, says, 'that the sun may be imperceptibly subject to successive diminution, since the science of astronomy has been cultivated. Baron Lindeneau supposes the sun's diameter to be 800,000 miles, 4,204,000,000 feet, or nearly 2000 seconds. We have not,' he observes, 'hitherto possessed any instrument for measuring the diameter of heavenly bodies to a second.'

The sun may, therefore, diminish 12,000 of its diameter, or 2,102,000 feet, without the possibility of its being perceived. Supposing the sun to diminish daily, two feet, it would require three thousand years to render the diminution of a second of its diameter visible.

New Comet.—Signor Pons, astronomer to the Duchess of Lucca, discovered, on the 21st of last month, between six and seven at night, in the constellation Pegasus, a new comet, of a very extraordinary nature. It appears like a white spot, not thick nor of a kernal form, and with a very small tail. On the 22d Signor Pons continued his observations, and perceived that the comet had not changed its position, but that its tail was becoming visible, and that its light had acquired greater intensity. He thence concluded that this comet will rapidly become more luminous, and to such a degree as to be visible to the naked eye. Astronomers have fixed its right ascension at 0° 30', and its northern declination at 18°, between the stars of the sixth magnitude, X and γ of Pegasus.

Antidote to Inebriety.—Dr. Petier, a German physician, states that he has found the spirit of hartshorn, in the dose of a small tea-spoonful in a glass of water, to encounter the inebriating effects of strong fermented liquors and spirits; and in an hour or two to recover a person from an apparently lifeless state, through excess of wine.

Mr. Kemble's library.—The sale of Mr. Kemble's library, at Evans's, produced about 3000l. This is independent of the valuable collection of plays, which had been previously sold to the Duke of Devonshire, for 2000l. The sale excited little interest with the Bibliomaniacs; there were, however, a few rare articles, and these called forth all the spirit and enthusiasm of the collectors. 'Syr Degore,' a poetical romance of great rarity, consisting of eighteen leaves, and printed by Wynkyn de Worde, produced 36l. 10s. 'Here begynneth a lyttal Treatyse of the byrth and prophcey of Martin,' a poem, printed by Wynkyn de Worde, 25 guineas and a half. 'Chaucer's Canterbury Tales,' a MS. of the 14th or 15th century, 20 guineas and a half. A collection of Drury Lane and Covent Garden Play-bills, from the year 1751 to the present time. The early volumes contain some curious MS. notes by Mr. Kemble, many relating to Garrick, from the unpublished diary of Hopkins the prompter, the father of Mrs. Kemble: this collection was purchased, by Sir Gregory Page Turner, for 180 guineas. A collection of early printed Spanish comedies were sold to Mr. Heber for 35 guineas. Shakespeare's comedies, histories, and tragedies, first edition, inlaid throughout, were bought, by Mr. Boswell, at the immense sum of 107 guineas, although it was not a very superb copy.

The Bee.

*'Floriferis ut apes in saltibus omnia limant,
Omnia nos itidem depascitur aurea dicta.'*

LUCRETIUS.

Mr. Sheridan to his First Wife.—The following lines are the genuine production of the lamented Sheridan. They were addressed to his first lady, then Miss Linley, shortly before their union:—

'Mark'd you her eyes of heav'nly blue,
Mark'd you her cheek of rosy hue!
Tost eye in liquid circles moving,
That cheek ablask'd at man's approving;
Tone, like an arrow darting round,
The other, blushing at the wound.'

Havoc of War.—The total number of men that belonged to the 42d or Highland regiment, from the year 1797 to 1816, was 13,127. There were, in 1816, only three men living in the corps that fought against Bonaparte in Egypt.

Epiaph, on a Gentleman whose Name was Hatt.
By Death's impartial scythe was mown
Poor Hatt—he lies beneath this stone;
On him misfortune oft did frown;
Yet Hatt ne'er wanted for a crown;
When many years of constant wear
Had made his bearer somewhat bare,
Death saw, and pitying his mishap,
Has given him here a good long nap.

City Worthies.

Late to the worthy Drapers' dinner came
A non-descript, in whom no hurt is;
None could explain its origin or name,
Than, '—What a food-devouring Cur-'tis it!
A Sheriff wanted to obtain his seat,
And at the other's poil was straight, man;
But he had grown so heavy with his treat,
The city mentors chose him York's Wright-ma.

SUCH IS THE WORLD. A Novel, in Three Vols. 12mo.

'I hold the world but as the world, Gratiano, A stage where every man must play his part.'

Merchant of Venice.

'The characters in this novel, which embrace "all ranks and degrees of men," from a duke down to the hostler of an inn, are drawn with a fidelity and correctness, which none but a person who has mixed much in the world could have sketched. Another merit this novel possesses, in which we should be happy to see every work of the kind resemble it; we mean, that of having a good moral tendency. There are no coarse ribaldries, no indecent allusions—no double entendres, to raise a blush and the cheek of youthful innocence. Virtue and vice are so faithfully portrayed, that we don't fear our juvenile friends choosing the former for the model of their future conduct in life.'

Review of New Books.

Metrical Legends of Exalted Characters. By Joanna Baillie, Author of Plays on the Passions, &c. 8vo. pp. 373. London, 1821.

This volume was published on Tuesday last; and, in respect to the esteemed author, and duty to our readers, we lose no time in making them acquainted with its contents. Few writers of the present day, either male or female, have obtained a higher reputation than Joanna Baillie, and none more deservedly. In this respect criticism has been unanimous, and the notices of her previous productions have been nothing but eulogies. Public opinion has long been with her, and, if we may credit the report, the publishers of this volume must have calculated very largely on it, when they purchased it at the enormous sum of £1000, which, we suppose, is at the rate of about half a crown for each line in the volume. This is certainly the golden age for poets. What would Milton say, could he rise and see a modern bard get as much for one hundred lines as he got for the whole twelve books of his immortal poem, the Paradise Lost; or would Dryden, in the present day, have thrown in his Epistle to his Cousin, and the celebrated music ode, as make-weights to the avarice of a Tossion; and yet it is no libel to say, that these productions of Milton and Dryden will live when many of the effusions of our liberally-rewarded poets are forgotten.

The 'Metrical Legends' are three in number: William Wallace, Columbus, and Lady Griseld Baillie. The term metrical legends is not here used as denoting fictitious stories, but as chronicles or memorials of exalted characters, describing such scenes as truly belong to the story, 'with occasionally the feelings, figures, and gestures of those whose actions they relate, and also assigning their motives of action, as they may naturally be supposed to have existed.' The object of the author, we are further told, has been 'to display such portraits of real worth and noble heroism, as might awaken high and generous feelings in a youthful mind, without imputing to the heroes 'motives or sentiments beyond what their noble deeds do fairly warrant.' In short, the aim has been to produce 'sentimental and descriptive memorials of exalted worth. The manner of the rhyme and the versification are accordingly, in some degree, borrowed from Sir Walter Scott. Our author is, however, no servile copyist, and, in every other respect, these legends have every claim to originality.

The first legend, 'Wallace,' is founded on a story rendered familiar to every reader. The incidents in the events of the Scottish hero, are faithfully narrated in this poem, which is remarkable for its beauty and simplicity. The third stanza thus describes Scotland, under the iron yoke of our Edward:—

'Scotland, with breast unmail'd, had sheath'd her sword,

Stiffing each rising curse and hopeless prayer,
And sunk beneath the Southern's faithless lord,
In sullen deep despair.

The holds and castles of the land
Were by her hateful foemen mann'd.
To revels in each stately hall,
Did tongues of foreign accent call,
Where her quell'd chiefs must tamely bear
From braggard pride the taunting jeer.
Her harvest fields, by strangers reapt,
Were in the stranger's garner heap'd.

The tenant of the poorest cot,
Seeing the spoiler from his door
Bear unreprov'd his hard-earned store,
Blush'd thus to be, and be a Scot.
The very infant at his mother's beck,
Tho' with with'd lip and scowling eye,
Was taught to keep his hapless tongue in check,

Nor curse the Southern passing by.'

The slaughter of the Scottish leaders at the Barns of Ayr, Wallace's revenge of the treachery, the gathering of his friends, and the battle that ensued, are all powerfully described. We quote a few passages from the latter:—

'Now with notes of practis'd skill,
English trumpets sounding shrill,
The battle's hostful prelude gives,
Which answer prompt and bold receive
From Scottish drum a long rolling beat,
And,—sound to valiant chieftains sweet!—

The Highland pipe, whose lengthen'd swell
Of warlike pibroch, rose and fell,
Like wailings of the midnight wind,
With voice of distant streams combin'd,
While mountain, rock, and dell, the martial din repeat.

Then many a high plumed gallant rear'd his head,

And proudly smote the ground with firmer tread,

Who did, ere close of ev'ning, lie
With ghastly face turn'd to the sky,
No more again the roars of war to hear.

And many for the combat burn'd,
Who never from his broil return'd,
Kindred or home to cheer.

How short the term that shall divide
The firm nerv'd youths' exalted force,—

The warrior glowing in his pride,
From the cold stuffen'd come!

A little term pass'd with such speed,
As would in courtly revel scarce suffice
Mated with lady fair, in silken guise,
The measure'd dance to lead.

His warriors arm as living rock,
Now braced them for the battle's shock;
And waching their chieftain's keen looks glancing

From marshall'd clans to foes advancing;
Smiled with the smile his eye that lighten'd,
Glow'd with the glow his brow that brighten'd:

But when his burnish'd brand he drew,
His towering form terrific grew,
And every Scotchman, at the sight,
Felt thro' his nerves a giant's might,
And drew his patriot sword with Wallace's might.

'Then rush'd they fiercely on their foes,
And loud o'er drum and warpipe rose

The battle's mingled roar.

The eager shout, the weapon's clash;
The adverse hum's first closing crash,
The sullen hum of striving life,
The busy beat of tramping strife,
From castle, rocks, and mountains round,
Down the long firth, a grand and awful sound,

A thousand echoes bore.
Spears cross'd spears, a bending grove,

As front to front the warriors strove.

Thro' the dust-clouds, rising dun,
Their burning brands flash'd to the sun,

With quickly changing sh'ring lights,
Like streamers on the northern night;

While arrow shower came hussling past,
Like splinter'd wreck driven by the blast,

What time fierce winter is contending,
With Norway's pines, their branches rending.

'Opposing ranks, that onward bore,
In tumult mix'd, are ranks no more,

Nor aught discern'd of skill or form;—
All a wild bick'ring steely storm.

While oft around some fav'rite Chieftain's crest,
The turmoil thick'ning, darkly rose,
As on rough seas the billow grows,
O'er lesser waves high-heaved, but soon depressed.

So gallant Grame, thou noble Scot!
Around thee rose the fearful fray,
And other brave compeers of bold essay,
Who did not spare their mothers' sons that day,
'And ne'er shall be forgot.

But there the mighty Wallace fought,
Like spirit quick, like giant strong,
Plunging the foe's thick ranks among,
Wide room in little time was brew'd;
And grisly sights around were strew'd;
Recoll'd aglance the helmet throng,
And every hostile thing to earth was brought.
Full strong and hardy was the foe
To whom he gave a second blow,
Many a knight and lord
Fell victims to his sword,
And Crossingham's proud crest laid low.

The fate of Wallace, so unworthy his high deserts, and the fond recollections with which his countrymen cherish his memory, are pathetically described:—

'What tho' that head o'er gate or tower,
Like feline on the cursed tree,
Visited by sun and shower
A ghastly spectacle may be!
A fair renown, as years wear on,
Shall Scotland give her noblest son.
The course of ages shall not dim
The love that she shall bear to him.
In many a castle, town, and plain,
Mountain and forest, still remain
Fondly cherish'd spots, which claim
The proud distinction of his honour'd name.

Swells the huge ruin's many heap
In castle court, 'tis Wallace's keep.
What stateliest o'er the rest may tower
Of time-worn wall, where rock and dawe,
With wheeling flight and ceaseless saw,
Keep busy stir, is Wallace's tower;
If thro' the green wood's hanging screen,
High o'er the deeply-bedded wave,
The mouth of arching cleft is seen
Yawning dark, 'tis Wallace's cave.
If o'er its jutting barrier grey,
Tinted by time with furious din,
The rude crags silvered with its spray,
Shoot the wild rook, 'tis Wallace's lin.
And many a wall remains, and hill and glen Haunted, 'tis said, of old, by Wallace and his men.

There school-boy still doth haunt the sacred ground,

And musing oft its pleasing influence own,
As, starting at his footsteps' echo'd sound,
He feels himself alone.

Yea, ev'n the cottage matron at her wheel,
Altho' with daily care and labour cros'd,
Will o'er her heart the soothing magic feel
Of her country's ancient prowess boast;
While on the little shelf of treasured books,
For what can most of all her soul delight,
Beyond her ballad, tale, or jest, she looks—
The history renown'd of Wallace wight.

But chiefly to the soldier's breast,
A thought of him will kindling come,
As, waving high his bonnet's crest,
He listens to the rolling drum,
And trumpet's call and thrilling file,
And bagpipe's loud and stormy strain,

Meet prelude to tumultuous strife
On the embattled plain.
Whether in highland garb array'd,
With kiltie short and highland plaid,
Or button'd close in lowland vest,
Within his doughty grasp, broad sword or gun be prest,—

Remembering him, he still maintains
His country's cause on foreign plains,
To grace her name and earn her praise,
Led by the brave of modern days.

After an apostrophe to those modern heroes, Abercrombie, Moore, Ferguson, and Graham, the poem concludes with the following eulogy on its hero:—

'O Scotland, proud may be thy boast!
Since time his course thro' circling years hath run,

There hath not shone in Fame's bright host,
A nobler hero than thy patriot son.

Manly and most devoted was the love,
With which for thee unwearied he strove;
No selfish lust of power, not ev'n of fame,
Gave ardour to the pure and generous flame.

Rapid in action, terrible in fight,
In counsel wise, inflexible in right,
Was he, who did so oft, in olden days,
Thy humbled head from base oppression raise.
Then be it by thy generous spirit known,
Ready in freedom's cause to bleed,
Spurning corruption's worthless meed,
That in thy heart thou feel'st this hero was thine own.

The hero of the second legend is Columbus, whom the author justly describes as one 'who, to the unfettered reach of thought belonging to a philosopher, the sagacious intrepidity of a chieftain or leader, and the adventurous boldness of a discoverer, added the gentleness and humanity of a Christian.'

The most prominent incidents, in the life of Columbus, furnish ample scope for the powers of our author; and the adventurous project—the voyage—the dissatisfaction of the crew—the discovery of America—the intercourse with the natives—Columbus foretelling the eclipse—his return home, and the ingratitude of his country, are all deli-neated with the pencil of a master:—

'Who that hath high deeds achieved,
Whose mind hath mighty plans conceiv'd,
Can of learned ignorance and pride
The petty vexing rule abide?
The lion trampled by an ass!
No; this all-school'd forbearance would surpass.
Insulted with a felon's chain,
This noble man must cross the main,
And answer his foul charge to cold ungrateful Spain.

By India's gentle race alone,
Was pity to his sufferings shown:—

They on his parting wait,
And looks of kindness on him cast,
Or touch'd his mantle as he past,
And mourn'd his altered state.
May the great spirit smooth the tide
With gentle gales, and be thy guide;
And when his vessel wore from land,
With meaning nods and gestures kind,
He saw them still upon the strand,
Tossing their dark arms on the wind.

He saw them like a helpless flock,
Who soon must bear the cruel shock
Of savage wolves; yet, reckless still,
Fell but the pain of present ill.
He saw the fate he could not now control,
And groan'd in bitter agony of soul.

The last return to Europe of this intrepid navigator, his death, and the reflections on his tomb, are finely described:—

'At length, by way-ward fortune cros'd,
And oft-renew'd and irksome strife
Of sordid men,—by tempests tost,
And thr'd with turmoil of a wand'rer's life,
He sail'd again for Europe's ancient shore—
So will'd high heav'n to cross the seas no more.
His anchor fix'd, his sails for ever fur'd,—
A toil-worn pilgrim in a weary world.

And thus the hero's sun went down,
Closing his day of bright renown:
Eight times thro' breeze and storm he past,
O'er surge and wave th' Atlantic vast;
And left on many an island fair,
Foundations, which the after-care
Of meaner chieftains shortly rear'd
To seats of power—envy'd, envy'd, fear'd.
No kindly conqueror, since time began
The long career of ages, hath to man
A scope so ample given for trade's bold range,
Or caus'd on earth's wide stage such rapid mighty change.

The reflections on the tomb of Columbus close this beautiful poem:—

'Silence solemn, awful, deep,
Doth in that hall of death her empire keep;
Save when at times the hollow pavement,
smote
By solitary wand'rer's foot, again
From lofty dome and arch and aisle remote,
A circling loud response receives again.
The stranger starts to hear the growing sound,
And sees the blazon'd trophies waving near—"Ha! tread my feet so near that sacred ground!"
He stops and bows his head: "Columbus resteth here!"

Some ardent youth, perhaps, ere from his home
He launch his vent'rous bark, will hither come,
Read fondly o'er his and his graven name,—
With feelings keenly touch'd—with heart of flame;

Till wrapp'd in fancy's wild delusive dream,
Times past and long forgotten, present seem.
To his charm'd ear the east wind rising shrill, Seems thro' the hero's shroud to whistle still—
The clock's deep pendulum, swinging thro' the blast,

Sounds like the rocking of his lofty mast;
While fitful gusts rare like his claim 'you heard,
Mix'd with the accents of his high command.
Slowly the stripping quits the passive acro,
And burns and sighs and weeps to be what he has been.

Oh! who shall lightly say that fame
Is nothing but an empty name!
Whilst in that sound there is a charm
The nerves to start, the heart to warm,
As, thinking of the mighty dead,
The young from slothful couch will start,
And vow, with lifted hands outspread,
Like them to act a noble part?

Oh! who shall lightly say that fame
Is nothing but an empty name!
When, but for those, our mighty dead,
All ages past a blank would be,

Sunk in oblivion's murky bed,—
A desert bare, a shipless sea ?
They are the distant objects seen,—
The lofty marks of what hath been.

O! who shall lightly say that fame
Is nothing but an empty name!
When mem'ry of the mighty dead
To earth-worn pilgrim's wistful eye
The brightest rays of cheering shed,
That point to immortality?

A twinkling speck but fix'd and bright,
To guide us thro' the dreary night,—
Each hero shines and lures the soul,
To gain the distant happy goal.

Far is there one who, musing o'er the grave
Where lies interr'd the good, the wise, the brave,
Can poorly think, beneath the mould'ring heap,
That noble being shall for ever sleep?
No, with the gen'rous heart, and proudly swells,—

"Tho' his cored corpse lies here, with God his spirit dwells."

The subject of the third legend is a woman, whose name is unknown in history, a Lady Griseld Baillie. Our author says, "that a more perfect female character could scarcely be imagined," and indeed, she appears to have approached that 'divine perfection of a woman,' mentioned by Shakespeare, more nearly than any one with whose history we are acquainted. An interesting account of this lady, is inserted in Mr. Rose's answer to Mr. Fox's History of James the Second, from Lady Murray's Narrative, an unpublished MS. at Edinburgh. This poem, which combines much playfulness with strong feeling, describes the virtues of this glory of her sex, and concludes with contrasting her with 'the polish'd fair of modern times,' who do not 'regard such old forgotten homely merit.'

To each of these legends, there are appended a profusion of notes; indeed, more than are necessary, for the author's poems are sufficiently intelligible, and the principal events which she details in the two first legends, sufficiently well known to render a reference to authorities unnecessary. Four ballads, entitled Lord John of the East, Malcolm's Heir, The Elden Tree, and the Ghost of Fadon, conclude the volume; they strongly remind us of some of the best of our early English ballads, and though rather longer than we should have wished for extract, yet anxious to give an entire poem, we select the last, 'the Ghost of Fadon':—

'On Gask's deserted ancient hall,
Was twilight closing fast,
And in its dismal shadowy all Seem'd lofty, void, and vast.

All sound of life, now reft and bare,
From its walls had pass'd away;
But the stir of small birds shelter'd there,—
Dull owl, or chattering jay.

Loop-hole and window, dimly seem,
With faint light passing through,
Grew dimmer still, and the dreary scene
Was fading from the view:

When the trampling sound of banded men
Came from the court without;
Words of debate and call, and then—
A loud and angry shout.

But mingl'd echoes from within
A mimic mock'ry made,
And the bursting door, with furious din,
On jarring hinges bray'd.

An eager band, press'd rear on van,
Rush'd in with clam'rous sound,
And their chief, the goodliest, the bravest man,
That e'er trod Scottish ground.

Then spoke forthwith the leader bold:—

"We war with wayward fate;
These walls are bare, the hearth is cold,
And all is desolate.

With fast unbroke and thirst unslak'd,
Must we on the hard ground sleep?
Or, like ghosts from vaulted charnel wak'd,
Our cheerless vigil keep?

Hard hap this day, in bloody field,
Ye bravely have sustain'd,
And for your pains this dismal bield
And empty board have gain'd;

Hie, Malcolm, to that varlet's steed,
And search if yet remain
Some homely store, but good at need,
Spent nature to sustain.

Cheer up my friends! still, heart in hand,
Tho' few and spent we be,
We are the pith of our native land,
And she shall still be free.

Cheer up, tho' scant and coarse our meal,
In this our sad retreat,—
We'll fill our horn to Scotland's weal,
And that will make it sweet."

Then all, full cheerly as they could,
Their willing service lent;
Some broke the boughs, some heap'd the wood,
Some struck the sparkling flint.

And a fire they kindled speedily,
Where the hall's last fire had been;
And pavement, walls, and rafters high,
In the rising blaze were seen.

Red gleam on each tall buttress pour'd,
The lengthen'd hall along,
And tall and black behind them lower'd
Their shadows deep and strong.

The ceiling, ribb'd with massy oak,
From bick'ring flames below,—
As light and shadow o'er it broke,
Seem'd wavy'ring to and fro.

Their scanty meal was on the ground,
Spread by the friendly light,
And they made the brown-brown circle round,
As cheerly as they might.

Some talk of horses, weapons, mail,—
Some of their late defeat—
By treach'ry caus'd, and many a tale
Of southern spy's retreat.

"Aye, well," says one, "my sinking heart
Does some disaster bode,
When faithless Fadon's wily art
Beguil'd us on the road.

But well repaid by Providence,
Are such false deeds we see;
He's had his rightful recompense,
And cursed let him be."

"O! curse him not! I needs must rue
That stroke so rashly given;
If he to us were false or true,
Is known to righteous heaven."

So spoke their chief, then silent all
Remain'd, in sombre mood,—
Till they heard a bugle's larum call Sound distant through the wood.

"Rouse ye, my friends!" the chieftain said;
"That blast from friend or foe,
Comes from the west—thro' forest shade,
With wary caution go,

And bring me tidings. Speed ye well!"
"Forth three bold warriors past;
Then from the east with fuller swell,
Was heard the bugle blast.

Out past three warriors more; then, shrill
The horn blew from the north,
And other eager warriors still,
As banded scouts went forth.

Till from their chief each war mate good
Had to the forest gone,
And he who fear'd not flesh and blood,
Stood by the fire alone.

He stood, wrapp'd in a musing dream,
Nor rais'd his drooping head,
Till a sudden, alter'd, pale gleam
On all around was spread.

Such dull diminish'd sombre sheen
From moon eclips'd, by swain
Related, or love here is seen
O'er mantling hill and plain.

Then to the stûl fire he turn'd,
Which higher and brighter grew,
Till the flame like a baleful meteor burn'd
Of clear sulphureous blue.

Then wit the chief, some soul unblest,
Or spirit of power was near;
And his eyes adown the hall he cast,
Yet naught did there appear.

But he felt a strange unearthly breath
Upon the chill air borne;
And he heard at the gate, like a blast of wrath,
The sound of Fadon's horn.

Owls, bats, and swallows, flutt'ring out
From hole and crevice flew,
Circling the lofty roof about,
As loud and long it blew.

His noble hound sprung from his lair,
The midnight rouse to greet,
Then, like a timid trembling hare,
Couch'd at his master's feet.

Between his legs his drooping tail,
Like dog of vulgar race,
He hid, and, with strange piteous wail,
Look'd in his master's face.

The poach seem'd void, but vapour dim
Sore fill'd the lowering room,
Then was he aware of a figure grim,
Approaching thro' the gloom.

And striding so it onward came,
The vapour wore away;
Till it stood distinctly by the flame,
Like a form in the noon of day.

Well Wallace knew that form, that head,—
That throat unbarred and bare,
Mark'd deep with streaming circlet red,—
And he utter'd a rapid prayer.

But when the spectre rais'd its arm,
And brandish'd its glittering blade,
That moment broke few's chilly charms
On noble Wallace's aid.

The threaten'd combat was to him
Relief:—with weapon bare,
He rush'd upon the warrior grim,
But his sword above empty air.
Then the spectre smil'd with a ghastly grin,
And its warrior-semblance fled;
And its features grew stony, fix'd, and thin,
Like the face of the stiffen'd dead.

The head a further moment crown'd,
The body's stately wreck
Shook hideously, and to the ground
Dropt from the bolter'd neck.

Back slunk the noble chief agliss,
And longer tarried not,
But quickly to the portal past,
To shun the horrid spot.

But in the portal stiff and tall,
The apparition stood,—
And Wallace turn'd and cross'd the hall,
Where entrances to the wood,

By other door, he hoped to snatch,
Whose pent arch darkly lower'd;—
But there, like sentry on his watch,
The dreadful phantom tower'd.

Then up the ruin'd stairs so steep,
He ran, with panting breath,
And from the window—his prone leap!
Sprang to the court beneath.

O'er wall and ditch he quickly got,
Thro' broke and bushy stream;
When suddenly thro' darkness shot,
A red and lurid gleam.

He look'd behind, and that lurid light
Forth from the castle came;
Within its circuit, thro' the night,
Appear'd an elrich flame.

Red glow'd each window, slit, and door,
Like mouths of furnace hot,—
And tint of deepest blackness wore
The walls and steepy mount.

But soon it rose, with bright'ning power,
Till bush and ivy green,
And wall-flower, ringing breach and tower,
Distinctly might be seen.

Then a spreading blaze, with eddying sweep,
In spiral surges rear'd,
And then aloft, on the stately keep,
Fadon's ghost appeared.

A burning rafter, blazing bright,
It welded in its hand;
And its warrior-form of human height,
Dilated grew and grand.

Coped by a curling tawny cloud,
With tints sulphureous blent,
It rose with burst of thunder loud,
And up the welkin went.

High, high it rose, with wid'ning glare,
Sent far o'er land and main,
And shot into the lofty air,
And all was dark again.

A spell of horror lapt him round,
Chill'd, motionless, amazed,
His very pulse of life was bound
As on black night he gazed.

Till harness'd warrior's heavy tread
From echoing dell arose;
"Thank God," with utter'd voice he said,
"For here come living foes."

With kindling soul that brand he drew,
Which boldest Southron fears,
But soon the friendly call knew,
Of his gallant brave compeers.

With haste each wond'rous tale was told,
How still, in vain pursuit,
They follow'd the born thro' wood and wild,
And Wallace alone was mute.

Day rose! but silent, sad, and pale,
Stood the bravest of Scottish race;
And each warrior's heart began to quail,
When he look'd in his leader's face.

An Attempt to Analyse the Automaton Chess Player of M. De Kempelen. With an easy Method of imitating the Movements of that celebrated Figure. Illustrated by Original Drawings. To which is added, a Copious Collection of the Knight's Moves over the Chess Board. 8vo. pp. 40. London, 1821.

THIS is a very ingenious attempt to detect one of the most singular deceptions ever practised on human credulity, and which, for the last forty years, has excited the astonishment and admiration of every person who has witnessed it. Even Bonaparte, who made automata of kings and princes at his will, was foiled in an encounter with the automaton chess-player, although he was allowed to be as skillful in the game of chess as in war, that 'game at which kings delight to play.'

The author, by a reference to the engravings which he gives, first shows that the machinery within the automaton has no share in the movements, and although it is intended to be understood that the whole of the interior is first exhibited to the spectators, yet that there is sufficient room to admit the body of a man, who may with great facility direct all the motions of the automaton. He next divides automata into three classes, the simple, the compound, and the spurious. The first class comprises those inviolated automata whose movements result from mechanism alone. The second class are those which are moved by machinery, but possess, at the same time, a communication with human agency, though not immediately apparent. The third class contains those automata which, under the semblance only of mechanism, are wholly directed and controlled by a concealed human agent. To this class he assigns the automaton chess-player; for—

'However great and surprising the power of mechanism may be, the movements which spring from it are necessarily limited and uniform; it cannot usurp and exercise the faculties of mind; it cannot be made to vary its operations, so as to meet the ever varying circumstances of a game of chess. This is the province of intellect alone.'

The author next shows, that the movements of the automaton cannot be directed, (as some have thought,) by the exhibitor, who walks about the room, and is frequently at a distance from the chest, far beyond the sphere of influence. Some stress is laid on the circumstance, that the machinery is always exhibited in a quiescent state, and never in motion; indeed, it seems very doubtful whether it ever does or ever was intended to move, notwithstanding that it is regularly wound up for the occasion,—sometimes, it would seem, more frequently than is consistent with the concealment of the deception, as would appear from the following extract:—

'In all machines requiring to be wound up, two consequences are inseparable from their construction; the first is, that in winding up the machinery, the key is limited in the number of its revolutions; and the second is, that some relative proportion must be constantly maintained between the winding up and the work performed, in order to enable the machine to continue its movements. Now these results are not observable in the chess-player; for the automaton will sometimes execute sixty-three moves with only one winding up; at other times, the exhibitor has been observed to repeat the winding up after seven moves, and even three moves; and once, probably from inadvertence, without the intervention of a single move; whilst in every instance, and the circumstance, though trifling, calls for particular attention, (for in these matters, be it remembered, "trifles light as air are confirmations strong.") the key appeared to perform the same number of revolutions: evincing thereby, that the revolving axis was unconnected with machinery, except, perhaps, a ratchet-wheel and click, or some similar apparatus, to enable it to produce the necessary sounds, and consequently that the key, like that of a child's watch, might be turned whenever the purposes of the exhibition seemed to require it.'

This is pretty strong evidence that the machinery has no share in the automaton's movements; the author next proceeds to point out a method by which any person, well skilled in the game, and not exceeding the ordinary bulk of stature, may secretly animate the automaton, and successfully imitate the movements of M. De Kempelen's chess-player. Having shown that there is sufficient room in the chest, and stated the way in which the player might be introduced into it, he says,—

'In this position he will find no difficulty in executing every movement required of the automaton; his head being above the table, he will see the chess-board through the waistcoat, as easily as through a veil; and his left hand extending beyond the elbow of the figure, he will be enabled to guide its hand to any part of the board, and to take up and let go a chess-man, with no other "delicate mechanism" than a string communicating with the fingers. His right hand being within the chest, may serve to keep in motion the contrivance for producing the noise which is heard during the moves, and to perform the other tricks, of moving the head, tapping on the chest, &c.

In order to facilitate the introduction of the player's left arm into the arm of the figure, the elbow of the latter is obliged to be drawn backwards; and, to account for and conceal this strained attitude, a pipe is ingeniously placed in the automaton's hand. This pipe must not be removed till the other arrangements are completed.

When all is ready, and the pipe removed, the exhibitor may turn round the winder or key, to give the impression to the spectators of winding up a spring, or weight, and to serve as a signal to the player to set the head of the automaton in motion.

'The above process is simple, feasible, and effective; shewing, indisputably, that the phenomena may be produced without the aid of machinery, and thereby rendering it probable, that the chess-player belongs, in reality, to the third class of automata, and derives its merit solely from the very ingenious mode by which the concealment of a living agent is effected.'

The reference to the engravings in this ingenious dissertation, is so frequent and so essential for the due explanation of the principle upon which the chess-player is conducted, that we fear we have made the subject but very imperfectly intelligible; but it appeared to us sufficiently curious for a short notice, and to those who may feel a farther interest in it, we recommend this brief work, and a watchful visit to the automaton itself. The collection of the 'Knight's moves' should be seen by all chess-players.

A General History of the House of Guelph, &c. By Andrew Halliday.

(Concluded from p. 120.)

WILLIAM the Fourth, son of Ernest the Confessor, on the death of his father, in 1546, succeeded to the Duchy of Luneburg, including Celle, in the magnificent castle of which he fixed his residence. He married Dorothea, the daughter of Christian the Third of Denmark, and dying in 1593, left fifteen children; seven of them sons, of whom the following striking instance of paternal affection is related:—

On his death-bed, the prince called his sons around him, and explaining to them the fable of the bundle of sticks, he exhorted them to reign in union; and in the history of their own family, pointed out the disadvantages which had arisen from the frequent division of the country into petty sovereignties, and the impossibility of their either acquiring power or influence, or even of maintaining their hereditary dignity, unless they governed the country as one state. The advice of the aged father had a powerful effect upon his gallant sons. They agreed that the sovereign power should be vested, without restriction, in the elder brother; who, on his death, should be succeeded by the next in seniority. To prevent any future division, they bound themselves by a solemn oath, that only one should marry; and that they should leave it to the determination of chance, which of them should be that one. The lot was cast, and fell upon George, the sixth son.

On the death of William, Ernest, his eldest son, succeeded. He died in 1611, and Christian, the second brother next assumed the government. He supported the Elector, Palatine of the Rhine, who had been elected King of Bohemia, that prince who was abandoned by his father in law, our James the First. In an engagement with the Spaniards, under Gonzalves de Cordova, at Fleurus, Christian had his right arm shot off, but took the field again as soon as his wounds were healed. He died in 1626, at the age of thirty-six, leaving the government of Luneburg and the command of the army to his next brother, Augustus, who displayed much gallantry in the war. He died in 1636, and was succeeded by his next brother, Frederick, who died in 1648.

George, the sixth son, on whom the matrimonial lot had fallen, and who is the ancestor of the present royal family of England, served with the Swedish army under Gustavus Adolphus. He married Anne-Elanora, of Hesse D'Amstadt, by whom he left four sons and four daughters. By an agreement with his brothers, it was settled that the states should be divided into two duchies after their decease; that the eldest of his surviving sons should have Luneburg, or Celle; and the second, Calenberg, then called Hanover; but this arrangement did not take place until after the death of Frederick, the last of the seven brothers, in 1648.

Christian Louis, the eldest son of George, on succeeding to the sovereignty on the death of his uncle, fixed his residence at Celle. By a treaty of peace, concluded in 1642, it was agreed that the alternate nomination to the Bishoprick of Osnaburg should be in the Catholic bishops, and in the Protestant branches of the house of Luneburg; in consequence of which, Ernest Augustus, the youngest brother of Christian Louis, was elected bishop. Christian died without issue, and was succeeded by his brother, George William, who joined the states of Holland, in the war against France, and at the end of the campaign, transmitted to the emperor, seventeen standards and colours out of seventy-two, which his troops had captured from the enemy. The eldest son of the Bishop of Osnaburg, George Louis, afterwards George the First of England, served under his father during this campaign; and, though only fifteen years of age, his gallantry was conspicuous in every action. Ernest Augustus, on the death of his brother John, succeeded to the government of the states of Hanover, in 1679. He had previously married Sophia, the youngest daughter of Frederick, King of Bohemia, by Elizabeth, daughter of James the First of England. In 1692, he was raised to the dignity of Elector, to which was attached the hereditary office of great standard bearer of the empire.—

No court in Germany, nor indeed in Europe, was more splendid than that of Hanover; and the courtiers of Ernest Augustus may be said to have rivalled those of Louis the Fourteenth in the politeness of their manners, and also in their vices. The old Duke of Luneburg lived in great retirement in his castle at Celle, and seldom appeared in the splendid circle of his younger brother.

The Elector died in 1698, and was succeeded in his titles and estates by his son, George Louis, who continued to reside with his mother at Hanover, until called to the throne of Great Britain. Here the Genealogical History of the House of Guelph terminates, and we shall, therefore, pass over the account of the intrigues at the English court respecting the succession, and the description of Hanover and Brunswick, and pass to the remaining division of the work, the Records and Original Documents of the House of Guelph.

These records are prefaced by an account of the monasteries founded by the Guelphs, and of their sepulchres, previous to Henry the Lion; and an account of the Saxon ancestors of the Guelphs, up to the same period. These are detailed in letters and statements from the resident magistrates, clergymen, &c. where the monuments or records are to be found. Then follows an account of the sepulchres of the Guelphs, about the time of Henry the Lion, and subsequent to that period. These documents, though important as materials towards the history of this illustrious family, do not afford us any extract; indeed, the way in which they are huddled together, without order or connection, lessens their interest very much. In the historical narrative, to which they would have given an increased value, the author has scarcely availed himself of them. The whole work betrays a want of method and great slovenliness, both in style and arrangement; and notwithstanding the resources and advantages Dr. Halliday has possessed, we consider his work merely as data towards a History of the Family of the Guelphs, which is as much a desideratum as ever. In all the requisites of an historian, fidelity excepted, Dr. Halliday is miserably deficient, and his work adds one more to the many regrets we have often felt, that Gibbon did not live to finish his Dissertation, which would have been a record worthy of the subject, and which is one of the finest possible for an historian.

Rome in the Nineteenth Century: containing a complete Account of the Ruins of the Ancient City, the Remains of the Middle Ages, and the Monuments of Modern Times, &c. &c. In a Series of Letters, written during a Residence at Rome, in the Years 1817 and 1818. 3 vols. 8vo. Edinburgh, 1820.

THIS work is the production of a lively and entertaining writer, who has the talents and ingenuity to treat with novelty subjects that have long appeared to be stale, and to reap a rich harvest in fields which have been abundantly gleaned. The observations of the author, besides being retrospective as to the splendid monuments of antiquity which the 'Queen of cities' still boasts, notices their present state, and also embraces critical remarks on the Fine Arts—a view of the present state of society, and a description of the religious ceremonies, manners, and customs of the modern Romans.

The style is pleasing and familiar; sometimes, perhaps, too slipshod, when religion is the subject, for we would respect even the mummeries of Popery.

As the subject of the Fine Arts at Rome has been so often noticed in our pages, we shall select a few extracts which treat of matters less familiar to our readers:—

'The church of S. Sebastian is one of the seven basilica of Rome, that pilgrims visit to obtain "absolution and remission of their sins." But here were we, a parcel of poor heretics, who had visited these holy shrines in vain,—for our sins, unabsolved, still stuck by us. Before we left the church, one of its retainers begged of us, "for the holy souls in purgatory," upon which your friend ——— insisted upon knowing what good money could do them there. The man reluctantly replied, that the money was given to say masses for them, and that these masses shortened the period of their purgation.

"What rascals these priests must be, if they know their masses will release the poor souls that are broiling in the flames, and yet they won't say them without being paid for it! Is that what they call Christian charity, I wonder?"

'The man pitching on his last word, only replied by recommending his accustomed wine, of "Carità Signore! par le Anime Sante in Purgatoria! Carità!" &c. &c.

'Mr. ———, then shewing him a piastre, asked him with great apparent seriousness and simplicity, how many souls that would take out of purgatory. The man, evidently half enraged, but unwilling to lose the money, declared he could not safely take upon him to say how many souls it would deliver from the flames, but he could aver that it would do much towards furthering the liberation of some of them.

'Mr. ——— then began to bargain with him for the number of masses that were to be said for it; and having cheapened them from one, which he at first proposed, to four, he gave him the piece of money for the "Anime Sante," and went away.

'Such a conversation in such a place, a century or two ago, I imagine, might have got our friend into a hotter situation in this world, than the "Anime Sante" occupy in the other.'

'Confessionals in every living language stand in St. Peter's: Spaniards, Portuguese, French, English, Germans, Hungarians, Dutch, Swedes, Greeks, and Armenians, here find a ghostly counsellor ready to hear and absolve in their native tongue.

'At stated times, the confessors attend in the confessionals. This morning, being Friday, they were sitting in readiness. Some of those who were unemployed, were reading. All had long wands, like fishing rods, sticking out of the box. The people passing, kneel down opposite the confessor, who touches their head with his wand, which possesses the virtue of communicating spiritual benefit to their souls. The other day, I was much amused to see in a church into which we entered by accident, a fat old friar sitting in his confession box, fast asleep, while a woman was pouring through the grate, into his unconscious ear, the catalogue of her sins. As the confessor and the confessant do not see each other, I should suppose this accident might sometimes occur, especially if the confession be somewhat prolix.

'For one man that I see at confession in the churches, there are at least fifty women. Whether it be that men have fewer sins, or women more penitence, or that it is more repugnant to the pride of man to avow them to man, or that women have more time to think about them, (though for that matter, as far as I see, both sexes are equally idle here,) I cannot determine. But so it is. However, the men do confess. They must. If every true born Italian, man, woman, and child, within in the Pope's dominions, does not confess and receive the communion at least once a-year, before Easter, his name is posted up in the parish church: if he still refrain, he is exhortated, entreated, and otherwise tormented; and if he persist in his contumacy, he is excommunicated, which is a very good joke to us, but none at all to an Italian, since it involves the loss of civil rights, and perhaps of liberty and property. Even the Pope confesses, which I don't understand; for they say he is infallible. Then, if infallible, how can he have any failings to confess?'

"Plenary indulgence and remission of sins," are liberally offered here on very easy terms. I was at first rather startled with the prodigal manner in which the Gospel promises only as the reward of sincere repentance and amendment, was bestowed at Rome, in consideration of repeating certain prayers before the shrine of certain saints, or paying a certain sum of money to certain priests.

'I was surprised to find scarcely a church in Rome, that did not hold up at the door the tempting inscription of "Indulgentia Plenaria." Two hundred days' indulgence I thought a great reward for every kiss bestowed upon the great black cross in the Coliseum; but that is nothing to the indulgences for ten, twenty, and even thirty thousands of years, that may be bought, at no exorbitant rate, in many of the churches; so that it is amazing what a vast quantity of treasure may be amassed in the other world with very little industry in this, by those who are avaricious of this spiritual wealth, into which, indeed, the cross or riches of this world may be converted, with the happiest facility imaginable.

'We are told, that "it is easier for a camel to enter into the eye of a needle, than a rich man into the Kingdom of heaven;" but, at Rome, at least, it would seem to be difficult, nay, impossible, to keep a rich man out.'

From several highly interesting tales of monastic life which these volumes contain, we select the two following, which present a melancholy picture of the distress which it so frequently occasions. The author is speaking of the convent of St. Sylvestro:—

'The history of one of the former nuns of this convent, as related to me by one of the sisters, is quite a romance, and in its most common-place style. Her name was Sasso Ferrato; she was left an orphan and an heiress in infancy, and placed by her uncle, her sole guardian, here, with the intention of inducing her to take the veil, that her fortune might descend to him and to his family. It happened, however, that, at one of the grand processions of the Virgin, which the nuns were assembled to behold, the young Sasso Ferrato saw, and was seen by the captain of the guards, stationed at the convent, a younger son of the Guistiniani family, and a brother of one of her youthful companions in the convent. His visits to his sister became very frequent, and Sasso Ferrato generally contrived to accompany her friend on those occasions. They became desperately in love; but the cruel uncle refused his consent, and by arts which intimidated the young and inexperienced mind of Sasso Ferrato, by powerful interest, which rendered the complaints of her lover vain, and by his authority, as the representative of her parents, he succeeded in obliging her to take the veil. She only lived two years afterwards.

'Her lover became a maniac, and after being confined for some time, continued, during the remaining years of his life, to roam about the neighbourhood of the city, his hair and beard growing wild, his dress neglected, and his manners gloomy and ferocious, though harmless in his actions.'

'I am informed that young nuns often fall in love with young friars, but that the attachment is perfectly Platonic. Indeed, so strict are now the rules of female monastic life, that I believe it must necessarily be so. But love, it is well known, will break through bolts and bars, and grates and convent walls; and love once inspired a nun with the project of getting out of her convent through a common sewer, which however unfavorable a path, she frequently practised after night had covered the world with her sable curtain, and wrapped the peaceful sisterhood in the arms of Morpheus. Her nun's dress was deposited in her chamber, and the exterior dirty garment, with which she passed through the sewer, was exchanged for one her lover wrapped her in at its mouth. She used to walk with him sometimes for hours, but always returned to her convent before the dawn. One evening, however, on returning from her romantic ramble by moonlight, what was her horror to find the sewer—the well-known passage—completely choked up with water, and all entrance impracticable. Discovery would bring certain destruction on herself and her lover. Their lives would be the forfeit, or a solitary dungeon their mildest doom. Concealment was impracticable; for who would harbour them? Flight impossible; for without passports, the gates of the city would be closed against them; and could they scale the walls, no other would be open to them. In this situation, the courage and presence of mind of the nun saved them both. She went, dressed in her lover's clothes, to the house of the Cardinal Vicario, who was an old friend of her father's; disturbed the family; had the cardinal roused out of bed on the plea of the most urgent and important business; obtained a private audience, threw herself at his feet, and confessed all. So earnestly did she implore him to save her and her family from the public disgrace of an exposure, that, melted by her tears, he followed the plan she suggested; ordered his carriage, took her, and one confidential chaplain on whose fidelity he could rely, drove to the convent, rang up the portress, and pretending he had received information of a man having entered and being concealed in it, demanded instant admittance to search it, which, in virtue of his office, could not be refused at any hour. He ordered the terrified sisters to remain in their rooms, and having dropped the disguised nun in hers, proceeded in his mock examination till she had disrobed herself, and his attendants had conveyed away the bundle of her clothes; then professing himself perfectly satisfied that the information he had received was false, he left the convent,—taking care, however, next day, to have the sewer so closed, that it could never serve for any thing but a passage for dirty water again.'

The author gives a very amusing description of the state of society at Rome, where there was then 'a most amusing collection of ex-royalty of all sorts and kinds, remnants of old dynasties, and scions of heirs legitimate and illegitimate, all jumbled together. Besides the old King and Queen of Spain, there are the Ex-Queen and the young King of Etruria—the abdicated King of Sardinia, turned Jesuit—Louis Bonaparte, the deposed King of Holland, living like a hermit—and Lucien Bonaparte, the uncrowned King, living like a prince. An accidental meeting with the Pope in the streets is thus noticed:—

'We were proceeding along the ancient Via Triumphalis, that leads from the church of St. Gregory to the Coliseum, when the coachman observing to us, "Viene il papa," drew up close by the side of the road, and stopped. His holiness was preceded by a detachment of the "Guarda Nobile," who, as soon as they came up with our open caleshe, commanded us, in no very gentle voice, to get out of the carriage. But ———, whose spirit did not at all relish this mandate, nor the tone in which it was uttered, manifested no intention to comply, and our servant, with true Italian readiness at a lie, declared we were Forestieri, who did not understand Italian. The officers, resolved to make us understand something else, repeated the order, and began to flourish their swords about our ears. But ——— sat with more inflexible resolution than ever, and all that was John Bull in his composition now refused to move. For my part, I make it a rule never to oppose these pointed arguments, and, therefore, jumped out of the carriage, and purposely contrived to get myself involved amongst the horses and drawn swords of the cavalry, knowing that I was in no real danger, and that ——— would forget his dignity, and come to my assistance, which he accordingly did; but otherwise nothing, I believe, but main force would have got him out of the carriage.

We saw the papal procession advance up the Triumphal Way, along which the victorious cars of so many Roman heroes and conquerors had rolled in their day of triumph. His holiness seemed, however, content with the honours of an ovation, for he was walking on foot, and instead of a myrtle crown, his brows were crowned with a large broad-brimmed scarlet velvet hat, bound with gold lace. This hat he very courteously took off as he passed us, and afterwards made another bow, in return for our courtesies. Our lacquey was on his knees in the dust, and all the Italians we saw, awaited his approach in the same attitude, then prostrated themselves before him to kiss his toe, or rather the gold cross, embroidered in front of his scarlet shoes. His robes, which descended to his feet, were scarlet; on state occasions he wears no colour but white. He was attended by two cardinals, in their ordinary dress of black, edged with scarlet, followed by a train of servants, and by his coach, drawn by six black horses, the very model of the gilt, scarlet, wooden-looking equipages you may have seen in children's baby-houses. It looked exactly like a large toy.

'The Pope himself is a very fine venerable old man, with a countenance expressive of benignity and pious resignation. His is the very head you would draw for a Pope. I have seen frequently met him walking in this manner, on the roads, for exercise, after his early dinner.'

Our last extract shall be an account of the palaces of Rome, and the manner of living of the nobility:—

'Palaces, to an English ear, convey an idea of all that the imagination can figure of elegance and splendour. But, after a certain residence in Italy, even this obstinate early association is conquered, and the word immediately brings to our mind images of dirt, neglect, and decay. The palaces of Rome are innumerable; but then, every gentleman's house is a palace.—I should say, every nobleman's,—for there are no gentlemen in Italy, except noblemen; society being, as of old, divided into two classes, the Patricians and the Plebeians; but though every gentleman is a nobleman, I am sorry to say, every nobleman is not a gentleman; neither would many of their palaces be considered by any means fit residences for gentlemen in our country. The legitimate application of the word, which, with us, is confined to a building forming a quadrangle, and inclosing a court within itself, is by no means adhered to here. Every house that has a porte cocher, and many that have not, are called palaces; and, in short, under that high-sounding appellation, are comprehended places, whose wretchedness far surpasses the utmost stretch of an English imagination to conceive.

Rome, however, contains real palaces, whose magnitude and magnificence are astonishing to transalpine eyes; but their tasteless architecture is more astonishing still.

Though they have the great names of Michael Angelo, Bramante, Versopi, Bernini, &c. &c. among their architects; though they are built of travertine stone, which, whether viewed with the deepened hues of age in the Coliseum, or the brightness of recent finish in St. Peter's, is, I think, by far the finest material for building in the world; and though, from the grandeur of their scale, and the prodigality of their decoration, they admitted of grand combinations and striking effect,—yet they are lamentably destitute of architectural beauty in the exterior; and in the interior, though they are filled with vast ranges of spacious apartments, though the polished marbles and precious spoils of antiquity have not been spared to embellish them, though the genius of painting has made them her modern temples, and sculpture adorned them with the choicest remains of ancient art—yet they are, generally speaking, about the most inconvenient, unenviable, uncomfortable dwellings, you can imagine.

I know it may be said, that comfort in England and in Italy is not the same thing; but it never can consist in dullness, dirt, and dilapidation, any where. Italian comfort may not require thick carpets, warm fires, or close rooms; but it can be no worse of clean floors, commodious furniture, and a house in good repair.

In habitations of such immense size and costly decorations as these, you look for libraries, baths, music rooms, and every appendage of refinement and luxury; but these things are rarely to be found in Italian palaces. If they were arranged and kept up, indeed, with any thing of English propriety, consistency, order, or cleanliness, many of them would be noble habitations; but, in the best of them, you see a barrenness, neglect, an all-prevailing look of misery—deficiencies every where—and contemptible meannesses adhering to grasping magnificence. But nothing is so offensive as the dirt. Amongst all the palaces, there is no such thing as a palace of cleanliness. You see,—and that is not the worst,—you smell abominable dunghills, heaped up against the walls of splendid palaces, and foul heaps of ordure and rubbish defiling their columned courts; you ascend noble marble staircases, whose costly materials are invisible beneath the accumulated filth that covers them; and you are sickened with the noisome ordures that assail you every turn. You pass through long suites of ghastly rooms, with a few crazy old tables and chairs, thinly scattered through them, and behold around you nothing but gloom and discomfort.

The custom of abandoning the ground-floor to menial purposes, except when used for shops, which is almost universal throughout Italy, and covering its windows, both for security and economy, with a strong iron grate, without any glass behind it, contributes to give the houses and palaces a wretched and dungeon-like appearance.

It is no uncommon thing for an Italian nobleman to go up into the attics of his own palace himself, and to let the principal rooms to lodgers. Proud as he is, he thinks this no degradation; though he would spurn the idea of allowing his sons to follow any profession, save that of arms or of the church. He would sooner see them dependants, flatterers, eavesdroppers, spies, gamblers, cavalieri servanti, polite rogues of any kind—or even beggars,—than honest merchants, lawyers, or physicians.

The Fiano Palace has its lower story let out into shops, and its superior ones occupied by about twenty different families—among which, the duke and duchess live in a corner of their own palace.

It is the same case with more than half the nobles of Rome and Naples. But the Doria, the Borghese, and the Colonna, possess enough of their ancient wealth to support their hereditary dignity, and their immense palaces are filled only with their own families and dependants. Not but that, though lodgings are not let at the Dora Palace, butter is sold there every week, which, in England, would seem rather an extraordinary trade for one of the first noblemen in the land to carry on in his own house. Yet this very butter-selling prince looks down with a species of contempt upon a great British merchant.

Commerce seems to be no longer respected in Italy—not even in Florence, where its reigning princes were merchants. Yet the proudest Florentine noblemen sell wine, by the flask, at their own palaces. I wonder the profits of this little huckstering trade never induced them to think of entering into larger concerns, that they might have larger returns. I wonder it never led them to remember that commerce was the source of the modern prosperity of Italy. But commerce cannot exist without freedom—a truth that princes and people have yet to learn here.

The palaces of all the ancient Roman nobility have, in the entrance hall, a crimson canopy of state, beneath which, the prince sits on a raised throne to receive his vassals, hear their complaints, redress their grievances, and administer justice. Perhaps I ought to speak in the past, rather than the present tense; but they still exercise a sort of feudal jurisdiction over their numerous tenants—among whom their will is law.

Above the door of every palace, upon the escutcheon of the family arms, we seldom fail to see the S. P. Q. R., all that is left of the senate and people of Rome.

The lovers of light reading will be much pleased with these volumes, while the more grave student may find much worthy of his attention.

Laneham's Letter, describing the magnificent Pageants presented before Queen Elizabeth, at Kenilworth Castle, in 1575; with an Introductory Preface, Glossarial and Explanatory Notes. 12mo. pp. 114. London, 1821.

It might almost be a question whether the author of Waverley is not entitled to a national reward, even in a commercial point of view. For, independent of the good taste in novel writing which he has created, and the gratification that he has afforded to millions, every production from his pen gives an active impulse to trade. Printers, booksellers, book-binders, &c. are immediately set in motion, the doors of the circulating libraries are closely beset, and the most agreeable present that a lover can make to his mistress is an early copy of the last novel of the author of 'Waverley.' The dramatic writers pounce on it, while it yet steams from the press, and the scene painter and the machinist are instantly set to work to produce, in as short a space as possible, a drama on the then most popular subject of the day—the last novel or romance by the author of 'Waverley.' But the business does not stop here; authors of less note find it an excellent speculation to graft an explanatory or illustrative tract on the novel. Of this character is the work before us, which is a reprint of a curious old tract that is repeatedly referred to in the romance of Kenilworth; and, there styled 'a very diverting tract, written by as great a coxcomb as ever blotted paper.'

It appears, from a well-written introductory preface, that 'Master Robert Laneham' was a native of Nottingham, but brought up in London, where he was taken under the patronage of the Earl of Leicester, who promoted him to the office of clerk of the council chamber and gentleman usher; offices which, as he says in his letter, gave him the privilege of being present at any exhibition which should be prepared for the Queen. Laneham understood the French, Spanish, Dutch, and Latin languages, which he says, 'now and then stand me in good stead.' There have been several copies of Laneham's letter printed; and the present improved edition has been taken from a careful collation of the best, with such revisions and improvements as might best qualify it for general reading. Indeed this was necessary, for Laneham's sentences are often so metaphorical, or constructed of such singular expressions, that they would lead the plain and general reader to doubt what was his true meaning.

In our review of 'Kenilworth,' we stated that the festivities given by the Earl of Leicester on the Queen's visit were passed over very slightly; Laneham has, however, given an ample detail of them, which we shall briefly notice.

Queen Elizabeth, on visiting Kenilworth, was met at some distance from the castle by a sybil 'comely clad in a pall of white silk,' who pronounced 'a proper poesy in English rhyme and metre; of effect, how great gladness her goodness' presence brought to every stand where it pleased her to come, and especially now into that place that had so long longed after the same.' On reaching the next gate, 'a porter tall of person, big of limb, and stern of countenance, wrapped also all in silk, with a club and keys of quantity according, had a rough speech, full of passions, in metre aptly made to the purpose.' After first hesitating to give admission, he 'proclaims' open gates and free passage to all, yields up his club, his keys, his office, and all, and on his knees humbly prays pardon of his ignorance and impatience, which her Highness graciously granting—

'He caused his trumpeters that stood upon the wall of the gate, there to sound up a tune of welcome; which, beside the noble noise, was so much the more pleasant to behold, because these trumpeters, being six in number, were every one eight feet high, in due proportion of person beside, all in long garments of silk suitable, each with his silvery trumpet of five feet long, formed taper-wise, and straight from the upper part unto the lower end, where the diameter was sixteen inches over; and yet so tempered by art, that being very easy to the blast, they cast forth no greater noise, nor a more unpleasant sound for time and tune, than any other common trumpet, be it never so artificially formed. These harmonious blasters, from the fore-side of the gate, at her highness' entrance, where they began walking upon the walls unto the inner [court], had this music maintained from them very delectably, while her highness all along this tilt-yard rode unto the inner gate, next the base-court of the castle, where the Lady of the Lake, (famous in King Arthur's book) with twynymphs waiting upon her, arrayed all in silks, awaited her highness' coming: from the midst of the pool, where, upon a moveable island, bright blazing with torches, she floated to land, and met her Majesty with a well-penned metre and matter after this sort: [viz.] First, of the ancestry of the castle, who had been owners of the same e'en till this day, most always in the hands of the Earls of Leicester; how she had kept this lake since King Arthur's days; and now, understanding of her highness' hither coming, thought it both her office and duty in humble wise to discover her and her estate; offering up the same, her lake, and power therein, with promise of repair unto the court. It pleased her highness to thank this lady, and to add withall: "We had thought indeed the lake had been ours, and do you call it yours now? Well, we will herein commune more with you hereafter."

'This pageant was closed up with a delectable harmony of hautboys, shalms, cornets, and such other loud music, that held on while her Majesty pleasantly so passed from thence toward the castle-gate; whereunto, from the base-court, over a dry valley cast into a good form, there was framed a fair bridge of twenty feet wide, and seventy feet long, gravelled for treading, railed on either part with seven posts on a side, that stood twelve feet asunder, thickened between with well-proportioned turned pillars.

'Upon the first pair of posts were set two comely square wire cages, three feet long, and two feet wide; and high in them live bitterns, curlews, shovellers, herons, godwits, and such like dainty birds, of the presents of Sylvanus, the god of fowl. On the second pair two great silvered bowls, featly apted to the purpose, filled with apples, pears, cherries, filberts, walnuts, fresh upon their branches, and with oranges, pomegranates, lemons, and pippins, all for the gifts of Pomona, goddess of fruits. The third pair of posts, in two such silvered bowls, had (all in ears green and old) wheat, barley, oats, beans, and peas, as the gifts of Ceres. The fourth post, on the left hand, in a like silvered bowl, had grapes in clusters, white and red, graced with their vine leaves: the match post against it had a pair of great white silver livery pots for wine; and before them two glasses of good capacity, filled full; the one with white wine, the other with claret, so fresh of colour, and of look so lovely, smiling to the eye of many, that by my faith methought, by their leering, they could have found in their hearts, (as the evening was hot,) to have kissed them sweetly and thought it no sin: and these were the poetical presents of Bacchus, the god of wine. The fifth pair had each a fair large tray, strewed with fresh grass; and in them conger, burt, mullet, fresh herrings, oysters, salmon, crevis, and such like, from Neptunus, god of the sea. On the sixth pair of posts were set two ragged staves of silver, as my lord gives them in his arms, beautifully glittering of armour, thereupon depending bows, arrows, spears, shield, head-piece, gorget, corslets, swords, targets, and such like, for Mars' gifts, the god of war. And the aptier (methought) was it that those ragged staves supported these martial presents, as well because these staves by their times seem naturally meet for the bearing of armour, as also that they chiefly in this place might take upon them the principal protection of her highness' person, that so benignly pleased her to take harbour. On the seventh posts, the last and next to the castle, where there pight two fair bay branches of four feet high, adorned on all sides with lutes, viols, shalms, cornets, flutes, recorders, and harps, as the presents of Phoebus, the god of music, for rejoicing the mind, and also of physic, for health to the body.'

Music and fireworks closed this day's proceedings. On the following day (Sunday), the morning was occupied 'in divine service, and preaching at the parish church;' the afternoon 'in excellent music of sundry sweet instruments, and in dancing of lords and ladies and other worshipful degrees:—

'At night late, as though Jupiter the last night had forgot for business, or forborne for courtesy and quiet, part of his welcome unto her highness appointed, now entering at the first into his purpose moderately (as mortals do) with a warning piece or two, proceeding on with increase, till at last the Altitonant [i. e. High Thunderer,] displays me his main power; with blaze of burning darts flying to and fro, leams of stars coursant, streams and hail of fiery sparks, lightnings of wildfire on water and land, flight and shooting of thunderbolts, all with such continuance, terror, and vehemence, that the heavens thundered, the waters surged, the earth shook, and in such sort surely, as had we not been assured that the fulminant deity was all hot in amity, and could not otherwise testify his welcome unto her highness, it would have made me for my part, as hardy as I am, very vengeably afraid. This ado lasted until the midnight was passed, that it seemed well with me soon after, when I found me in my cabin.'

On the Monday, the Queen went to the chase at five o'clock in the evening, when 'the hart was killed, a goodly deer;' but this did not terminate the sport:—

'For about nine o'clock, at the hither part of the chase, where torch light attended, out of the woods, in her majesty's return, there came roughly forth Hombre Salvagio [i. e. a savage man,] with an oak plant plucked up by the roots in his hand, himself foregrown all in moss and ivy; who, for personage, gesture, and utterance beside, countenanced the matter to very good liking; and had speech to this effect:—"That continuing so long in these wild wastes, wherein oft had he fared both far and near, yet happened he never to see so glorious an assembly before: and now cast into great grief of mind, for that neither by himself could he guess, nor knew where else to be taught, what they should be, or who bare estate. Reports, some had he heard of many strange things, but broiled thereby so much the more in desire of knowledge. Thus, in great pangs, bethought he, and called he upon all his familiars and companions, the fawns, the satyrs, the nymphs, the dryades, and the hamadryades; but none making answer, whereby his care the more increasing, in utter grief and extreme refuge, called he aloud at last after his old friend Echo, that he wist would hide nothing from him, but tell him all, if she were here. "Here" (quoth Echo.) "Here, Echo, and art thou there?" (says he) "Ah! how much hast thou relieved my careful spirits with thy courtesy onward. Ay me, good Echo, here is a marvellous presence of dignity; what are they, I pray thee, who is sovereign, tell me, I beseech thee, or else how might I know?" "I know," (quoth she.) "Knowest thou?" "I say," (quoth she, that is exceedingly well: Why then, I desire thee, heartily show me what majesty, for no mean degree is it) have we here: a King, or a Queen?" "A Queen!" (quoth Echo.) "A Queen!" says he, pausing, and wisely viewing awhile, "now full certainly seems thy tale to be true." And proceeding by this manner of dialogue, with an earnest beholding her highness awhile, recounts he, first, how justly that former reports agree with his present sight, touching the beautiful lineaments of countenance, the comely proportion of body, the princely grace of presence, the gracious gifts of nature, with the rare and singular qualities of both body and mind in her majesty conjoined, and so apparent at eye. Then shortly rehearsing Saturday's acts, of Sybil's salutation; of the porter's proposition; of his trumpeter's music; of the lake lady's oration, and of the seven gods' seven presents, he reported the incredible joy that all estates in the land have always of her highness whosoever she came; ending with praise and prayer of perpetual felicity, and with humble subjection of him and his, and all that they may do. After this sort the matter went, with little difference, I guess, saving only in this point, that the thing which I here report in unpolished prose, was there pronounced in good metre and matter, very well ended in rhyme. Echo finely framed, most aptly, by answers thus to utter all. And I shall tell you, Master Martin, by the mass, of a mad adventure—As this savage, for the more submission, broke his tree asunder, and cast the top from him, it had almost light upon her highness's horse's head; whereat he startled, and the gentleman much dismayed. See the benignity of the prince: as the footmen looked well to the horse, and he of generosity soon calmed of himself—"No hurt, no hurt," quoth her highness. Which words, I promise you, we were all glad to hear, and took them to be the best part of the play."

Hunting, bear-baiting, &c., occupied the succeeding days of the first week until the Sunday, when there was "a fruitful sermon in the forenoon." In the afternoon, "a solemn bridal of a proper couple was appointed," which gives so good a picture of the rural festivities of the times, and is so quaintly described, that we cannot forbear quoting it:—

"First, all the lusty lads and bold bachelors of the parish, suitably habited every wight, with his blue buckram bride-lace upon a branch of green broom (because rosemary is scant there) tied on his left arm, for on that side lies the heart; and his alder pole for a spear in his right hand, in martial order ranged on afore, two and two in a rank: some with a hat, some in a cap, some a coat, some a jerkin, some for lightness, in doublet and hose, clean trussed with points afore; some boots and no spurs, this spurs and no boots, and he again neither one nor other: one had a saddle, another a pad or a pannel fastened with a cord, for girths were geason: and these, to the number of sixteen wights, riding men and well beseen; but the bridegroom foremost in his father's tawny worsted jacket, (for his friends were fain that he should be a bride-groom before the Queen) a fair straw hat with a capital crown, steeplewise on his head; a pair of harvest gloves on his hands, as a sign of good husbandry; a pen and ink-horn at his back, for he would be known to be bookish; lame of a leg that in his youth was broken at football; well beloved of his mother, who lent him a new muffler for a napkin, that was tied to his girdle for losing it. It was no small sport to mark this minion in his full appointment, that, through good tuition, became as formal in his action as had he been a bride-groom indeed; with this special grace by the way, that ever as he would have framed to himself the better countenance, with the worst face he looked.

"Well, sir, after these horsemen, a lively morrice-dance according to the ancient manner: six dancers, maid-marian, and the fool. Then three pretty pucelles, as bright as a breast of bacon, of thirty years old a-piece; that carried three special spice-cakes of a bushel of wheat (they had by measure, out of my lord's bakehouse) before the bride, Cicely, with set countenance and lips so demurely simpering, as it had been a mare cropping of a thistle. After these, a lovely loober-worts, freckle-faced, red-headed, elean trussed in his doublet and his hose, taken up now indeed by commission, for that he was loath to come forward, for reverence belike of his new cut canvas doublet; and would by his good will have been but a gazer, but found to be a meet actor for his office; that was to bear the bride-cup, formed of a sweet sucket barrel, a fair turned foot set to it, all seemly besilvered and parcel gilt adorned with a beautiful branch of broom, gaily begilded for rosemary: from which two broad bride-laces of red and yellow buckram begilded, and gallantly streaming by such wind as there was, for he carried it aloft: this gentle cup-bearer had his freckled physiognomy somewhat unhappily infested, as he went, by the busy flies, that flocked about the sucket that it savoured of; but he, like a tall fellow, withstood their malice stoutly—see what manhood may do—beat them away, killed them by scores, stood to his charge, and marched on in good order.

"Then followed the worshipful bride, led, after the country manner, between two ancient parishioners, honest townsmen. But a stale stallion and a well spread (hot as the weather was,) God wot, and ill-smelling was she: thirty years old,* of colour brown-bay, not very beautiful indeed, but ugly, fust, and ill-favored; yet marvellous fond of the office, because she heard say she should dance before the Queen, in which feast she thought she would foot it as finely as the best. Well, after this bride there came, by two and two, a dozen damselfor bride-maids, that for favour, attire, for fashion and cleanliness, were as meet for such a bride as a tureen ladle for a porridge-pot: more, but for fear of carrying all clean, had been appointed, but these few were enough.

"As the company in this order, were come into the court, marvellous were the martial acts that were done there that day. The bride-groom, for pre-eminence, had the first course at the quintain, and broke his spear with true hardiment; but his mare in her manege did a little so titubate, that much ado had his manhood to sit in his saddle, and escape the foil of a fall; with the help of his hand, yet he recovered himself, and lost not his stirrups, (for he had none to his saddle,) had no hurt as it happened, but only that his girth burst, and lost his pen and ink-horn, which he was ready to weep for: but his handkercher, as good hap was, found he safe at his girdle. That cheered him somewhat, and had good regard it should not be soiled. For though heat and cold had, upon sundry occasions, made him sometimes to sweat, and sometimes rheumatic, yet durst he be bolder to blow his nose and wipe his face with the flappet of his father's jacket, than with his mother's muffler: 'tis a goodly matter, when youth are mannerly brought up, in fatherly love and motherly awe.

* The other early copy reads "thirty-five years old."

'Now, sir, after the bride-groom had made his course, ran the rest of the band awhile in some order; but soon after, tag and rag, cut and long tail: where the speciality of the sport was, to see how some for their slackness had a good bob with the bag; and some for their haste, too, would topple down-right, and come down tumbling to the post. Some striving so much at the first setting out, that it seemed a question between the man and the beast, whether the course should be made on horseback or on foot; and put forth with the spurs, then would run his race by as among the thickest of the throng, that down came they together, hand over head. Another, while he directed his course to the quintain, his jument would carry him to a mare among the people: so his horse was as amorous as himself adventurous. Another, too, would run and miss the quintain with his staff, and hit the board with his head.

'Many such frolicsome games were there among these riders; who, by and by afterwards, upon a greater courage, left their quintaining, and ran at one another. There to see the stern countenances, the grim looks, the courageous attempts, the desperate adventures, the dangerous courtes, the fierce encounters, whereby the bull at the man, and the counterbull at the horse, that both sometimes came toppling to the ground. By my troth, Master Martin, 'twas a lively pastime; I believe it would have moved a man to a right merry mood, though it had been told him that his wife lay dying.'

Having thus noticed the principal sports, we must now take our leave of Master Robert Laneham, 'mercier, merchant, adventurer, and clerk of the council chamber door, and also keeper of the same,' to say something of the present editor, who has put him in to a dress which makes him more perfectly understood. The glossarial and explanatory notes are a very valuable appendage to Laneham's letter, and display much antiquarian research, and an intimate acquaintance with the peculiar manners and customs of the age of Elizabeth. As illustrative of the romance of Kenilworth, the present volume is very interesting, and ought to be bound up with it. The editor has also given the original story on which the romance is founded*, and Mickle's ballad of Cumnor Hall, which is not printed in the collected works of that poet.

THE BURIAL SERVICE.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Of all the formula of the Liturgy of the Church of England, there is no part of it so grand and sacred as 'the burial service': none so truly impressive, or so well calculated to excite religious feelings in the human heart. For this reason, I think it worthy of the special consideration of the highest dignitaries of its establishment, to make an erratum for the following sentence, which is said by the priest, 'in sure and certain hope of the resurrection,' &c.

As a member of the religion of this country, I do not think it right that there should not be some distinction made between a truly good man and a notoriously wicked man. The above sentence is twice said at the grave, and, in addition to its repetition, 'We give thee hearty thanks for that it hath pleased thee to deliver this our brother out of the miseries of this sinful world, beseeching thee that it may please thee, of thy gracious goodness, shortly to accomplish the number of thine elect,' &c.

Would it not be more appropriate to omit such incongruities, or so to amend the Liturgy as to give it a more unexceptionable tone to the true spirit of devotion and truth? I presume so.

The Quakers have the decided advantage in this, as also in the reading of their Scriptures to their children, to shield them from the dangers so properly noticed by 'A PARENT,' in your ninety-third number. This is one of the features of the Lancasterian system of education to youth, which Dr. Bell has not avoided in facto.

Another of your respectable writers, signed 'L,' in the above number, has written on epitaphs: I would offer this letter as an addendum to both, by observing, how improper it is that eulogies should be continually delivered at the grave, by ministers, who are selected to officiate, without knowing, sometimes, even the sex or age of the deceased, for 'a fee, a hatband, and a pair of gloves.'

Let not, Sir, churchmen and dissenters cry out against Rome and its abominations, while they retain so much of the old leaven of Popery and continue similar practices, though contrary to their professions.

I am, Sir, your's with respect,
PULVIS.

ABSENCE OF MIND.

La Fontaine.—When this poet went to Versailles, to present his Fables to the King, it appeared, after he had delivered a very good address, that he had forgotten the book.

Lessing.—The justly celebrated Lessing was frequently very absent. Having mislaid money at different times without being able to discover who took it, he determined to put the honesty of his servant to a trial, and left a handful of gold on his table. 'Of course you counted it,' said one of his friends. 'Counted it,' said Lessing, rather embarrassed, 'no; I forgot that.'

In a public sale, there was a book which Lessing was very desirous of possessing. He gave three of his friends, at different times, a commission to buy it at any price. They accordingly bid against each other till they had got as far as ninety crowns; there having been no other bidder after it had reached ten crowns. Happily, one of them thought it best to speak to the others, when it appeared that they had all been bidding for Lessing, whose forgetfulness, in this instance, cost him eighty crowns.

An absent man dining with a gentleman and his sister, the latter fainted at table; which our blunderer, without thinking, imputed to her being in the way which women 'wish to be who love their lords.' 'You are rather out there, my friend,' said his host, 'my sister has been a widow these three years.'—'I really beg your pardon,' exclaimed the other; 'I thought she was a spinster.'

Mr. A* receives a letter, he knows the hand-writing, he wants to read it in haste—it is already dark, he strikes a light, tears a paper, and lights a taper, but the letter is gone—he had used it to light the candle!

The Memoirs of Count Tessin, lately published at Stockholm, contain the following anecdote:—'Of all the absent people I ever knew in Sweden, the most remarkable was the late Chancellor Baron Nolin. Two instances deserve to be related. Once, when he had to read to His Royal Highness Prince Adolphus Frederick, (now King,) a report of the privy council, he very gravely took out of his pocket the lease of his house, which he had nearly read to the end, till the remarks of the prince, at last, made him sensible of his mistake. Another time, he came into his Royal Highness's ante-ti-chamber, where I was with several officers, and asked for Count Tessin; I answered him myself, but he went out in a very great hurry, and came back and said, the officer in waiting affirms that he is in the room. I answered, 'your lordship will believe me, I hope, for I have myself seen the count go out of the room.' Nokin went out a second time, and came back again with a new assurance of the officer in waiting, on which a general laugh ensued, which waked him out of his dream.'

Alexander Cruden, the author of the Concordance, was very intimate with the famous Dr. Bradbury, a zealous dissenting clergyman. The doctor had one evening prepared an excellent supper for several friends; at the moment it was served on the table, Mr. Cruden made his appearance in the room heated with walking. The doctor's favourite dish, a turkey, was smoking at one end of the table, and before the company could be seated, Cruden advanced, put back his wig, and with both hands plunged in the gravy, he calmly washed his hands and his face over the bird, to the no small mortification of the doctor and his company.

*The Principal Performers of the Theatres
Royal Drury Lane & Covent Garden.*

No. XIII.—MISS FOOTE

'Grace was in all her steps, Heaven in her eye,
In every gesture dignity and love.'—MILTON.

WERE we to indulge ourselves in retracing all the beauties of Miss Foote; her heavenly beaming smile, the soft expression of her dove-like eyes, and her other thousand fascinating attractions, instead of writing a criticism, we should, undoubtedly, launch forth into the most extravagant panegyric, but

'Justice must not partial trophies raise,
Nor sink the actress in the woman's praise.'

To deny that Miss Foote is 'more than language can express, or youthful poets fancy when they love,' would be as ridiculous as to affirm that her acting, or her conception of character, is as perfect as her person. The principal fault of this interesting actress is an intolerable ogle, and a perpetual languishing elevation of the eye. All this is extremely weak and frivolous, and is as much as saying, in other words, to the audience, 'I have undoubtedly fine eyes, and am certainly a most lovely creature.' Were it not for this affectation, we should consider her performance of Virginia completely perfect; nothing can exceed her excellence when, reluctantly, and with all the bashfulness of a young and timid maiden, she confesses her love for Icelius; her scenes with her father are not less worthy of commendation. Her exquisite performance of this character has induced us to think that she would appear to great advantage in the love-inspiring Juliet. Tenderness in tragedy and sprightliness in comedy are this lady's peculiar forte; she has not strength enough either of voice, features, or person, to express vehement passions; it will, therefore, be evident, that she is excellently adapted for the pathos, the calm, the meek endurance of grief, which the Mantuan heroine, amid all her severe and innumerable trials, exhibits. She plays Cordelia tolerably, but Covent Garden is sadly in want of an actress even in its characters of youth and beauty. We will not be so ungallant as to omit her representation of the fair Isidora, the 'lovely Duchess of Miranda'; nor so unjust as to forget her Maria Darlington. In the former character, her first interview with Guido was replete with pathos and fervent feeling, and in the fifth act, she surpassed our most sanguine expectations; in the latter, she affects insanity, sings, and waltzes à merveille. In Imogen she looks well, particularly in her male attire, but her execution is by no means equal to her conception. In Mary, Queen of Scots, so far as personal beauty was concerned, she made the character far more interesting than Miss Macauley, but, in all other respects, she was sadly inferior. She plays Fanny, in the 'Clandestine Marriage,' prettily, though she is somewhat too rigid for sentimental comedy. But, in characters of archness, she is most happy. Among these, her Sophia, in the 'Rendezvous,' an apparently half-witted, but really sly girl, deserves favourable mention. She really surprised us by her performance of Bertha, in the 'Point of Honour'; in the prison scene she exhibited considerable feeling, and the hysterical laugh which followed the gradual recovery of her senses, was perfectly true to nature. We have heard that this lady either has, or shortly intends to retire from the stage; we trust that this is but an empty rumour, as, although she is far from being in the first class, she is certainly an improving performer, and her representations of some characters, though not chef d'œuvres, are chaste and pathetic, and give strong indications of future talent.

No. XIV.—MRS. FAUCIT.

WE know of no actress who has made such rapid strides towards perfection, in the last two seasons, as Mrs. Faucit; it is true she is not always equally excellent in all her efforts, but in some characters so faithful is she to nature, so fanciful, so vigorous are her delineations, that she leaves most of her competitors at a distance. Pre-eminent among these stands her Elspeth, in the Antiquary. The author of 'Waverley' obviously finds an old woman indispensable, at least in his novels, and Elspeth is Meg Merrilies grown deaf, blind, and every thing but dumb. Mrs. Faucit plays it with singular impressiveness; indeed, we believe we may venture to affirm, without fear of contradiction, that we have no other performer on the stage who could have done it so much justice. She looks and dresses the character completely to the life, and, from being a fine comely woman of five and thirty, transforms her person, with the utmost fidelity, into an old, withered, decrepit, shrivelled hag of upwards of a century. We never recollect any performance of the kind so imitatively excellent.

That Mrs. Faucit possesses considerable talent, will be evident from her admirable performances both in young as well as old characters. In Lady Racket, she gives us a faithful portrait, fresh with life and reality, and this too without any exaggeration or heightened colouring, to produce effect. In Ulicia she exhibits, with great skill, that wild infuriate passion, so powerfully drawn by the highly talented author of Ivanhoe. But in all her studies, this lady should never attempt the tender, whining maiden—as Virginia, or Cora, or even Virginia; her peculiar excellence consists in the boldness of her execution, and the vehemence of her action; it is, therefore, clear that she is completely misplaced in characters of tenderness or feminine weakness. We cannot say that we admire her Juliet or Lady Macbeth; but of this latter character we may say the same of all our actresses. She has a laborious part in Adels, in the 'Warlock of the Glen,' but she plays it with great spirit. The sight of females rending themselves to fragments, and out-screaming the ravens of the night, is not among our pleasures; but, in melodrama, such things must be done, and it is Mrs. Faucit's praise to say, that no person can do them better. We could wish that all the commendations elicited by this lady's performances, were attended by favourable reminiscences of the pieces themselves. We recollect a melo-drame, now justly consigned to the tomb of all the Capulets, entitled the 'Castle of Paluzzi,' in which Mrs. Fancit performed the heroine with unexampled excellence. In the last scene, when fluctuating between terror and the dread of breaking the oath that had been extorted from her, she displayed genius of the very first order; it was only lamentable that such acting should have been lavished on so miserable a drama. She performs Isabella, that female Iago, in Mirandola, with great excellence; her duplicity is finely carried on, and in the concluding scene, where, her guilty designs being divulged, she throws off the mask, and displays a mind of demoniacal deformity, her acting is so powerful, and her representation so perfect and forcible, that the audience really appear desirous of losing sight of so incarnate a fiend. She enacts Julia, in the 'Rivals,' with great judgment; Ravina, admirably; and does all that is possible for the exquisitely beautiful, though terribly undramatic character—the Lady, in Corius. This lady's greatest commendation is the zeal which she manifests in every part that is allotted her; she gives us the true spirit of her author; she is useful both to the manager and the audience, for if she undertakes a character not originally known, she gives us very many of its beauties; indeed, with constant application, we doubt not, in a very few years, to see her at the very summit of her profession. Original Poetry.

TO HARRIET.

On her asking the Author 'what made him so low-spirited?'

Could language paint the dire distress
That in my bosom reigns,
Or show the anguish of a breast
That's rent with torturing pains,
I'd tell thee how, in evil hour,
A violent storm came o'er,
And struck to earth my favourite flower—
It fell—so rise no more!

Pain would I tell thee, how this heart
With grief is sore oppress'd—
How hard a task it is to part
With those we lov'd the best!

Alas! she's gone, all words are vain,—
They will not ease the smart;
But her dear image will remain
For ever in this heart!

HOPE.

BRIGHT is you sun that gilds the sky,
But not as Hope so bright;
The one but charms the wandering eye,
The other lifts the soul on high,
And feasts it with delight,
Pure as the snow on Andes' height,
And kindly as the breeze,
That skims, in wanton pastime light,
In summer o'er the seas;
Yet still comparisons like these
But poorly tell its bliss;
For nought but Hope the wretch can please,
Nought else can give his bosom ease,
And point to happiness. J. D.

TO A YOUNG LADY,

With a Bunch of Snow-Drops.

THERE is in friendship's gift a charm,
Though known but to a favoured few,
That may the coldest bosom warm,
A pledge of love for ever true;
Such, my dear girl, accept from me,
'Tis all I now dare offer thee.

These scentless flowers, of tender form,
I could'd from 'neath your pear-tree's bough—
Pale offspring of the wintry storm,
Bedropt with ice and clothed in snow;
Yet, oh! how sweet do they appear,
First promise of the opening year.

Like thee, in innocence arrayed,
With modest beauty meek they shone;
Be now their modest worth repaid,
Nor blush, fair maid, the deed to own,
That, when the storm o'er tower and tree
Ranged wild, they were preserved by thee.

Then take them to thy virgin breast,
That breast that fears no rival foe;
And, of thy fostering care possess'd,
Let them in native beauty blow,
While each shall to the other give
A charm that bids both chaster live.

ALPHEUS.

THE SYCOPHANT.

MARK yonder fawning hound! in whose vile face
Each dastard feeling of the soul we trace.
With cringing look he stands beside the board,
A servile flatterer to a courtly lord;
Behold how low he bends his abject knees,
Using each mean detested art to please:
Is Claudio sick, or does he keep his bed—
He too is languid, he too droops his head;
When Claudio's ill, can Sylvio's heart be glad?
Can he be happy when his lord is sad?
No; 'tis not possible,—he feels it deep,
His heart beat, he cries, impels his eyes to weep.
Is Claudio lively, does he join the glee,—
He smiles in concert, lively too is he.
Does any of his slaves their lord offend—
With Claudio's frowns his own in anger bend.
Does the day shine, or is its splendour dim,
As 'tis with Claudio, so it is with him.
If chance his lord some paltry letter write,—
He, smiling cries, how well he can indite.
If some mean verse he makes, that verse he'll praise.

And strait declare him worthy of the bays.
E'en should his lord for music have no ear,
He'll say his voice is sweet, his judgment clear;
Or if at eve he seeks the silent grove,
Thither his servile steps are sure to rove.
He'll bless the spot, and with a lofty tone,
Swear it was made for Claudio alone;
Each look, each action, does his eye imbibe,
A sycophant the meanness of his tribe.

SAM SPITTEALL.

AN OCCASIONAL ADDRESS,

Intended to have been spoken at the Theatre Royal English Opera House, Feb. 26, 1821, previous to the play of 'The Foundling of the Forest.'

'This drama' laws the drama's patrons give,
And they who live to please, must please to live.

Thus Johnson wrote: nor has the present age
Revoked those rigid laws which rul'd his stage;
Each author, still, who courts your smiles or tears,

The pen severe of criticism fears:
Each actor pleading here his humble cause,
Sinks 'neath your frowns, or rises by applause.
But we, to-night, present you nothing new:
Our Forest Foundling, cheer'd by friends like you,

Has oft his sea of difficulties past,
And reached his loved, his destined home at last.

Though he once more essay the path of pain,
Give him your aid, and he'll succeed again.

One word for him, who Florian's woes shall speak,

And dry the tear which dews a mother's cheek.
In his behalf assembled here we see,
Of fair and dark, a goodly company:
Your very presence shews a generous heart;
Your plaudits constitute the other part.
In former times, by tokens such as these,
You've stilled his throbbing heart, and given it ease;

For favours present, favours past, receive
The warmest thanks a grateful soul can give:
And with himself some others he'd include,
Who thank you, though in silent gratitude.

When retrospection shall recall to-night,
May it produce a feeling but delight:
So your support its reward shall prove,
And Florian still be debtor to your love.

February, 1821.

MR. HAYDON'S PICTURE OF CHRIST'S AGONY IN THE GARDEN.

MR. HAYDON is an artist of whose talents public opinion is becoming more unanimous than formerly; indeed, to deny talents—extraordinary talents, to an individual who could produce 'Christ's Entry into Jerusalem,' would argue want of taste and judgment, or would discover a very strong prejudice. The new picture of 'Christ's Agony' has, we understand, been designed and finished in the short period of twelve months; and, although the private view of it was too late in the week to allow a detailed criticism, yet we shall briefly notice it this week, and return to the subject when more at leisure. It appeared to us that the worst part of the painting is the principal figure; but the attributes of Deity, however glowing to the imagination, are beyond the reach of the pencil. Our Saviour is represented in the foreground, praying. The artist has aimed, as he himself states, 'to give an air of submissive tenderness, while a quiver of agony still trembles on the features.' The union of passion and divinity is incongruous, and although we here behold beautiful features, impassioned to a degree almost beyond nature, yet they are not absorbed in the emotion of a Deity. It has been observed, that Milton, sublime and grand as he is, has not succeeded in the speeches which he has given to God the Father, or to Christ, so well as in those which he has given to the fallen angels. The same remark applies to this picture, in which the betrayer, 'Judas,' and the 'rabble,' possessing the advantages of diversity of character, are superior to the principal figure; they are, indeed, admirable. Immediately behind our Saviour, the three apostles, St. John, St. James, and St. Peter, are sleeping on a sort of garden bank; and, in the back ground, appears Judas, whose wily treachery is stamped on his countenance, with a centurion soldier and a crowd. The apostles are executed in the happiest style, and their sleeping is admirably distinguished. The unsound dose is finely contrasted with the deep sleep of St. James; while St. Peter is represented in a disturbed slumber, keeping guard with his sword, and on the point of waking at the approach of light. As a whole, this picture is inferior to 'Christ's Entry into Jerusalem'; this is principally owing to the nature of the subject, but it is not so well finished; we may, however, pronounce it as displaying splendid talents, and which would of itself rank Mr. Haydon very high in the school of British artists. R.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—Mr. Haines's new tragedy of Conscience, has been twice repeated since our last, and with increased effect. It is now announced for performance every evening not devoted to operas; so that, notwithstanding the culpable neglect of the manager, who hurried it on the stage with only three rehearsals, and did not expend a single shilling in other dresses or scenery, and, notwithstanding the very inefficient company this theatre possesses in this department of the drama, yet the tragedy will become popular from its own intrinsic merits. The plot teems with accumulating interest from the first scene to the falling of the curtain, and the play is rich, beyond comparison, in beautiful poetry. We could select several passages which surpass any thing of the sort in modern times, but, as the tragedy will be published in a few days, we reserve our remarks for a notice of it in our review department. It is but justice to the performers to say, that the tragedy is, on the whole, much better acted than on the first night, and that the chilling neglect of the manager has had no influence on their exertions.

Bickerstaff's opera of Love in a Village was performed at this theatre on Thursday night, so strongly cast as to combine nearly all the operatic and comic talent of the house. This entertaining drama, which has always been a favourite on the stage, from its being first produced in 1762, is evidently borrowed from the Village Opera, written by Charles Johnson. The principal part of the plot and characters are taken from it, but given with much improvement. The poetry of many of the airs in the original, if not of a very high character, is at least appropriate; and the author discovers, in general, a happy facility in adapting his tunes to his ideas, a practice highly essential in dramatic composition; for, whatever tends to illustrate the action of the scene, or character of the illusory personage, should be considered with the utmost attention, and adopted as often as the laws of the drama will admit.

We have been speaking of Bickerstaff's opera, but it was Mr. Elliston's version of it that we witnessed; for so much strange music, by various composers, has been introduced, and so many of the original airs omitted, that little remains of Love in a Village, but the dialogue and the name. The great attraction of the evening was Miss Wilson, in the character of Rosetta, and the reputation which this young lady has acquired, filled every part of the house. She was throughout honoured with warm applause, particularly towards the close of the opera, and one of the prettiest exercises of the brilliancy of her talents was in her last bravura. In the duet with Braham, 'When thy bosom heaves the sigh,' and in another with Horn, 'Can I those beauties prize,' she was extremely happy; but, we confess, we were disappointed in the third duet which she sang with Horn, 'Together let us range the fields.' The acting of Miss Wilson was in general good, particularly in the last scene, where she comes forward as a person of family. She represents the English gentlewoman better than a femme de chambre. It was a new and most welcome treat to hear Mr. Braham employ his science and his powerful voice in the truly English songs of Hawthorn. Never, perhaps, were these airs given with such effect, and nearly the whole of them were encored with an enthusiasm which bespoke the delight of the audience. Young Meadows was well sustained by Mr. Horn, who gave the songs with much sweetness. Miss Povey was justly encored in 'Cupid, god of soft persuasion.' Mr. Munden, in Justice Woodcock, excited the risible muscles of the audience, but he was rather too grotesque; and his song, 'When I courted a lass,' should certainly now be omitted, as too coarse for the refined manners of the present day. Knight's Hodge was in the true spirit of rural nature; nor must we forget that exquisite English ballad singer, Mrs. Bland, on whom age seems to have no effect, for her voice is as sweet as ever. She played Madge admirably. The other parts were well cast, and the opera was crowned with unanimous approbation.—In consequence of the indisposition of Madame Vestris, Miss Kelly undertook the character of Little Pickle, in The Spoiled Child; a better substitute could not have been provided. The Duke and Duchess of Gloucester were present, and were honoured with that enthusiastic welcome the Royal Family meet when they mix in the amusements of the public.

COVENT GARDEN.—That courtesy which used to exist between the two great theatres, of not adopting a new piece which had been first produced at the rival house, is now no longer adhered to. In consequence of which, the Parisian melo-drame, L'Orphéus de Genève, which was brought out so successfully at Drury Lane, under the title of Therese, has been produced at this theatre under the name of Henriette, or the Farm of Senanges. The story being the same, it is unnecessary that we should detail it. A Mrs. Vining, from the Worthing boards, appeared, for the first time, as the heroine, Henriette (the Therese of Drury Lane) and was very favourably received. She has a tolerable stage figure, and displayed considerable force and skill, particularly in the last act. Messrs. Vandenhof, Abbot, Connor, Blanchard, with Mrs. Faucit and Mrs. Davenport, did ample justice to their respective parts, and the piece was received with applause, but has been withdrawn, after having been performed four times. ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—Mr. MATHEWS AT HOME.—We are glad to turn from the monotony of the great theatres, with their twenty times repeated operas and 'most successful melo-dramas ever produced,' to be at HOME with Mr. Mathews, who received company, for the first time this season, on Thursday night. The entertainments were his Mail Coach Adventures, which he gave with so much success the first season. There was, therefore, nothing original—we beg pardon, there was Mr. Mathews, who is himself such an original, as to present a never-failing novelty in his own person, in the Protean shapes that he so successfully assumes. His songs and imitations, with the old Scotch lady's prosing story about 'Sandy Anderson and the Minister,' have evidently lost none of their interest, and were loudly applauded. Mr. Mathews has some novelties in reserve, which will shortly be produced.

SURRY THEATRE.—In addition to Kenilworth, which continues to be played nightly, a burletta, entitled What's a Clock, or the Midnight Hour, has been brought out, and seems likely to keep pace with the former, being extremely successful. Miss Copeland and Fitzwilliam have prominent parts, which they play with much spirit; and the entire performance meets with general and well-merited approbation.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—Kenilworth has been successfully produced at this Theatre; and Mrs. Chatterly, as the Countess of Leicester, and Mrs. Lazenby as Queen Elizabeth, play their respective characters very effectively. The piece differs materially in performance from that of the Surry Theatre; but though, as there, Varney falls in to the tray laid for his mistress, the curtain drops more abruptly, and the close is less interesting.—A lively interlude, called the Green Room, deserves favourable mention, and Thérèse has been added to the list of popular pieces.—Mrs. Chatterly is the heroine and plays her part with great judgment and effect and Mr. Rowbotham's Carwin deserves more praise than any other character we have seen him assume.

EAST LONDON THEATRE.—Thérèse, has been played at this theatre every evening for a week past, and, from the very respectable manner in which it is put up, both as to the scenery and acting, must afford much entertainment to those who, from the great distance of the theatres royal, are not able to attend its representation there. We have often spoken in terms of commendation of the corps dramatique, and they never deserved it better than on this occasion.—Mrs. Paine plays the unfortunate Mariette naturally and delightfully; Montague as Carwin, and Downe as the Pastor, deserve a favourable notice; and Herring, at all times amusing, excited much merriment in the character of the farmer.

Literature and Science.

Mr. Bagster has just completed his beautiful edition of the Book of Common Prayer, in eight languages, and had the honour of presenting a copy to his Majesty, at the last levee, when it was graciously received. This volume is elegantly printed, and presents, at one view, the text in English, French, modern Greek, Italian, German, Spanish, Greek and Latin. The editors and translators are men of acknowledged talent, and the work is one that does much credit to the enterprising spirit of the publisher.

Earthquake.—Zante has been destroyed by an earthquake. The best intelligence respecting this melancholy event, is detailed in the following extract from a letter dated Corfu, Jan. 10th, 1821.—'I have only one piece of news to give you, which is a very sad one, and which, perhaps, you will have heard before this letter reaches you,—the destruction of Zante by an earthquake. On the twenty-ninth, at three in the morning, we had a very smart shock here, which, however, did no damage, and, as they are very frequent, little notice was taken of it; but the first boats from Zante brought up news, that, on the same morning, at about twenty minutes before four, they experienced a most violent shock, which overthrew a great many houses. The people all ran into the streets, and most into the church of St. Dionysius, the patron saint; but scarce had they been there a short time when another shock, much stronger than the first, came and finished what the other had left undone. Upwards of a thousand houses are much injured; five hundred, or more, so much so that they are obliged to pull them down; and numbers totally overthrown. Providentially very few lives were lost, only ten; but many people severely wounded and bruised. The escape of the officers of the 36th regiment was most miraculous. They had given a great party to the gentlemen of Zante, and broke up only ten minutes before the earthquake; the house was thrown down to its very foundation. The house of Cavalier Bulga, the finest in the town, is also destroyed, together with a most valuable library.

'What rendered the state of these unfortunate people much more lamentable, was that, immediately after, a most violent hurricane arose, accompanied by a heavier shower of hail than ever before experienced. You must not accuse me of exaggeration, for I copy our official dispatches, when I tell you that the hailstones were an inch and a half in diameter, and weighed nearly three ounces. This shower lasted some time, and then changed to violent torrents of rain: two people were drowned in the streets; and to complete all, the sea rose and carried away two more houses. The house of Sir Patrick Ross, the governor, is half down. Lord Strangford (the English ambassador) and his lady, notwithstanding the hurricane, were obliged to go on board the Cambrian frigate, which, when the dispatches came away, was not expected to ride out the gale.

'Only conceive the misery of these poor people, who, afraid to return into their houses, and many without any to return to, were exposed three days and nights in the open air, to such dreadful weather. What further damage may have been done is not known, or whether they have had any more shocks, as it has blown so tremendously this last fortnight, that no boats have been able to put to sea. Great fears are entertained that they have had another, as we last week felt two very smart shocks here, one at half-past seven in the evening, and another at one in the morning. This earthquake has been felt in all the islands, and at Malta, and we are afraid Sicily has suffered. This is the second town which has been destroyed in two years. Zante was the largest and best built town of all the islands, and would have been reckoned a fine town on the continent. As to Santa Maura, it is a most wretched place. The earthquakes there lasted two months, and during that time, there were felt eight hundred and thirty shocks, great and small. Every house in the town and castle is cracked in all directions, and more than half thrown down, the barracks destroyed, and the bridge broken in many places. One shock in particular, was very remarkable, for the earth trembled or shivered continually, from half-past five in the afternoon till twelve at night.

'Jan 14.—The courier is on the point of sailing; I therefore can only say a very few words. The earthquake at Zante has been still more calamitous than was supposed; four hundred and sixty-three houses have been totally destroyed, and five hundred more so much injured, that it will be necessary to pull them down,—besides whole villages in the country totally destroyed.'—Phil. Mag.

German Sausages.—Dr. J. Kerner has discovered that smoked sausages, a favourite food of the inhabitants of Wirtemberg, contain often a deadly poison. The effects of the poison are ordinarily manifested in spring time or the month of April, in a manner more or less alarming. In a periodical paper which appears at Tubingen, Mr. Kerner has published a number of observations on the subject, and he has now in the press, a work in which he treats of it more in detail. He states that, out of seventy-six persons who fell sick from having eaten sausages, thirty-seven died in a short time; while others remained valetudinarians for years. Liver sausages appear to be the most dangerous. 'In general,' says M. Kerner, 'the poison is formed in raw, hushed, and seasoned flesh, after being stuffed in gut and smoked. This animal poison is distinguished from all others by this circumstance—that it does not attack the brain and spinal marrow, while it paralyzes the whole lymphatic system. Sometimes the patient for many months together ceases to feel his heart beat, whilst the pulsation of the arteries remains invariable.' All the observations of M. Kerner are supported by cases which have come within his own experience.

LUCRETIVS.

A gentleman, who, while his wife was alive, passed every evening for thirty years with another lady, was advised to marry her when his helpmate died. 'Why, no,' said he, 'if I did, I should not know where to go and pass my evenings.'

Introduction of Forks at Table.—Mr. Cole, the antiquary, in a letter to Dr. Percy, says,—'I have in my custody a very curious old knife and fork, if it may be so called, having only one point, about four or five inches long, and from the shaft made like a bodkin; they are fellows of the same fashion, being, as to the handles or hafts, both of ebony, neatly inlaid with ivory, and are, I make no doubt, at least three hundred years old. They were found at Stamford, some years ago, together with a neat stiletto or dagger.'—Cole's MSS. vol. 24, p. 42.

There is a monument at Berne, erected to the memory of a most beautiful woman, who died in childhood. The lady is represented at the moment of resurrection; a kind of grove is sunk, sufficient to contain a statue: in it is placed a large stone, unequally split or broken, and so contrived, that the young wife appears rising from her coffin, just awoke from the sleep of death, holding her child in one hand, and pushing away the stone with the other. The dignity of the figure, her innocence, and the pure celestial joy which shines in her countenance, combines, to give the whole a most pleasing and sublime expression. The epitaph is worthy of the tomb; the lady is supposed to speak—'I hear the trumpet, it penetrates to the depth of the tombs! Awake, child of anguish! the Saviour of the world calls us!—the empire of death is ended, and an immortal palm will crown innocence and virtue. Behold me, Lord, with the infant thou gavest me!'

The following advertisement is copied, verbatim et literatim et punctatim, from the 'Indiana Centinel,' printed at Vincennes, in the United States. We republish it for the amusement of our readers:—

'Friends and citizens,—Having served my country with patriotic valor and feeling, yet actuated with the warmest wishes for the prosperity and happiness of my fellow-citizens, I feel it my duty to offer to them my services in the civil department.

'I have fought for liberty and my country; I have arrested the tomahawk when raised against the innocent; and, therefore, since it is no longer in my power to direct our soldiers to the fight, accept my friends of the humble offer of my talents for the office of assistant judge.

'Who is deserving of the civil office, if the soldier bred to the art of war, and accomplished in every thing interesting to society, is not: who has toiled, with hunger, with cold and danger, to protect the rights of the people?'

Early in the ensuing week, will be published, THE LILIAN BRIDE, and other Poems. BY BARTON WILFORD. Sherwood, Neely, and Jones.

NEW NOVEL.

This day is published, dedicated (by permission) to Mrs. Joanna Bailie, price 21s. boards, FAVOURITE OF 'NATURE. A Novel. In Three Volumes 12mo. Printed for G. and W. B. Whittaker, Ave-Maria Lane.

Also, just published, SUCH IS THE WORLD. A Novel. In Three Vols. 12mo. price 21s. boards.

MEMOIR of Mrs. DYOTT, written by herself, with a striking likeness of the Author; accounting for her separation from General Dyott, with various letters of the General and other persons, with this motto: 'Patience is the surest remedy against calamities: Time, soon or late, discovers their truth.'

This work is replete with portraits of statesmen; among others, James Hartley, of New Bridge Street, and Thomas McKiernon, of the house of Slade, Bedford, and Slade, Doctors' Commons. A word is said of Randle Jackson, Esq., Barrister at Law; with remarks on the testimony of Robert Thompson, Esq., of South Audley Street; Coloneli Dade and Disbrow, &c. Printed for W. Wright, 46, Fleet Street, in royal 8vo. price 2s.

TO READERS & CORRESPONDENTS.

'THE FAMILY TRUNK,' No. IV., 'FANCIAL PORTRAITS,' No. III., Anecdotes of the Highlanders, and Lines by Mr. Ball, is out next.

W. and Wilford are received. L. will find a letter with our publisher. D.'s letter on 'Paintings in Churches,' is completely anticipated by the one already inserted from Mr. Price. It will be left at our office for him, as he requests.

We have received a letter from the Rev. T. Smith, in which he distinctly denies having sent the review of Walsingham's Arithmetic, inserted in a preceding number, or of having given any instructions whatever for a copy of that one of his well-wishers, desirous of serving him, had, without apprising him of his intention, sent the book and review in question. We should have inserted Mr. Smith's letter, but for the same reason that we refused one which questions the originality of his additions to the arithmetic, viz. that we wish to drop the subject.

Erasmus, p. 120, col. 2, l. 11, for 'Henry read Ernest.'

'The full price will be given by our Publisher, for saleable copies of No. 87 of the Country Literary Chronicle. Both Editions of The Literary Chronicle becoming very scarce, regular Subscribers are advised to complete their sets without delay.'

London.—Published by J. Linbird, 206, Strand, two doors East of Exeter Change; where advertisements are received, and communications for the Editor (post paid) are to be addressed. Sold also by Sotheby, 75, St. Paul's Church Yard; Chapman, Pall Mall; Grapich, Liverpool; and by all Booksellers and Remotely.—Printed by Jackson, 10, Bowdler Court, Gutter Street.

Review of New Books.

Universal Science, or the Cabinet of Nature and Art; comprising above One Thousand entertaining and instructive Facts and Experiments, selected from various departments of Natural Philosophy, and the useful Discoveries in the Arts. Illustrated by numerous Engravings on Wood. By Alexander Jamieson, Author of the Grammars of Rhetoric and Poetic Literature, and of Universal Geography, &c. 2 vols. 12mo. pp. 858. London, 1821.

MR. JAMIESON, who is the author of several popular works on education, in a modest preface, states the object of the present volumes, as intended 'to conduct the student through a scientific course, in a safe and easy mean, between the two extremes of turgid verbosity on the one hand, and verbose digression on the other. And, to accomplish this desirable end, a selection has been made of those branches of scientific knowledge, which presented the greatest variety of instructive facts and popular experiments. But to blend amusement with instruction, the fine arts have been resorted to, and the whole range of manufactures which have received improvements from modern discoveries in chemical science, has been ransacked, to present to the reader whatever was curious and deserving attention.' Extensive as this field may appear, yet it does not, by any means, show the ample range which the author has taken; and we shall, therefore, recapitulate the principal subjects, which are as follows:—Geology, geological phenomena, meteorology, geographical science, refining metals, the philosophy of the vegetable kingdom, outlines and phenomena of animated nature, astronomy, chronology, heraldry, military and naval tactics, physics, mechanics, acoustics, algebra, arithmetic, geometry, architecture, the fine arts, printing, sculpture, engraving, coining, domestic arts, philosophical and other scientific experiments, manufactures, bleaching, optics, mechanical arts, &c.

Vol. III.

'Universal science,' it will be seen, is a complete handmaid to the arts, calculated to make the reader a scientific maid of all work, or, to use a still more homely phrase, a perfect Jack of all trades. We confess, we wish the author's plan had been more limited; the arrangement, too, is not very judicious; and there are some things which we should have wished altogether omitted. The Yankee story of the sea serpent should be better authenticated before it is included in the list of natural phenomena; and we cannot tell what the 'plague in the time of Justinian' has to do under the title of 'Domestic Arts.' Perhaps the author, adopting a high authority, that 'a rose under any other name would smell as sweet,' thought that an interesting article could not be misplaced any where. Having now stated what we conceive to be objectionable, we turn to the more pleasing task, of noticing what is worthy of praise. Varied as the information is which this work contains, yet it is in general judiciously selected from the best authorities; in matters of science, the latest improvements are noticed; in geography, astronomy, geology, the latest discoveries detailed; in natural history, the classification and arrangement is scientific and perspicuous; and the whole work is written in that concise and intelligible style, which renders it familiar to the humblest aspirant after learning, and of value to all classes. Although we are well aware, that neither one, two, nor even a dozen extracts will give a sufficient idea of the character of the work, yet, as we generally wish to enable our readers to judge for themselves, we take one or two articles almost at random:—

'Microscopic View of Spiders Weaving their Webs.—Of all the beautiful discoveries with which we have become acquainted, through the progress of the physical sciences, there are none more striking than those of the microscope, or which may be studied with greater ease. The application of a powerful lens to any of those minute objects which we have it daily in our power to examine, exhibits a scene of wonder, of which those who have never witnessed it cannot form an adequate idea.

'For example, the construction of cobwebs has in all ages been lightly esteemed; nevertheless, for simplicity of machinery and neatness of execution, they cannot be surpassed by the art of man. The spinners are the apparatus, through which, by a most wonderful process, the spider draws its thread. Each spinner is pierced, like the plate of a wire-drawer, with a multitude of holes, so numerous and exquisitely fine, that a space, often not bigger than a pin's point, includes above a thousand. Through each of these holes proceeds a thread of an inconceivable tenuity, which, immediately after issuing from the orifice, unites with all the other threads, from the same spinner, into one. Hence from each spinner proceeds a compound thread; and these four threads, at the distance of about one tenth of an inch from the apex of the spinner, again unite, and form the thread we are accustomed to see, which the spider uses in forming its web. Thus a spider's web, even spun by the smallest species, and when so fine that it is almost imperceptible to our senses, is not, as we suppose, a single line, but a rope, composed of at least four thousand strands. But to feel all the wonders of this fact, we must follow Leuwenhoek in one of his calculations on the subject. This renowned microscopic observer found, by an accurate estimation, that the threads of the minutest spiders, some of which are not larger than a grain of sand, are so fine, that four millions of them would not exceed in thickness one of the hairs of his beard! Now we know that each of these threads is composed of above four thousand still finer. It follows, therefore, that above sixteen thousand millions of the finest threads which issue from such spiders, are not, altogether, thicker than a human hair.

'In the earlier part of last century, Bob, of Languedoc, fabricated a pair of stockings and a pair of gloves from the threads of spiders. They were nearly as strong as silk, and of a beautiful grey colour!'

As so many accidents occur from poison, the following familiar rules, explaining the symptoms, and the antidotes necessary to counteract their effect, should be universally known, although we hope our readers will never have occasion to apply them:—

Poisons, with their Symptoms and Antidotes.

Concentrated acids: the vitriolic, nitric, muriatic, oxalic, &c.—Symptoms. Burning pain, vomiting. Matter thrown up effervesces with chalk, or salt of tartar, or lime, or magnesia.—Antidote. Calined magnetia: one ounce to a pint of warm or cold water. A glassful to be taken every two minutes, so as to excite vomiting. Soap, or chalk and water; mucilaginous drinks afterwards, such as linseed-tea, or gum arabic and water.

Alkalies: soda, ammonia, lime, &c.—Symptoms. Nearly the same: the ejected matter does not effervesce with alkalis, but with acids.—Antidote. Vinegar and lemon juice: a spoonful or two in a glass of water very frequently; simply warm water.

Mercurial preparations: corrosive sublimate, &c. &c.—Symptoms. Sense of constriction in the throat: matter vomited sometimes mixed with blood.—Antidote. White of eggs: twelve or fifteen eggs beat up and mixed with a quart of cold water. A glass full every three minutes. Milk, gum-water, linseed-tea.

Arsenical preparations: white arsenic, &c.—Symptoms. Extreme irritation, pain, sickness, and speedy death, if the poison be not soon counteracted.—Antidote. Warm water, with sugar, in large quantities, to excite vomiting. Lime-water, soap and water, pearl-ash and water, mucilaginous drinks.

Preparations of copper, brass, &c. viridigris, half-pence, pins, &c. &c.—Symptoms. Nearly the same as from mercury.—Antidote. White of eggs: (see under mercury,) mucilaginous drinks.

Preparations of antimony: emetic tartar, &c.—Symptoms. Extreme sickness, with other symptoms of poison, as above stated.—Antidote. Warm water, or sugar and water; afterwards a grain of opium, or fifteen drops of laudanum every quarter of an hour, for two or three times.

Nitre.—Symptoms. Obstinate vomiting, sometimes of blood, &c. &c.—Antidote. The same as for arsenic, with the exception of lime water and alkalies.

Phosphorus.—Symptoms. Like mineral acids.—Antidote. Same treatment.

Lead: sugar of lead, goldard extract, &c.—Symptoms. Great pain in the stomach, with constipation of the throat, &c. &c.—Antidote. Large doses of Glauber's or Epsom salts, in warm water.

Opium, henbane, hemlock, nuxvomica, deadly nightshade, berries, mushrooms, &c. &c.—Symptoms. Stupor, desire to vomit, heaviness in the head, dilated pupil of the eye, delirium, and speedy death.—Antidote. Four or five grains of tartar emetic in a glass of water; if this does not succeed, four grains of blue vitriol, as an emetic. Do not give large quantities of water. After the poison has been ejected, give vinegar, lemon juice, or cream of tartar. Strong coffee also is useful.

Poison of the yellow-billed sprat.—Antidote. Solution of sugar.

Opium and arsenic, it is well known, are poisons; and, as the effects of these are often fatal before medical aid can be procured, it may not be improper to state briefly the principal antidotes to either. When poison of any kind has been swallowed, the immediate object should always be that of endeavouring to excite vomiting; but much time is often lost by waiting the operations of medical emetics, when the discharge from the stomach might be much more speedily effected by mechanical means. Let, then, the persons who are about the individual who has taken poison, force a feather, or a piece of stick, or any thing that can be immediately procured, down the throat, and thus continue to irritate the parts till vomiting is induced. Emetics are, of course, to be administered as soon as they can be procured, when the power of swallowing is not suspended. After the contents of the stomach have thus been discharged, it is of consequence to recollect that acids are the best correctives of opium, and alkalies of arsenic.

In the one case, that of opium, then, let vinegar or lemon juice, diluted with about an equal quantity of water, be freely and copiously administered: in the other, that of arsenic, let a solution of soap in water be made as strong, and poured down as quickly as possible. This last answers a double purpose, the alkali of the soap acting upon the acid of the arsenic, and thus destroying its virulence; and the oily principle of this material, liberated, in some measure, from its alkali, seems to lubricate the coat of the stomach, and thus, at once, to abate the inflammation already excited, and to defend the parts from the further influence of the poison.

In our last number, we gave an account of the deception of the automaton chess-player, and we now quote, from Mr. Jamieson, a brief history of the invention itself:—

The automaton chess-player was constructed by Monsieur de Kempelen, an Hungarian gentleman, and one of the Aulic Council. He was well skilled in mechanics, and an admirable chess-player. Being at Vienna in 1769, he had the honour of playing chess with the Empress Queen, Maria Theresa, who said to him, "I believe, Monsieur de Kempelen, you think I play very ill." To which he answered, "Indeed, madam, I could make an automaton, which would play as well as your Majesty." The Empress took him at his word, and drew a promise from him that he would produce such an ingenious piece of mechanism. This he executed in the course of six months, and brought it to Vienna, where it was exhibited, to the delight and astonishment of all who saw it.

After Monsieur de Kempelen had finished and exhibited his automaton, and had returned to his house, he undertook many other mechanical works, of a more useful description, and neglected this fine specimen of art, so that it gradually became rusty and out of order. But when the King and Queen of Sweden visited Vienna, under the titles of Count and Countess of the North, the Emperor Joseph, recollecting the automaton, and thinking it might amuse his royal guests, sent for it, and Monsieur de Kempelen, to Vienna. Its repairation occupied him for five weeks; after which it was shown to the court, with the greatest applause; and he was recommended to take it with him into foreign countries, for the purpose of exhibition. Having accordingly obtained from the Emperor leave of absence for two years, Monsieur de Kempelen set out on his tour, and visited many of the capitals of Europe with the most abundant success. His first exhibition was at Paris, where he also showed a speaking figure, capable of uttering a few words.

In taking our leave of this work, we must observe, that there are few persons who may not receive benefit by its perusal:—to the young student it will be a good induction,—to ladies and country gentlemen, who may wish to know a little of every thing, and to be enabled to converse on all subjects, without the labour of progressive study, it will be an admirable vade mecum; to the mere idler it will furnish much entertainment; nor should the matured student despise it, as he may readily refresh his memory on scientific subjects, by turning to its pages.

Memoirs of the Life of Nicholas Poussin. By Maria Graham. 8vo. pp. 236. London, 1820.

Mrs. GRAHAM is a very agreeable writer, and imparts considerable interest to her works, whether narrating a tour in India, describing the banditti in the mountains of Italy, or tracing the progress of genius in the immortal Poussin. It is true, that as a critic on the Fine Arts, she will not rank very high, nor does she pretend to it, though her remarks are sometimes acute, and in general very just. Her Memoirs of Poussin not only embrace all the prominent incidents in the life of that artist, but also contain some judicious reflections on the Fine Arts generally, and on the various degrees of encouragement afforded in different countries.

Nicholas Poussin was born at Andelys, in Normandy, in June, 1594: a place which, possessing many natural beauties, fostered the early love of art which he manifested. The sketches that young Poussin made among these agreeable scenes, attracted the attention of Quintin Varin, a native of Amiens, then residing at Andelys, who became his first master, and to whom he doubtless owed the success of his future life. 'But the study of Varin, and the little town of Andelys, afforded no models that could satisfy the genius of Poussin. He felt that there was greater excellence which might be attained, and must be sought for, and, accordingly, at the age of eighteen, he went alone, friendless and almost moneyless, to Paris.' Here his first master was Ferdinand Elle, a Fleming; but he soon left him, and became a pupil of L'Allemand. While in Paris, he gained many friends, particularly a young nobleman of Poitou, who not only furnished him with money to enable him to prosecute his studies, but also procured him a large collection of excellent prints, and a number of original drawings, which he eagerly and carefully copied, and thus began to form his taste for that grand and chaste style which distinguishes his works:—

'He often talked of this as the most fortunate occurrence of his life, for it opened to him a glimpse of that light he had so ardently longed for, and taught him to conceive his subjects nobly and historically.

'These advantages were, however, soon followed by a reverse, peculiarly irksome to one of Poussin's character. The young nobleman who had so liberally patronized him, was recalled by his mother to his country seat, and persuaded Poussin to accompany him, as he intended to embellish his house, and to give the direction of the improvements to his friend, whom he also meant to employ to paint several pictures for him. But the mother appears to have had little taste, and no value for the Fine Arts; she put an end to all her son's projects of improvement, and, instead of fostering the rising genius of her guest, she ridiculed his pursuits, overwhelmed him with a load of domestic accounts, and sought to convert him into a domestic drudge; till, at length, wearied of her harshness and pride, he left her castle, and set out on foot to return to Paris.

'Without money, and without acquaintance, the talents which he had hitherto thought only of improving and enlarging, he had now to exert for his daily subsistence. Accordingly, in the towns he had to pass through on his way to Paris, he sold small pictures in distemper at a very low price, and painted the borders and ornaments of the rooms of private houses; but his gains were so inconsiderable, and his labours so severe, that on reaching Paris, he was seized with a dangerous illness, the consequence of over-exertion, and bad or scanty sustenance, and was obliged to return to Andelys, where he remained nearly a year in his father's family, during which period he continued to paint, sometimes in oil, for very low prices. His necessities forced him to adopt the practice of painting in distemper, for the sake of expedition; and to his early practice of that method, may in part be attributed the hardness observable even in his best pictures, at the same time that he owed to it much of his readiness and facility.'

Poussin afterwards went to Florence, thence returned to Paris, where he studied anatomy and perspective, and lastly he went to Rome. His reputation rapidly increased, and the most splendid offers were made him. 'He might have commanded any fortune, but his desires were very moderate, and after he had fixed the price of his pictures, which he rather undervalued, he specified the sum on the back of the piece; if, after that, any one sent him more than the price fixed, he returned the money.' Poussin possessed a fine person and an amiable disposition, and died, universally regretted, in 1665, at the age of seventy-one.

Mrs. Graham has printed Fenelon's two dialogues on the talents of Poussin, and a catalogue of his works; she has also inserted some of his letters, two of which we shall extract. The first relates to his accepting the situation of first painter to Louis XIV. an office which envy did not long permit him to retain:—

"To the Commander del Pozzo.

'Full of confidence in the good-will which you have always shewn me, I think it my duty to give you an account of the fortunate success of my journey, as well as of my situation, and the place I inhabit, that you, my kind protector, may know where to lay your commands on me. My health was very good during the whole journey from Rome to Fontainebleau, where I was very honourably received in the palace, by a nobleman deputed for that purpose, by M. de Noyers; from thence I was taken to Paris, in that minister's coach, and had scarcely arrived when he came out to meet me, embraced me in a friendly manner, and showed very great pleasure at seeing me in France. At night I was conducted, by his orders, to the place he had destined for my apartment: it is a little palace, for so it may be called, in the midst of the garden of the Thuilleries, containing nine chambers on three stories, without reckoning the ground floor, which consists of a kitchen, a porter's lodge, a hall, and three convenient rooms for domestic purposes. There is, besides, a beautiful and spacious garden, planted with fruit trees and vegetables of all kinds, a pretty plot of flowers, three little fountains, a well, a very handsome court, and a stable. I have a beautiful view from my windows, and I can imagine that in summer this rereat must be a perfect paradise. I found the centre apartment furnished nobly, and all necessary provisions laid in, even to fire-wood and a cask of old wine. For three days my friends and I were entertained at the King's expense. The fourth day, M. de Noyers presented me to the cardinal, who took my hand, embraced me, and treated me with extraordinary condescension. A few days afterwards, I was taken to St. Germain, where M. de Noyers was to have presented me to the King; but M. de Noyers being indisposed, I was not introduced until the next day, when M. le Grand, one of the court favourites, introduced me. The good and gracious prince deigned to caress me, and asked me a good many questions, during the half hour he kept me with him; after which, turning round to the court, he said, 'I think we have taken in Vouet;' and then he ordered me to paint the great pictures for his Chapel of Fontainebleau and St. Germain. When I went home, they brought me two thousand crowns in gold, in a handsome blue velvet purse. One thousand for my salary, and one thousand for my journey, without reckoning my expenses. And, indeed, money is very necessary in this country, where every thing is extremely dear.

'I have now turned my thoughts upon the works I am to execute; they are pictures, cartoons for tapestry, and many other things. I shall have the honour of sending you a specimen of my first labours, as a tribute of gratitude; and as soon as my packages arrive, and I am relieved from uneasiness on account of them, I hope to portion my time in such a manner as to employ a part of it in the service of your brother, the chevalier.

'I recommend my little household interests to your care, since you deign to take charge of them during my absence, which shall not be long if I can help it. I beseech you, since you are born to be kind to me, to bear, with your usual generous patience, the trouble I must give you, and to content yourself in return with my entire affection. May the Lord grant you a long and happy life. As to me, with all the respect of which I am capable, &c. &c. &c. POUSSIN."

Paris, Jan. 6, 1661.

The next letter, which is said to be the last that Poussin ever wrote, contains some valuable hints on the general principles of art, expressed with that modesty which forms so bright an ornament to true genius:—

'Poussin to M. de Chantelou.

'I must, at length, endeavour to awake after my long silence. I must raise my voice while my pulse still faintly beats. I have had full leisure to read and to weigh your book upon the perfect idea of painting, which has been a sweet solace to my afflicted mind. I rejoice that you are the first Frenchman to open the eyes of those who see only through the medium of others, and suffer themselves to be led astray after the crowd. Now you have warmed and softened a metal, hitherto stiff and difficult to handle, so that henceforth others may be found, who, by imitating you, will give us something useful upon painting. After having considered the distribution that the Sieur François Junius makes of the parts of this noble art, I venture briefly to write down here what I have learned from him. It is necessary, first, to know what the nature of imitation is, and to define it.

“DEFINITION.

“Painting is an imitation by means of lines and colours, on some superficies, of every thing that can be seen under the sun; its end is to please.

“Principles that every man capable of reasoning may learn.—There can be nothing represented without light, without form,

without colour,
without distance,
without an instrument,
or medium.

“Things which are not to be learned, and which make an essential part of painting:—

“First, the subject must be noble. It should have received no quality from the mere workman; and to allow scope to the painter to display his powers, he should choose it capable of receiving the most excellent form. He must begin by composition, then ornament, propriety, beauty, grace, vivacity, costume, probability, and judgment, in each and all. These last belong solely to the painter, and cannot be taught. They are the golden bough of Virgil, which no man can find or gather if his fate do not lead him to it. These nine parts deserve, on several accounts, to be treated by some good and learned author.”

In speaking of the intimacy between Poussin and his patron, Chevalier Marini, in Paris, our author has the following just reflections, which, however, are not the most honourable to our national character:—

“It is remarkable that Marini was an Italian. Probably no French nobleman of the time would have received a painter into his house as his intimate friend. But the Italians have of all nations the least affectation. What they feel they express, to please themselves, without any consideration of what construction others may put on their actions. In France, where vanity, and in England, where pride, induces every man to consider and foresee his neighbour's judgment, it is difficult for an artist, whose reputation is not already established, to arrive at that intercourse with polite or learned society, which ought to form a part of his education. The Italian painters, on the contrary, were courted into such society. Michael Angelo, in the palace of the Medici, while he received their patronage equally with Politian, was equally treated as their friend and companion; and that nothing vulgar ever enters into his conceptions, may, in part, be attributed to his constant intercourse with the politest and most learned men of his time. Hitherto, with the exception of a very few instances, our English artists have been too much a people by themselves. If they look to nature for action or expression, it is to the exaggerated action and expression of the stage, or the mean and sordid action of vulgar life that they have been driven. Hence, in part, the failure in most of our historical pictures, exaggeration on one hand, and want of dignity on the other. The excellence we have, that of colour, is perhaps the most seducing quality of painting; and it might be worth while to inquire how far our national and local situation has contributed to form our school.”

With this extract we close the volume, which, we confess, has pleased us much, notwithstanding the long sentences and the inaccuracies which sometimes disfigure the style.

What is Life? and other Poems. By Thomas Bailey. 12mo. pp. 136. London, 1820.

There is no part of our critical labours which gives us more anxiety than in speaking of the first productions of an author. Gladly would we extend a fostering hand to youthful genius, but justice and even charity to the author sometimes compels us to withhold all encouragement, when we find the work destitute of merit and giving no promise of future excellence in the writer. Such, however, is not the case with the work before us, which is the first production of an untutored shopkeeper at Nottingham; whose study, he tells us, ‘has been, like the pedlar's dwelling, every where—in the street, the field, the river side, his shop, hearth, and chamber;’ and further, that he never in his life has been ‘enabled to devote a single half day, uninterruptedly, to literary pursuits.’ These are not very favourable circumstances, and yet, under all the disadvantages with which Mr. Bailey has had to contend, he has produced pieces which bespeak no ordinary mind, and which would intimate a cultivation his has never had. The principal poem, ‘What is Life?’ abounds in beautiful poetic images, in which force and simplicity are often happily blended; while a strong religious feeling pervades the whole. One extract will justify this remark:—

‘Say, what is life? Oh! ‘tis the soul's full worth!

A treasure, far transcending aught on earth.

Would'st thou the value know of Life? ask Death!

Ask him, what's pois'd upon frail mortal's breath.

Would'st thou, with just appreciation, learn The awful things which on that pivot turn? Scale Heaven's sublime, gaze Hell's vast dark profund,

And stretch the line eternal ages round; Explore that flood, whose limit's yet unknown, For ever flowing round the Godhead's throne; Which stands unmov'd whilst endless ages beat Their unfeeling surges 'gainst its steadfast seat; Hang from yon splendid bow, which, rais'd on high,

Spans the broad earth, and bears th' incumbent sky, Some mighty beam; such as at Nature's birth, Heaven's self employ'd, to weigh the pond'rous earth:

Snatch from their orbs the planets, as they roll, Poise suns and worlds against a human soul; And, as the loaded balance trembling turns, And matter's cumbrous mass indignant turns; Thy daring mind shall grasp its mighty cost, And tell the world of Life, by what is gain'd or lost.

The lines ‘on closing the first Canto of Don Juan’ improperly called an Impromptu, are too severe on the noble bard, but they pay such just homage to his genius, that we transcribe them as a very favourable specimen of the author's talents:—

‘Oh! could my muse spread such a daring wing, And o'er my pen such beams of radiance fling, As, wayward Byron, marks thy thrilling page, When kindling lust or rousing passions rage; How should my soul pour forth the mighty strains,

And bid the virtues their lost throne regain; Shed o'er benighted earth the light thou giv'st, And blast proud vice beneath the fires of Heav'n. Why wilt thou still devote thy boundless powers To weaving garlands of wild passion flowers! Or mingling poisons in life's mantling bowl To drown the senses and destroy the soul!

Say, can the polish of the wingful steel Soothe the keen anguish of the wound we feel! Or, can the guided chisel calm the smart To poison'd draught enkindles in the heart! Nor can the corrugations of that light, Whose brilliant flashes charm our wond'ring sight, E'er sanctify thy fierce unhallo'd rays, Which, like the light'nings, blind us whilst we gaze.

Oh! mighty bard! Oh! highly gifted muse! When wilt thou cease thy treasures to abuse? When cease to make thy talents thy disgrace! Fling back the gift, and curse God to his face! Nor dare presume to spend succeeding years In sowing seeds to reap but endless tears. Better thy talents were at once entomb'd! And Byron's name to barren stanzas doom'd! Then his own fires his own dishonesty tell, And serve to light his own vain soul to Hell! But turn thee, wond'rous bard! and seek thy realm: And Heaven shall calm the tumult of thy breast; Its hand confer'd that genius, fortune, life, Which has been wasted 'gainst itself at strife; Like a spoil'd child, thou'st more rebellious prov'd.

And slighted more, because the better lov'd. The torch of genius, in thy daring hand, Sheds beams that slay, and rays that blast the land.

As though the world it was design'd t' illumine,
In madmen's dream, it would fain consume.
But how thy ingrate heart and kiss the rod,
No longer tempt the vengeance of a God;
Rejoicing angels in the courts above,
Shall stay the anthem of redeeming love,
And tune their joyful harps around the throne,
And make, through Heaven, the bard's repentance known.

Madmen, enlightened by thy beaming page,
Shall sound thy praise through ev'ry rolling age,
And future candidates for Fame's fair prize
Shall learn from thee, where man's true glory lies:

Amongst thy country's fam'd poetic sons,
(Whose echoing praise down endless ages runs,
Thou shalt be recogniz'd and own'd,) and shine,
The brightest gem, in that illustrious line.
Byron's proud name his future race shall boast,
When Byron's peerage and his banner's lost;
And sons remote shall in his glory bask,
Nor higher titles claim, nor prouder honours ask.
Then turn thee, mighty bard! and seek thy rest!
Let virtue sooth thy angry wayward breast;
No longer glaring with the comet's light,
Thy beneficent rays shall pour upon our sight,
Sweeping the spheres with a portentous train,
Whose malign aspect virtue seels with pain;
But, like the day spring, shall thy muse then flow
In beaming splendors on the world below."

Although Mr. Bailey has not possessed the advantages of a liberal education, yet his reading is evidently beyond that of persons in his sphere of life in general; this, with a heart possessed of much feeling, have come in aid of his natural genius, and, thus, produced effusions which would do no discredit to less humble aspirants to the Parnassian hill.

Lovers and Friends; or, Modern Attachments. A Novel. By Anne of Swansea. 5 vols. 12mo. pp. 1498. London, 1821.

ALTHOUGH, we believe, the imaginative effusions of this lady, (who is said to be a sister of Mrs. Siddons,) have not come immediately within our notice, so as to give them a distinguished place in our review, we are not unacquainted with her writings as readers, nor will we lose this opportunity of saying a few words on the value of this her last production. But in the performance of this task, we intend to deviate from our usual track, by not giving any extracts, there being many very profound secrets in five volumes, which it would be a pity to disclose. Suffice it to observe, that the work delineates who are 'lovers and friends,' and expressly shows, but too faithfully, what are 'modern attachments.' The history has nothing of the marvellous to give it effect; much truth, blended with fiction, described in natural sentiments and flowing language, cannot fail to render to the reader a valuable portion of instruction for his amusement, his time, and his patience. Even those who are sometimes obliged reluctantly to forego the favourite glass, when the temperature changes and the biliary secretions are irregular, might fill up the chasm of leisure in a less commendable manner than by dipping in to the chapters of Anne of Swansea, whose productions have morality to recommend, interest to support, and smart dialogue to secure them an acquaintance with us and our associations.

THE PERCY ANECDOTES.

THE two last numbers of these popular little works, Parts XV and XVI, are devoted to Anecdotes of Hospitality and Anecdotes of the Bar. Hospitality is a good old English virtue, somewhat on the decline at present, it is true, but still sufficiently exercised to sustain our rational character, while the noble houses of Cavendish, Wentworth, Stanley, Lascelles, Dudley, and Ward, &c. &c. remain; not to forget that 'true born Englishman,' Thomas William Coke, Esq. to whom these Anecdotes are most appropriately dedicated, and of whom an excellent portrait is prefixed. In looking over these two parts rather hastily, we confess, it appears to us, that they possess more original or curious matter than some of their precursors. We shall quote a few passages from each as specimens, and first from Hospitality:—

'Robert, Duke of Normandy.—When Robert, Duke of Normandy, father of William the Conqueror, was at Constantinople, in his way to the Holy Land, he lived in uncommon splendour, and was greatly celebrated for his wit, his affability, his liberality, and his other virtues. Of these, many remarkable examples were related to the emperor, who resolved to put the reality of them to a trial. With this view, he invited the duke and all his nobles to a feast, in the great hall of the imperial palace, but took care to have all the tables and seats filled with guests, before the arrival of the Normans, of whom he commanded that no notice should be taken. When the duke, followed by his nobles in their richest dresses, entered the hall, observing that all the seats were filled with guests, and that none of them returned his civilities, or offered him any accommodation, he walked without the least appearance of surprise or discomposure, to an empty space at one end of the room, took off his cloak, folded it very carefully, laid it upon the floor, and sat down upon it; in all which he was imitated by his followers. In this posture they dined, on such dishes as were set before them, with every appearance of the most perfect satisfaction with their entertainment. When the feast was ended, the duke and his nobles arose, took leave of the company in the most graceful manner, and walked out of the hall in their doublets, leaving their cloaks, which were of great value, behind them on the floor. The emperor, who had admired their whole behaviour, was quite surprised at this last part of it; and sent one of his courtiers to entreat the duke and his followers to put on their cloaks. "Go," said the duke, "and tell your master, that it is not the custom of the Normans to carry about with them the seats which they use at an entertainment." Could any thing be more delicate than this refusal, or more noble, polite, and manly, than this department?

'The Third Earl of Derby.—Edward, the third Earl of Derby, who died in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, lived in the greatest splendour without any dependence on the court. Camden says, that with his death the "glory of hospitality seemed to fall asleep;" and Hollingshed and Stowe make the most honourable mention of him. He offered ten thousand men to the queen, at his own charge, to suppress the rebellion; and among other things "deserving commendation, and craving memory to be limited," Hollingshed enumerates "his godly disposition to his tenants, never forcing any service at their hands, but due payment of their rent; his liberality to strangers, and such as showed themselves grateful to him; his famous house-keeping, and eleven score in check roll [the number of attendants in pay as menial servants] never discontinuing the space of twelve years; his feeding, especially of aged persons, twice a day, three score and odd, besides all coners thrice a week, appointed for his dealing days; and every Good Friday these thirty-five years, one with another, two thousand seven hundred with meat, drink, money, and money's worth.. There never was a gentleman or other that waited in his service, but had allowance from him; to have as well wages as otherwise for horse and man."

'Shipwrecked Mariners.—When the Laurel and Andromeda frigates were wrecked in a violent hurricane in the West Indies, on the coast of Martinique, thirty-five men were thrown ashore alive. The Marquess de Bouille, on hearing of the circumstance, took them to his house, where he treated them most hospitably. After he had got them cured of their bruises and sickness, and had clothed them from head to foot, he sent them with a flag of truce to the commanding officer at St. Lucia, with a letter, stating that these men having experienced the horrors of shipwreck, he would not add those of war, and therefore sent them free and at liberty again to serve their country."

'Ruler of the Feast.—It was the custom among the ancients at feasts, to choose a king or master, to order how much each guest should drink, whom all the company were bound to obey. He was chosen by throwing dice, upon the sides of which were engraven or painted the images of Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Venus, and Diana. He who threw up Venus, was made king; thus Horace,— "Quem Venus dicit arbitrum bibendi."

Sitting below the Salt.

"Thou art a carle mean of degree,
 Ye salt ye thoud stande twain me and thee;
 But as thou hadst been of a gentle steyne,
 I would have bitten my gante againe."

Old English Ballad.

It was formerly the custom not only in Scotland, but also in England and France, to have placed on the middle of the table, a massive piece of plate, which was called the salt foot, or salt vat, and the guests, according to their rank, were placed above or below it. An instance of the importance attached to the circumstance of being seated above the salt, occurs in "the Memoire of the Somervilles," written about the year 1680. "It was," says the author, Lord Somerville, "as much out of pique, as to give obedience to the act of the assemblies, that Walter Stewart, of Allontoun, and Sir James, his brother, both heretors in the parish of Cambsuthen, the first from some antiquity a few of the Earle of Tweddill's, in Auchtermuir, whose predecessors, until this man, never came to sit above the salt foot, when at the Laird of Cambsuthen's (Somerville's) table; which, for ordinary Every Sabbath, they dined at, as did most of the honest men of the parish of any account." The same author is, indeed, so familiar with this usage, as of an every day observance, that he takes notice of it again, in speaking of a Provost of Edinburgh. "He was a gentleman of very mean family upon Clyde, being brother German to the good man of Allentone, whose predecessors never came to sit above the salt foot."

"The distinction of seats in relation to the position of the salt vat, was familiar in France, and is alluded to by Perat; and our early dramatists frequently allude to it as an English custom. Bishop Hall, one of our first legitimate satirists, thus notices it:—

"A gentle squire would gladly entertaine
 Into his house some trencher chaplaine;
 Some willing man that might instruct his sons,
 And that would stand to good conditions.
 First, that he lie upon the truckle bed,
 Whiles his young master lieth o'er his head;
 Second, that he do, on no default,
 Ever presume to sit above the salt."

Hidalgo of the Oronooko.—Much has been written on the pride of the Spanish gentry, known under the denomination of Hidalgos. It is a common fact, that very often these nobles of sixteen quarters possess only one; that they till the ground with their swords girt by their side; and that, while eating their peas and onions, they look with a disdainful eye on the miserable plebeian, who is mean enough to live on poultry and trifles, two dishes unworthy of a stomach, whose origin is lost in the night of time.

"In whatever situation an Hidalgo is, whatever climate he may inhabit, he always preserves his pride, and affects the airs of a prince; it is true that the principality is wanting, but that it is a mere trifle to the pride of birth.

"The celebrated traveller, Baron Humboldt, and one of his friends, were going down the Oronooko in a small boat, when a person from the shore cried to them, and begged them, in the Spanish language, to come and repose themselves in his castle. The two travellers landed, and approached the castle lord, whom they found almost naked, and so sun burnt, that it was impossible to tell his colour. "Gentlemen," said he, "we white people owe each other courtesy, and the duties of hospitality; and I am quite delighted to have an opportunity of exercising them towards you." After this noble speech, he pointed out his castle to the travellers; who, seeing nothing but a grove of palms, supposed the castle lay beyond; but what was their astonishment, when he stopped in the midst of the palms, and said, "here is my home." I will present you to my sister Donna Isabella, and my daughter. The two ladies soon appeared, and as slightly clothed as the seignor; after the customary compliments, a repast was served in union with their appearance. The Hidalgo then informed our two travellers, that he had come to reside in the country; where he traded in oil, procured from turtles' eggs, and that he intended very shortly to build a castle. Night coming on, the seignor ordered a ladder to be brought, and requested our travellers to repose in two hammocks suspended from the palm trees, which shaded this scene of delight. M. Humboldt and his friend had consequently the heavens for their canopy. Scarcely were they in the arms of Morpheus, when Donna Isabella's cat, leaping from one branch to another, fell into the hammock of the baron's friend, who, fancying himself attacked by a tiger, at last roared out lustily. The cat not less afraid, leaped into Mr. Humboldt's hammock, and crossing that of the male Hidalgo, left on his nose unequivocal marks of her passage. The cause being known, our travellers again committed themselves to sleep! but, alas; their sufferings were only commencing! A dreadful storm came on, and they were soon in the situation of the Gascon, who leaped into the river to escape a shower of rain. At day-break our travellers took leave of their host, who said to them on parting, "from the storm we have had, I doubly congratulate myself on having promised you an asylum in my domain." Mr. Humboldt thanked him kindly for his hospitality, but hoped, secretly, that he should never again lodge in a castle in the air."

We have spoken of hospitality as an English virtue; the profession of the bar is English too, but not a virtue; it flourishes on the miseries or bad passions of the multitude. The law, we mean the excess of litigation, is a plague worse than the Egyptians were ever visited with; it is an accumulating and permanent evil, from which neither virtue nor prudence can at all times protect us. The Anecdotes of the Bar appear to us to have been a good deal anticipated in a preceding part of this work,—the Anecdotes of Eloquence; the present collection, however, is not merely confined to quibbles in a court of justice, or to the small wit that is often bandied about between counsel and witnesses, and even among the judges; but it embraces much information on some great constitutional and important questions, apparently culled from sources out of the general track. This part is dedicated to Mr. Denman, but why this gentleman has been selected we know not, unless it is that the present humiliating state of the bar left it a matter of perfect indifference. What a contrast does the state of the bar, twenty or thirty years ago, form with the present day; then we had an Erskine, a Gibbs, a Law, a Wallace, a Scot, a Lee, and a Garrow; now we have—but Cuper shall describe them. They are men—

—Not wholly in the dark;
 But now and then, struck smartly, show a spark Sufficient to redeem the modern race
 From total ruin and absolute disgrace;
 While servile trick and imitative knock
 Confine the million in the beaten track,
 Perhaps some courser, who diadems the road,
 Snuffs up the wind and flings himself abroad."

From the Anecdotes of the Bar, we quote the following in conclusion:—

Slandering a Lawyer.—In the reign of Queen Elizabeth, one Peter Palmer, of Lincoln's Inn, brought an action against a barrister of the name of Boyer, for having, with the intention to injure him in his name and practice, said, "Peter Palmer is a paltry lawyer, and hath as much law as a Jackanapes." It was moved in arrest, that the words would not maintain an action, because they were not slanderous. Had Mr. Boyer said, "Mr. Palmer had no more law than a Jackanapes," it had been actionable, for then he had lessened the opinion of his learning; but the words were, "he hath as much law as a Jackanapes," which was no impeachment of his learning, for every man that hath more law than a Jackanapes, hath as much. Sed non allocatur, for the comparison is to be taken in the worst sense.

Judge Berkley says it has been adjudged, where a person said of a lawyer, "that he had as much law as a monkey," that the words were not actionable, because he had, as much law, and more also; but if he had said, "he hath no more law than a monkey," these words would have been actionable."

Hon. Henry Erskine.—An attorney in a distant part of Scotland, or as he is called there, a writer, representing to an oppressed and needy tacksmen, who had applied to him for advice, the futility of entering into a law-suit with a wealthy neighbour, having himself no means of defending his cause, received for answer, "Ye dinna ken what you say, malster; there's nae a poor man in Scotland need to want a friend, or fear an enemy, while Harry Erskine lives!"

"How much honour did that simple sentence convey to the generous and benevolent object of it! He had, indeed, a claim to the affection and respect of all who were in the knowledge of his extraordinary talents, and more uncommon virtues. To professional knowledge, and powers of eloquence of the highest order, he possessed a liberality of spirit which scrupled at no sacrifice or exertion, where private right was to be vindicated, or the public welfare promoted.

"It is said that Swift, after having written that celebrated satire on mankind, Gulliver's Travels, exclaimed, whilst meditating on the rare virtues of his friend, Arbuthnot, "Oh! were there ten Arbuthnots in the world, I would burn my book." It is difficult to contemplate such a character as Henry Erskine's, without a similar sentiment, without feeling that were there many Erskines, one should learn to think better of mankind.

"The character of Mr. Erskine's eloquence, bore a strong resemblance to that of his noble brother, (Lord Erskine,) but being much less diffusive, it was better calculated to leave a forcible impression. "He was distinguished," says Mr. Jeffrey, in an animated sketch which he has written of his departed friend, "not only by the peculiar brilliancy of his wit, and the gracefulness, ease, and vivacity of his eloquence, but by the still rarer power, of keeping those seducing qualities in perfect subordination to his judgment. By their assistance, he could not only make the most repulsive subjects agreeable, but the most abstruse easy and intelligible. In his profession, indeed, all his wit was argument, and each of his delightful illustrations a material step in his reasoning. To himself, it seemed always as if they were recommended rather for their use than their beauty; and, unquestionably, they often enabled him to state a fine argument or a nice distinction, not only in a more striking and pleasing way, but actually with greater precision than could have been attained by the severer forms of reasoning. In this extraordinary talent, as well as the charming facility of his eloquence, and the constant radiance of good humour and gaiety which enlivened his manner in debate, he had no rival in his own times, and as yet has had no successor."

"Like most men who have a high reputation in society for that wit and hilarity which render social converse so delightful, Mr. Erskine had for a long time the imputed property of almost all the bon-mots and jeu d'esprits circulated in the northern metropolis. An abundant collection of happy thoughts and expressions, the genuine effusions of Henry Erskine, might certainly be formed, without pressing one of doubtful origin into the service; and it becomes, therefore, the more hazardous to offer any thing in the light of specimens of so fertile an excellence. The following we give, not as by any means characteristic of a mind which was once the delight and admiration of, perhaps, the most enlightened capital in Europe; but as the only specimens relating to our immediate subject, which happen at the present moment to lie in our way.

Soon after being called to the bar, Mr. Erskine went a circuit, in the train of the celebrated Lord Kaimes. His lordship, though a man of very enlarged mind, fell sometimes into the sin of being pitifully parsimonious; and on no occasion was he more apt to be so, than when he travelled and feasted at the public expense, and there was a possibility of saving something to himself out of the sum regularly allotted, (in Scotland,) to judges in their official county excursions. On the rising of the court one day, Lord K. invited Mr. E. with some other young barristers, to dine with him. When the cloth was drawn, the company found that port alone was to be the order of the day; hint after hint was given to his lordship, that since the public were to pay, something better might be afforded; his lordship passed over every allusion of the kind unnoticed; and when at last the war oblique seemed verging towards a more direct order of hostilities, he turned towards Mr. Erskine, and with the view of shifting the subject, asked him very gravely, "What could have become of the Dutch?" who had a short time before been dubbed off the Doggerbank, by Admiral Parker. No shift could have been more unfortunate for his lordship. Mr. Erskine, with a smile, replied, "I suppose, my lord, they are like us, confined to port." Lord K., who with all his niggardliness had a mind sensibly alive to the sallies of genius, immediately ordered a supply of the best claret in the house to be placed on the table.

"Some parts of the north-east coast of Scotland, are famous for a peculiar sort of small dried haddocks, called speldings, which are sent in large quantities to the southern counties, and form a prominent article of luxury at all the country fairs.

The best idea that an English reader can form of this luxury is, to suppose himself chewing a strap of leather. The late eccentric Hugo Arnot, author of the history of Edinburgh, who was in his person remarkably meagre, happening one day to come into the Parliament House exercising his jaws on one of these delicacies, Mr. Erskine stepping up to him, said, "I wish you much joy, Mr. Arnot; I never saw you look so like your meat before."

"The same gentleman, Mr. Arnot, was remarkable for the looseness of his opinions with respect to futurity; while Mr. Erskine was as much distinguished on the contrary, for a deep sense of revealed religion, and an attention to every Christian ordinance. One Sunday afternoon, Mr. A. happened to be on horseback, when he met Mr. Erskine returning from divine service. "Where have you been, Harry?" said the historian. "What has a man of your sense and education to do among a parcel of old women? What did you expect to hear? Where was your text?" "Our text," said Mr. Erskine, "was in the sixth chapter of the Revelations: 'And I looked, and beheld a pale horse, and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him.'" Mr. Arnot, who was actually mounted on a pale-coloured horse, felt the sarcasm in all its force; and, muttering a hasty exclamation, rode off.

"On the formation of what was called the Coalition Ministry, Mr. Erskine was appointed to succeed Mr. Henry Dundas, (afterwards Lord Melville,) in the important situation of Lord Advocate for Scotland. On the morning of receiving his appointment, he had an interview with Mr. Dundas, in the Outer Parliament House; when, observing that the ex-premier had already resumed the ordinary stuff gown which all practitioners at the Scottish bar, except the Lord Advocate and Solicitor General for the time being, are in the custom of wearing, gaily said, that "he must leave off talking, and go and order his silk gown to be made." "It is hardly worth while," said Mr. Dundas dryly, "for the time you will want it. You had better borrow mine." Mr. Erskine, with admirable promptness, replied, "From the readiness, Mr. Dundas, with which you make the offer, I have no doubt that your's is a gown made to fit any party; but however short my stay in office may be, it shall never be said of Henry Erskine, that he put on the abandoned habits of his predecessor."

"Mr. Dundas, though foiled in wit, had, however, the advantage in presence. Mr. Erskine held the office for little more than half a year; when the downfall of the Coalition Ministry carried his along with it."

Counsel and Witnesses.—A gentleman who was severely cross-examined by Mr. Dunning, was repeatedly asked if he did not lodge in the verge of the court; at length he answered, that he did. "And pray, sir," said the counsel, "for what reason did you take up your residence in that place?"—"To avoid the rascally impertinence of dunning," answered the witness.

"When Sergeant Cockle was on the northern circuit, he once told a witness that he was very saucy, and followed up the remark by asking, "Pray what sauce do you like best?"—"Any sauce, but Cockle sauce," was the reply."

'At an Old Bailey Sessions, in 1788, a learned counsel thus examined a witness.—"What are you?"—"A Jew."—"Well, what is your Christian name?"—"I never was christened, my lord, but my name is Moses Levi.'

'Humane Jurymen.—"Look at that jurymen in the blue coat," said one of the Old Bailey judges to Justice Nares, "do you see him?"—"Yes."—"Well, we shall not have a single conviction to-day for any capital offence." The observation was verified. This fact was related by Mr. Justice Nares himself, to a magistrate of London.'

'Espectancy.—Lord Norbury, while on a circuit, being attacked with a fit of the gout, sent to the Solicitor General, to request the loan of a pair of large slippers. "Take them," said the solicitor to his servant, "with my respects, as I hope soon to be in his lordship's shoes."

'Independence of the Bar.—Lord Erskine, when at the bar, was always remarkable for the fearlessness with which he contended against the bench. His spirited reply to Justice Buller, in the trial of the Dean of Asaph, is well known; and it is only one out of many instances which might be adduced of similar independence. In the action brought by Mr. Jeffreys against the commissioners, for jewels furnished to the Prince of Wales, Mr. Erskine was counsel for the plaintiff, and evinced considerable warmth in the cause.

'Lord Kenyon, in his charge to the jury, said, he felt much hurt at something that had fallen from the learned counsel for the plaintiff, who had stated that the defence was shameful, illiberal, and unjust.

'Mr. Erskine.—My lord, I did not use those words.

'Lord Kenyon.—Mr. Erskine, I took them down as you uttered them.

'Mr. Erskine.—Then, my lord, you took them down incorrectly.

'Lord Kenyon.—Sir, I desire I may not be interrupted.

'Mr. Erskine explained, that his observations were not applied to the defendants, but to the witnesses; and that not to their general characters, but to their evidence in this cause.

'It was in one of these contests with the bench, that Mr. Erskine explained the rule of his conduct at the bar, in the following terms: "It was," said he, "the first command and counsel of my youth, always to do what my conscience told me to be my duty; and to leave the consequences to God. I shall carry with me the memory, and, I trust, the practice of this paternal lesson to the grave. I have hitherto followed it, and have no reason to complain, that my obedience to it has been even a temporal sacrifice. I have found it, on the contrary, the road to prosperity and wealth, and I shall point it out as such to my children."

HISTORY AND DESCRIPTION

OF THE

LOUVRE IN PARIS.

The situation of the Louvre, on the banks of the Seine, fortunately brings the history and description of that palace within the scope of my work. This immense edifice, for its general effect and for the richness of its architecture, is considered as unrivalled. Neither London, St. Petersburg, Vienna, Berlin, Milan, or Madrid, contains any building that can be placed in competition with it. The Louvre is the production of twenty monarchs and of eight centuries. Twenty sovereigns have commemorated their occupation of the throne by contributing towards the erection of this prodigious palace, and the wealth of eight centuries has been employed in the embellishment of this structure, which the Frenchman with pride points out to strangers. Admiration will be heightened into astonishment at the recent arrangements, at the treasures which the Fine Arts have collected in its vast galleries, and at the preparations which are making for connecting the Tuileries with this palace; improvements which, at the same time that they give greater regularity to its general appearance, will concentrate in it the master-pieces of architecture, painting, and sculpture. Part of the history of France is interwoven in that of this palace, long the residence of her kings, and the theatre of numberless interesting events. Here may also be traced the progress of the Fine Arts, in the various changes which the edifice has undergone during an almost uninterrupted series of additions and embellishments for the space of eight hundred years.

The Louvre is in the same predicament as all ancient structures, inasmuch as neither the etymology of its name, nor the date of its foundation, is positively fixed. With regard to the former, the most plausible conjecture derives it from the Saxon word lower, which signifies castle. Some ancient historians are of opinion that it was built by Dagobert, destroyed by the Normans, and rebuilt by Hugh Capet, about the year 990; yet we find no proof of its existence till the commencement of the eleventh century, when mention is made of it as containing the dogs and horses used by kings for hunting in the contiguous forest.

Though honoured with the appellation of a royal palace, the Louvre long continued to be appropriated to this purpose. The interior had then no accommodations adapted to the reception of a royal inmate, and externally exhibited but a few towers and a very lofty outer-wall, in common with all buildings not situated within towns. In 1804, new suburbs having sprung up round the Louvre, Philip Augustus, with a view to prevent this mansion from being shut up in Paris, inclosed it with a new wall, added numerous towers to the buildings, and, by means of deep ditches, made it a perfect fortress, which protected the city on that side. This monarch likewise erected, in the middle of the oblong quadrangle within, a strong tower, encompassed by an inner ditch, where the great vassals were, on solemn occasions, obliged to appear, for the purpose of doing homage. He used it also for a prison. Here the Count of Flanders was confined, and though its destination was several times changed by succeeding monarchs, still it was applied more particularly to this use till the year 1474.

Notwithstanding these improvements, the Louvre had not yet become a royal habitation; the palace in the Cité, and the castle of Vincennes, long continued to serve for the residence and pleasure-retreat of the French kings; but, under the successors of Philip Augustus, Paris increased with such rapidity, that it was no longer possible to leave the Louvre out of the city. In 1367, Charles V. surrounded it with a new inclosure, and additions made by Charles VI. qualified the Louvre to be the abode of foreign sovereigns. The buildings were raised, and the principal towers having been enlarged, received different names, indicative of their respective appropriations, such as Tower of the Artillery, Tower of the Library, &c. Here be it remarked by the way, that the latter was the first public library in Paris, that is mentioned in history. It was begun by Charles V. named the Wise, with nine hundred volumes. Part of this collection, a valuable one for that age, and the public records, which were kept in the Louvre, were removed to England by the Duke of Bedford, while regent of the kingdom, after the conquest of France by Henry V.

The troubles which prevailed during part of the reign of Charles VII. the gloomy policy of Louis XI. and the distant expedition of Charles VIII., prevented those kings from paying any particular attentions to the Louvre, in which a few alterations only were made in their time. It was in the sixteenth century that it received the principal accessions, or, more correctly speaking, was almost 'wholly rebuilt.' The progress made by the arts at this period, and the good taste of Francis I. could not but communicate a peculiar character of elegance to the buildings erected during his reign. The prince who had begun the palaces of Fontainebleau, Chambord, and Madrid, could not fail to require a plan for rebuilding the Louvre. Pierre Lescot, a Frenchman, had the glory of being the successful candidate; while Serlio, one of the foreign competitors, reflected honour on himself by advising the King to carry into execution a design in which the proportions, decorations, and purity of ancient architecture were revived.

The plan presented by Lescot was adopted. The Louvre was at this time falling into ruin, notwithstanding the extensive repairs which it underwent in 1539, for the reception of Charles V. Part of its ancient buildings and some of its towers were demolished, and in 1541 a real palace arose in their stead. Death prevented Francis from witnessing the execution of his plans, but the works were continued under Henry II. who left the superintendence of them to Lescot. During these two reigns, part of the grand façade, parallel to the Seine, and the wing abutting upon the Pavillon de l'Horloge, were erected. The symmetry of the architecture, and the good taste of the decorations and baso-reliefs, which, however, are perhaps too numerous, mark the brilliant revolution which had taken place in the Fine Arts.

Catherine de Medicis built that wing of the Louvre running toward the Seine and the garden of the Infanta. In the sequel, her successors joined this part to the gallery which is now called Caliere de Musée; it formed a subordinate part of the palace of the Tuilleries, with which it was erected. Charles IX. was the first King of France who fixed his residence in the Louvre, to which the memory of the massacre of St. Bartholomew is unfortunately attached. When the termination of the civil wars permitted Henry the Great to turn his attention to the embellishment of the capital, he issued orders for the prosecution of the works of the Louvre. To this prince we are indebted for the pavilion, which forms the entrance to the Museum, and for part of the gallery, in which he caused models, in relief, of the principal cities, to be deposited. He himself resided in that part which looks into the garden of the Infanta. By an ordinance of 1608, he appropriated to artists the apartments situated under this gallery.

With all the encouragement bestowed upon literature and the arts by Francis I. and his successors, they could scarcely have failed to prosper in France. These monarchs were solicitous to collect around them, men qualified to confer honour on their country, upon whom they lavished emoluments and distinctions. Thus the same palace became the seat of power and genius—an admirable union, the one protecting, the other leading to immortality.

Under Louis XIII. J. le Mercier directed the works upon a new plan, which quadrupled the extent of this palace. The Pavillon de l'Horloge, and the wing which terminates that front, were completed. Another range of building, running back, and marking out the square form of the court, was erected; the façade along the Seine was enlarged, and the great gallery finished. These works, though of considerable magnitude, instead of completing the Louvre, merely served to trace the outline of a new plan, the execution of which required a great length of time and large sums of money. Cardinal Mazarin, during the minority of Louis XIV., directed his attention to the exterior façades of the Louvre—a decoration that was not contemplated by any of the plans previously proposed, Leveau, the architect, built two of them; one was afterwards suppressed by Perrault, and the other is that which runs parallel to the rue St. Honoré. About the same time, the foundation of a new façade was laid, in the Place St. Germain l'Auxerrois; but a change of ministry fortunately put a stop to this work, which would have been alike unworthy of the magnificence of the sovereign and of the brilliant era of Louis XIV.

Before I proceed to this period, so glorious for the Fine Arts, I shall take a rapid survey of the general appearance of the Louvre in 1664. We have seen, that for six centuries it was the peculiar object of the special attention of several monarchs; we have watched the additions gradually made to it, and its successive embellishments. Unfortunately, this series of works, executed after different plans, exhibited only the shapeless mass of the early buildings, and numerous decorations, which were highly incongruous, because they were the results of the progressive improvement of taste. Surrounded with private materials and buildings, this palace still required the expenditure of large sums, and, above all, an architect of talent to combine and harmonize the ancient with the modern buildings. In 1664, Colbert succeeded Ratabon in the office of surintendant. He conceived that the importance of the works authorized the measure of a public competition, and, for the first time, artists of all countries were invited to furnish plans for the completion of the Louvre. The plan of Claude Perrault, though afterwards followed, was at first rejected, on account of the novelty of the coupled columns, and the too great elegance of the proportions.

Italy, the seat of the Fine Arts, was consulted. Louis XIV. sent for Bernini, the most celebrated architect of the age, to whom Rome owed part of the embellishments of the church of St. Peter. His plans embraced the completion of the Louvre, and the junction of this palace with that of the Tuilleries; they were adopted with enthusiasm, and, on the first of October, 1665, the King laid the first stone of the buildings intended to be erected facing the church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois. Attentive observation, however, soon discovered defects in his plans; haste had led him into errors, which his rivals exaggerated. Scarcely were the foundations finished, when Bernini set out on his return to Rome. The same magnificence with which he had been received, accompanied him at his departure; a pension, presents, and distinctions were calculated to erase from his memory part of the disagreeable circumstances in which he was involved by his own presumption, and the jealousy of the native artists.

His visit to France was, nevertheless, highly beneficial, for it served to create harmony among the latter. Leveau and Charles Perrault, the architects, in association with Le Brun, the painter, and supported by Colbert, who was urged on by his first secretary, a brother of Perrault's pointed out the defects of Bernini's plans in such a forcible manner, as to produce conviction. The French designs were again brought forward, and Colbert seemed to select that of Leveau, merely to leave Louis XIV. the merit of preferring Perrault's, which, having received some judicious alterations, were now considered as the most magnificent.

The short space of five years was sufficient for the erection of this colonnade, which is admired for its majestic elegance. It is of the Corinthian order, and admirably proportioned. The details, though overcharged, are grand: the effect would be more complete and powerful but for the portico which divides the colonnade, and takes considerably from its magnificence. It has been censured as somewhat theatrical, but it nevertheless ranks with the finest specimens of modern architecture, if not itself superior to any. The people of Paris, accustomed to this magnificent spectacle, too frequently pass it by unheeded; the admiration of foreigners, however, ought to teach them to appreciate such a masterpiece.

The beauty and richness of these new buildings did not induce Louis XIV. to fix his residence at Paris; he still made Versailles his habitual place of abode, and that palace, styled by some the worthless favourite, continued to be the particular object of the monarch's attention, and the cause of considerable expenses, which tended to retard the completion of the Louvre. In 1673, the King ordered the meetings of the Academy to be held there. Changes in the ministry, the important political events that marked the last thirty years of the reign of this sovereign, and the erection of other buildings, (the Military School and School of Medicine,) occasioned the works of the Louvre to be once more abandoned.

In the first years of the reign of Louis XV. persons belonging to, and patronized by the court, obtained apartments there, and new arrangements adapted this palace to a purpose as unworthy of the grandeur of the building, as of the majesty of the sovereign. In 1749, the still increasing degradation of the Louvre, suggested to Voltaire these verses, in which he expressed the indignant sentiments of the nation:—

‘ Monument imparfait de ce siècle vaillant
Qui sur tous les beaux arts a fondé sa gloire
Vous verrai-je toujours en attendant sa gloire
Faire un juste reproche à la postérité?
Faut-il que l'on s'indigne alors qu'on vous
admire,
Et que les nations qui veulent nous braver,
Fâchées de cet oubli, soient en droit de nous dire
Que nous commengons tout pour ne rien achever?’

Since that period some repairs and improvements took place, and M. de Marigny, while minister, even conceived the design of completing the structure; but the execution of this plan, by which so many ministers had hoped to signalize their administration, was again deferred.

Notwithstanding the animadversions of Voltaire, and some works that were not prosecuted, the Louvre continued to be parcelled out into small suites of apartments; the whole was soon occupied, so that the halls set apart for the meetings of the Academies were scarcely spared. At length, in 1801, an ordinance of the government directed that the Louvre should be evacuated, joined to the Tuileries, and fitted for the reception of the master-pieces of the fine arts. Two architects, whose names friendship, talent, and the public esteem have always associated, Messieurs Percier and Fontaine, were charged with the direction of this immense undertaking. The irregularity of the buildings, the numerous subdivisions introduced by abuses, and long dilapidations, augmented the difficulty of its execution. A plan skillfully conceived afforded the means of hiding an irregularity which could not be wholly removed, and of redressing an evil which, after degrading the Louvre, would not have failed to bring it to ruin.

I shall now proceed to a rapid survey of what has been done from the year 1805 to the present time, and then give a sketch of the works still required for the complete execution of the plan of uniting the Louvre with the Tuileries. The court, round which have been erected the edifices composing the Louvre, properly so called, has been cleared of the buildings with which it was encumbered: it forms a square of sixty toises and a half (three hundred and sixty-three feet), surrounded with buildings, the general appearance of which has been made regular by numerous demolitions and by raising certain parts. The eye embraces a mass which seems to be uniform; the façades are crowned with corresponding pediments; the cornice has been harmonized from one design: yet a more minute examination detects the difference which exists between the façade de l'Horloge and the others; but its elegance, the richness of the decorations, and the exquisite sculptures of Jean Foujon, forbade any alterations in that pavilion, which, as I have already remarked, serves to commemorate the revival of the fine arts in France. The spacious halls that are found in this part have contributed not a little to restore to the Louvre the appearance of a palace, and that splen-dour for which it was destined by its founders.

The façade next to the Seine has been adorned with an entablature surmounted with a balustrade. The numerous alterations required by the new arrangement of the Museum of Sculpture demanded the talent of M. Fontaine, who was obliged to underpin all the thick walls. The staircases of the museum and of the colonnade may serve as models of elegance and skill in overcoming the difficulty. The great gallery, reserved for pictures, was decorated with a magnificence worthy of the masterpieces which it was destined to contain. The roof was too heavy; it was therefore rebuilt for the space of more than twelve hundred feet. It was adorned with beautiful paintings in fresco, and valuable marbles were employed for the sub-basement of the interior. The different schools are separated by columns enriched with bronze. The same luxury is displayed in the halls where the works of sculpture are deposited; several are completely lined with marble, and the pavement is formed of beautiful mosaics. These halls are the richest in the universe for the masterpieces which they contain; but, were they to be stripped of these, they would still be the finest in the world; for no other capital can produce a series of galleries so magnificent, so richly decorated, and especially appropriated to so noble a purpose.

These works in the interior did not prevent the prosecution of the plan for joining the Louvre and the Tuileries. A gallery parallel to that of the Museum was carried out to the length of five hundred and forty feet from the Pavillon de Marsan; and, at the same time, the foundations of a chapel, designed to terminate the projected gallery on that side, were laid.

In 1814, the Louvre alone, exclusively of the new buildings, had cost fourteen millions of francs (nearly 600,000*l.* sterling) during the nine years which had elapsed since the resumption of the works. Notwithstanding the sums lavished by the government on every thing calculated to form a record of a glorious epoch, the Louvre remained unfinished: the many internal improvements that were begun only served to show how many more were yet left to be executed, and the palace was not in a fit state to be inhabited when the king appropriated it to the reception of the productions of national industry. It was a noble conception to collect the useful arts and the fine arts in the palace of the kings: the sovereign power never appears more august, than when it takes under its immediate protection whatever can contribute to the welfare of the general community.

To this purpose the colonnade and part of the façade which overlooks the river were devoted; the windows were glazed, and the galleries inlaid; it was even projected to line the gallery formed by the colonnade with white marble, the expense of which alone was estimated at ninety thousand francs (3750l. sterling): but the Mosaic School, enriched by the progress which the bounty of government had enabled it to make since its foundation, undertook this work, which was executed in the most elegant and solid manner, and yet the expense amounted to no more than six thousand francs (250l.) Thus this branch of art, really imported into France, and which, at first, stood in need of encouragement, has worthily paid its debt, and manifested its gratitude for the sacrifices made to raise it to a complete state of prosperity.

ANECDOTES OF THE HIGHLANDERS.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

In former days when every Highland chief kept a bard, a bagpiper, and a thief.

Two Thieves.—Returning from a successful foray, in the county of Murray, the celebrated Borasdale was hospitably entertained by the Chief of Glegary, at Glegary House. After supper, when the generous shell freely circulated, all reserve was laid aside. (On such occasions tradesmen will often talk of their tools.) Borasdale, among other things, expatiated on the multifarious merits of Rory More, his principal man of business, or, in plain English, his leading thief. Glegary offered a bet of twelve milk kine, that his man, Gory Du, was more than match for Rory More. The bet was accepted, and the heroes ordered out in quest of adventures. They were to return before the next morning. In the middle of the night they met, by mere accident, as Rory More supposed, who inquired eagerly concerning the success of his competitor. Gory Du expressed some scruples of conscience, and declared his resolution to proceed no further in the affair, unless the gentlemen would allow them time to reach the lowlands, where they might enter into honourable competition. Rory concurred in Gory's sentiments. That they might avoid the infamy of stealing among their friends and neighbours, it was, therefore, agreed, that they should, next morning, demand time to enable them to reach Murrayshire. In the mean time, they entered a bothy; (a kind of temporary hut, which serves to shelter the Highlanders during some months they spend in the mountains with their cattle in summer.) Here they kindled a fire, and, warming themselves, reclined on a bed of dry heath, for the remainder of the night. They started with the lark, when Rory More found that the fire, into which his plaid had fallen, had curtailed a considerable part of the length of that useful covering.

They reached Glegary House before noon, and Borasdale, with an air of anticipated triumph, questioned Rory More, of whose veracity neither of the chiefs entertained a doubt. Rory informed his master of their mutual objections to stealing in the vicinity of their homes; observing, at the same time, 'that the foulest of all brutes preserves the purity of its own styte.' Gory Du was next interrogated: he owed that he had done nothing which merited applause, or which presented any obstacles in the accomplishment, — 'I have only,' added he, 'while Rory slept, cut and made a pair of hose from his plaid, which hose I am now wearing.'—So saying, he produced his legs, actually adorned in the tartan which his fellow thief had believed to have been consumed by the devouring element. To prevent detection on abstracting the piece, Gory Du put the end of the plaid into the fire!

Divination.—Divination by the shoulder-blade is performed thus:—the flesh is stripped clean off a shoulder of mutton, &c. and the diviner, by virtue of his art, is enabled, on inspecting the transparent part of the blade, to discover, by certain spots in it, any extraordinary event that is to happen to the person from whose flock the slain animal has been taken, or to any of his relatives, within the year. The science does not extend farther into futurity; the same is also the case with the second sight.

I had supposed this superstition peculiar to the Highlands of Scotland; but I have since met with it in Sicily, Calabria, Greece, Dalmatia, &c.

In the Highlands many wonderful things are related of these diviners, or slinrach, as they are there called.

Among other anecdotes of this sort, the following has been related to me by several persons now living, of unsullied veracity, who assert that they had been eye and ear witnesses of it:—About forty years ago, there lived at Gallovie, in Badenock, one Allan M'Tavish, so famous in this art, that Hector M'Kinnon travelled all the way on foot, from the Isle of Mull, to dispute the palm with him. The stranger having announced his name, and the object of his journey, Mr. —, of Gallovie, prepared a splendid dinner, to which he invited a numerous company of his friends.

After the feast, a prepared shoulder blade was presented to each of the sages, and the guests became mute as silence. After a long pause, Hector M'Kinnon exclaimed, 'may heaven guard all our friends from an untimely end!' but refused to make any farther disclosure. The company then urged M'Tavish to declare the result of his scientific research, but he refused, until the stranger should disclose what seemed to give him such concern.—At length, pressed by the entreaties of the whole company, and even reproached by some as an impostor, he solemnly affirmed, that some person should suffer death by hanging, on the estate of Mr. —, of Gallovie, within twenty-four hours from that time. Some of the company shrieked, some looked all amazement, some looked grave, and some looked as if they did not believe him. At last it occurred to them, that if such a catastrophe was in the womb of futurity, it would appear also to M'Tavish, on whose cheek a triumphant smile continued playing all this while. — 'All I can say,' said M'Tavish, 'is, that the person to be hanged has horns and hoofs; but twenty-four hours will solve the event, as my brother, Mr. M'Kinnon, has just observed.' All was anxiety till next morning, when the first object that presented itself was a young bull, hanging by the neck, and dead! The animal had put his head through the bars of a ladder, that was fixed as a prop to a falling barn, in order to reach the tempting tuft of grass that grew on the eaves; and, having lost the support of the crumbling mud wall, was left suspended to perish, as above.

WOMAN.

'The world was sad, the garden was a wild,
And man, the hermit, sigh'd till woman smil'd.'
CAMPBELL.

It would be a curious inquiry to ascertain the different ways in which women have been estimated in different countries, as well as the various opinions that have been published respecting them. Plato rejoiced that he was not a woman.—Swift considered women only a higher species of monkeys, and the Turks will not allow them to have any souls. A Greek proverb reckons it as 'the extreme disgrace of sloth to be governed by a woman;' and the French, in their Salique law, seem to have recognized this axiom.—Amongst the ancient Germans, however, women were in very high estimation. Tacitus informs us, that they were not only treated by their husbands with the greatest confidence, in their domestic occupations, but were even made partakers of their martial toils. And so far did they carry their respect, that they even believed a certain divinity to reside in the female heart, a belief which was encouraged to such an extent among some of the fiercest of the German tribes, that they permitted women to rule over them in the name of the deity. Similar instances may also be mentioned among the Ancient Britons, in the persons of Boadicea and Cartimandua; and the same degree of respect continues to be shewn to women by the laws of this country.

Woman has been the poet's favourite theme in all ages and in all countries, and some of the finest effusions have been in praise of the sex. The following, among the thousand specimens which might be adduced, to justify this remark we copy from the works of Sir Aston Cockayne, and as they are exceedingly scarce, it may not be deemed unacceptable to our readers:—

'I wonder why, by foul-mouth'd men,

Women so slander'd be,
Since it doth easily appear They're better far than we.

Why are the graces, every one,
Pictur'd as women be,
If not to show that they in grace
Do more excel than we?

Why are the liberal sciences
Pictur'd as women be,
If not to shew that they in them
Do more excel than we?

Why are the virtues, every one,
Pictur'd as women be,
If not to shew that they in them
Do more excel than we?

Since women are so full of worth,
Let them all praised be;
For commendations they deserve
In amplerwise than we.

Ledyard beautifully eulogizes the fair sex in his verses, entitled the 'Character of Women;' he tells us they are—

'Alive to every tender feeling,
To deeds of mercy ever prone;
The wounds of pain and sorrow healing,
With soft compassion's sweetest tone.

Form'd in benevolence of nature,
Obliging, modest, gay, and mild,
Woman's the same endearing creature
In courtly town and savage wild.

When parch'd with thirst—with hunger wasted,
Her friendly hand refreshment gave:
How sweet the coarsest food has tasted,
What cordial in the simple wave.

Her courteous looks—her words caressing,
Shed comfort on the fainting soul;
Woman's the stranger's general blessing,
From sultry India to the Pole.'

(FROM CAMOENS)

'Who can escape the net which passion throws
Amidst the charms of woman's witchery?
Tints like the snow upon the opening rose,
And looks like gold on Parian masonry!
That all pervading magic who oppose
Strong as Medusa's glance of potency?
Alas! the Gorgon could but change the frame
To marble: Love converts it into flame.'

The Family Trunk,

NO. IV.

BY MOSES VON MUCKLEWIT, GENT.

SUPERSTITIOUS TRIALS.

IN resuming my observations on the superstitious trials, anciently common to this and other countries, I come to the trial by ordeal, which, as the reader may recollect, was specified to be of three sorts; viz. ordeal by hot iron—by hot water, and by cold water. Of these, the former seems to have been in most general, as well as in most ancient use; and, indeed, according to Le Brun and others, it was even known to the Romans. This conclusion they draw from a passage in the elder Pliny, who mentions a family in Tuscany, upon whom the sacred fires, kindled in honour of Apollo, had no effect; but the most probable conjecture appears to be, that it originated with the miracles, ascribed by the early Christians to their saints, and which they supposed to be wrought, in all doubtful cases, in favour of innocence. But, be this as it may, the custom in question prevailed in this country so early as the reign of Ina, and was found in full use by the conqueror, when he ascended the throne. The Normans, indeed, attached, from long habit and their chivalrous spirit, to the trial by battle, naturally rejected a practice which they regarded in the light of a mere superstitious formality, although aged and infirm people and women were still allowed to resort to it. It grew, afterwards, however, into more general use; and, according to Lord Hale, the purification per ignem et aquam, continued during the whole reign of King John, with which he thinks it must have terminated; but the more plausible opinion of Hume is, that it was not finally abolished until the following reign.

If trial by hot iron was of ancient use in this country, it seems to have been at least of equal antiquity in other parts of Europe. Thus, in the ancient French laws, we find mention made of the examen per ferrum candens in cassis dubiis, as early as the year 895; and the same law is afterwards acknowledged in a canon, passed in the council of Littlebonne, in the year 1086. And we further learn, from the old French writers, Juretus and Bosquet, that the trial by hot iron, or judgment of fire, as it was also called, belonged more particularly to the monks, as holding a middle rank between the nobles and the plebeians, to whom the trials by battle and cold water were respectively appropriated. With respect to the trial by water, both hot and cold, they seem, if not of the same ancient origin with the former, to have maintained, and especially the ordeal of cold water, a much later existence. The latter seems, towards its decline, to have been chiefly in use in cases of witchcraft and sorcery; and, as we do not find it mentioned in the laws of Ina, it most probably was not adopted until some ages afterwards. The ceremony observed at this trial, is mentioned in a MS. preserved in the cathedral of Soissons, and written towards the close of the twelfth century; and St. Bernard, who lived during the same period, alludes to it as in existence in his time.

The following, as we learn from the laws of Ina and other old authorities, was the manner of conducting the trial by hot iron: the accused, in the first place, had his choice of this or trial by hot water; and, if he preferred the former, an hot iron, weighing at most three pounds, was prepared; and no person but the priest, who was to preside on the occasion, was allowed to enter the temple while the fire was kindling. After the iron had been placed on the fire, several persons were admitted to determine the degree of heat it ought to possess; and they were all obliged to pass the night fasting. At day-break, the priest, after sprinkling them with holy water, and compelling them also to drink some, gave them the book of the Evangelists to kiss, and then crossed them. The mass then began, and the fire was no more increased, but the iron was suffered to remain on the embers till the last collect. After this, the iron was taken up, and a general silence observed, while the priest, in solemn mockery, made an appeal to the Deity to manifest the truth by the result of the ordeal. The accused then took the iron in his hand, and walked with it for the distance of nine times the length of his own feet. This being done, his hand was bound up; and the bandage sealed both by the judge and the accusing party; and if, after the expiration of three days, no burning appeared, the accused was acquitted,—otherwise, he was considered guilty. But, it need hardly be added, that the last mentioned conclusion was the common result of this barbarous mummery.

It would seem, however, that, in some instances, attempts had been made, by preventive remedies, to counteract the effect of the hot iron; for Father Sobineau, in his history of Bretagne, mentions, that the hand of the unfortunate person, condemned to this ordeal, was covered and sealed some time before the day of trial, lest he might, by ointments or other preparation, be able to resist the operation of the fire. The iron used on these occasions, received the benediction of the bishop, and was not permitted to be applied to any other purpose; and it will appear from the following anecdote, with what superstitious exactness this rule was observed. In an ancient history of the archbishops of Rouen, we read, that the iron kept for this purpose at St. Vandrille's, having lost its virtue through the imprudence of a monk, who had appropriated it to some other use, the abbot requested the archbishop to consecrate it by a new benediction. This, however, he refused to do, until the abbot was at last able to convince him, that this identical iron had been in the monastry time out of mind.

The trial by hot water was briefly as follows:—The water was placed in a vessel, and heated to the highest degree. For inferior crimes, the accused plunged his arm up to the wrist, and, for crimes of a deeper dye, up to the elbow. In every other part of the ceremony, the two trials, by hot iron and hot water, agreed; and the same conclusion was drawn from the event.

With respect to ordeal of cold water, which, as already mentioned, was confined to cases among the common people, the same religious ceremony was also observed as above described, and the priest, having afterwards exorcised the water, as well as the supposed criminal, the latter was bound hand and foot, and thrown in. If, after this, he happened, as was most probably the general result, to find a watery grave, he was very humanely pronounced innocent; if, however, he escaped this death, he was sure to find his fate from the hands of the executioner.

There remain only, of the trials alluded to in my last paper, the judgment of the cross, and the judgment by Scripture, of which, as less in practice than the superstitions previously noticed, we have but few memorials. We find, however, from one of the capitulars of Charlemagne, enacted in the year 779, that the former of these judgments was then common; for the capitular states that, if the case be doubtful, the contending parties were to stand before the cross, and he who fell first should be condemned. Agobardus, too, who lived in the following century, mentions this mode of trial; and it occurs likewise in other capitulars.

The judgment by Scripture was similar, as I have before remarked, to the Virgilian Lots, formerly practised very generally throughout Europe, and of which a singular instance is recorded, in the case of Charles I. and Lord Falkland. This species of trial was confined to civil cases, and seems to have been often resorted to by bishops, previous to their consecration, and of which Gregory of Tours relates several instances. The practice consisted in opening the Scriptures at random, and in adapting the first passage that presented itself, to the occasion, and from thence to prognosticate the favourable or unfavourable issue of the question under consideration.

I have now closed the brief sketch, which my FAMILY TRUNK enables me to draw, of the modes of trial, if so they may be called, common to the ages of darkness and credulity. The trial by combat, although equally ambiguous and unjust, as the rest, had at least the plea of martial feelings and a chivalrous spirit in its favour, while the others originated purely in the grossest ignorance and the most unmixed superstition.

Original Poetry.

THE ZEPHYR AND FLOWER.

Snow trembl'd down
From the winter's crown,
And cover'd this planet with lightness:
The zephyr arose
In fantastical blows,
And enchantingly frolic'd o'er whiteness.
He sought for the bower
Of his lady-like flower,
Which at night he had left with his blessing;
He blew all his air
On the snow for his fair,
But 'twas crisp and consistence possessing.
To the moon he flew,
But her reign was new;
To the stars—and related his story;
But they shone in the cold,
And instinctively roll'd
Their high anthems to wisdom and glory.
Through the lucid space
He continued his race,
For the sun to shine warmly and brightly;
But the clouds overpread
That white innocent bed,
Where his lady-like flower had slept nightly.
He wander'd in woe,
Round the bower below,
And faithfully, tenderly hover'd;—
He whisper'd to boughs
Without leaves of his vows,
For his lady so suddenly cover'd.
They shook their hoar heads
O'er their natural beds,
But their vestures were chilly and frozen;
And the zephyr remaining,
Renew'd his complaining,
At the loss of his lovely and chaste.

The sun, as it seem'd,
Heard the prayer, which he deem'd
An example of summer affection;
He shot down his light
With refulgency bright,
And the snow sank to water's complexion.
O! the rapt'rous delight
Of this exquisite sight,
Which these lovers should feel at their meeting;
The zephyr had sped—
But his lady was dead!
And he died, her existence entreating!
Thus true loves, we know,
In this valley below,
Like the flower and the zephyr united,
By misfortunes are slain,
Ere the bridal they gain,
But their memory shall never be blighted!

JOSIPIA.

THE WRECK.

In th' western sky—pale as a star that seems
Looking out of heaven at the day's last beams,
As they depart from earth—a streak of light
Quiver'd a moment, and was gone—then Night,
As from her couch, advanced,—while yet the sun
Held on his mighty course;—for there was one
Black cloud, which, expanding as it rose, cast
A deadly gloom upon the watery waste, Till from the night, it seem'd, the heav'n's had shrunk,
And all was—clouds and ocean! The breeze had sunk
Into a slumber—or delay'd thro' fear
Her voice to raise, and th' gathering storm so near!

The heav'n look'd down upon the wide expanse

Of ocean, as in scorn—and such a glance
He upward bent,—that sky and sea look'd like
Two dreadful furies, that pause on ere they strike!

The clouds fell back divided by a crash
Of loudest thunder,—and a shower of fire
Enter'd the ocean's breast, and 'gan to lash
Him into waves, that roll'd each moment higher,
As, toss'd from their aerial fetters, one
By one, the winds fast gathering came, and met—

(Like those in fight, or ere the conquest's won)

Till link'd at length, they pass'd—as if to get Together all their powers—then, with one sweep
Laid bare the hidden bowels of the deep.
And now in distance, like a feather tost,
Appear'd a bab'ling bark—one moment lost
Behind the swelling wave, whose panting breast
Against her like a mighty legion press'd,—
And now rising to meet the clouds, till she,
Exhausted, sunk before her enemy!

With moon's approach, the bellowing thunder ceas'd

And the winds in distance murmur'd—the sea,
Sparkling in the light that crown'd the lovely east,

In many a scarce-curl'd wave roll'd silently.
Much of the wreck they scatter'd on the shore,
But, O! the helpless crew in death were fast;
Yet one poor solitary youth—no more—

Lash'd to a log, high on the life was cast,
To bleach in mid-day sun;—and he was left
A mother, father, and a wife, bereft
Of their existence—for 'tho' him had they,
Their scanty meal procur'd for many a day!

WELFORD.

THE FIRST OPENING DAISY:

By EDWARD BALL.

This first opening daisy hath peep'd thro' the snow,

Ere yet a wily winter's chill triumph is past,—
All peevish she turns to the sun's beauteous glow,
While her bosom is woo'd by the ruffian blast.

Ah! cheer thee, thou lone one, dark fate is be- fore thee,—

Again must yon golden beams' mantle in gloom;

And soon must the season that awful frowns o'er thee,

Thy pale beauties strew on the bed where they bloom.

And never, ah! never, poor delicate flower;

Can thy dewy lips open to the radiance of May;
For, transient the sun-beam, and transient the hour;

To witness thy glory and note thy decay.

So is it young genius to humbleness plighted;
Of that cheering smile 'ere which first bade it ascend,

By the rude-breath of envy or arrogance blighted.

Is wouldst ere its talents and virtues unbend?

So 'tis, where affection, from tenderness parted,
That bliss, from which fondly it hop'd it not to sever,

Thro' the chill gaze of falsehood becomes broken hearted,

And dies where it proudly had blossom'd far- ever.

BRITISH GALLERY.—No. III.

'In sight
Of nature's great original, we saw
The lively child of art.' ARISTIDES.

In consequence of the great length to which we were indebted, by the novelty of execution, to extend our remarks upon Mr. Martin's picture, we were precluded from continuing our observations on the other subjects which the British Gallery presents to our notice; a duty to which we now, therefore, return with increased pleasure. As our limits forbid us to enter upon the merits of every separate work, we shall content ourselves with a few causory remarks upon some of the best and most striking performances: No. 3, by T. Werge—is a delicately and beautifully executed view of Warkworth Castle; distinguished, especially as far as regards the aerial perspective, and a very spirited style in the foreground; by a degree of technical excellence which reflects the highest credit on the artist's abilities: Nos. 4 and 5, 'The Broken Window' and the 'Departure of Mary Queen of Scots for France,' the former by Sharpe, and the latter by H. Singleton—have already, we dare say, come under the notice of the greater part of our readers, who visited the last exhibition at Somerset House. They can neither of them be forgotten, and neither of them revive any recollections but those of pleasure: 'The Important Author,' (from Moliere), by Stuart Newton, is remarkable for excellence of costume, spirited delineation of character, story well told, and, at the same time; a very unpleasant degree of harshness in the execution: Wilkie's 'Athol Highlanders,' and finished study of the Reading of the Will, will hardly require comment from us; they are nature. 'The Landing of the Trojans,' Delors; No. 20, is a fine classical landscape; by W. Linton; rich, flowing, and spirited, yet chaste and delicate; the lights are, perhaps, too scattered, and the colouring, as well as the outline of the rocks, hard and unpleasant. F. P. Stepanoff's Dr. Sangrado, No. 21, is spirited and characteristic; the incident of the funeral seen through the window, is well conceived, and a happy illustration of Le Sage's admirable portraiture. A River Scene, No. 30, by P. L. Reingaigle, displays a great knowledge of chiaro-curo, employed on a soothing, yet not uninteresting scene. The 'Mower listening to a Gypsy,' No. 34, by T. Barker, is happily imagined and neatly executed, uniting a great deal of simplicity with much genuine humour. G. Vincent, in his 'Dutch Fair at Yarmouth,' No. 36, has presented us with a lively and amusing scene, which happily combines with it a national feeling, by the introduction of an object which never fails to recall pleasurable and proud recollections: we allude to the Nelson Pillar, introduced in this picture. The execution is good, and the scenery, from its appearance, is well adapted to unite with the figures which form the object of delineation. Hayter's picture of 'Venus complaining to Mars of her wounds by Diomed,' No. 7, is a beautiful work, but the female figures want grace; and there is a degree of glitter and affectation in the colouring which requires considerable chastening. Nos. 43 and 57, by Gandy, are fine specimens of this artist's powers, as well as of his peculiar style; the former is a beautiful scene from that exquisite elysium of architecture, in which he delights to revel, and which has lent so many of its lovely features to be delineated by this enchanting and agreeable voluptuary of the school of those whose study it is 'to rear the column or the arch to bend.' We must not pass in silence, 'Rosen, from Mount St. Catherine,' by J. B. Cromie, No. 48; it is a clever and well-finished picture, uniting a high degree of accuracy with a great deal of judgment and professional excellence, such as we seldom see combined in a work of this kind; the transparency of the water is exquisitely worked up, and the whole performance inspires us with a high opinion of the rising merit of this artist. Nos. 63 and 81, 'Scenes from Henry the Fourth,' by J. Cawse, possess a liveliness and character which are worthy the illustrator of those writings, which are the pride of England and the wonder of the world. The 'Lake of Geneva,' No. 66, by J. Dennis, is a noble and magnificent view of a most romantic scene; it is pleasing, sublime, delicate, and spirited; and is distinguished by a brilliancy of colour and a breadth of shade, together with a beauty of design and chasteness of execution, which make it a most attractive performance. The foreground, in particular, characterized as it is by some of the most striking peculiarities of country, is executed with a spirit and effect well worthy of the subject. A 'Lion disturbed at his Repast,' by E. Landseer, No. 78, is in his very best style, and cannot fail to elicit the admiration of every person, by the splendour and accuracy of natural imitation, as well as by the technical knowledge and skill, by which it is characterized. No. 80, 'A Morning effect in September,' by G. Arnold, is a striking and natural representation of a most rarely attempted and difficult accident, and may boast of being possessed of all the coolness and nature which the subject demands.

W. H. FARRY.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—The operas of Antony and Cleopatra and Love in a Village have been alternately performed at this theatre during the last week; and while the rage continues for musical pieces, tragedy and comedy can scarcely have a fair chance. The more we hear Miss Wilson in Rosetta, the more thoroughly we are convinced of the propriety of her first experiment in Mandane, which is better suited to her powers. The advantage she possesses in singing to the same master by whom she has been instructed, is certainly very great, and such as few debutantes have had; and we should be better able to judge of her natural powers if Mr. Welsh was out of the orchestra.

On Thursday night, 'Mr. Tibbs,' whose first appearance had been announced for some days, made his debut. Mr. Tibbs, our readers are to be informed, is the name of a farce, which is founded on a story told in one of Goldsmith's Essays, of Beau Tibbs, a gentleman who has but 'some two shilling' in his pocket, but who boasts of being on the most familiar terms with the principal 'lords and gentles' of the town. We confess we write with hesitation on this farce, much doubting that our readers will be enabled to ascertain the justice of our remarks by personal observation, as we think it extremely likely that Mr. Tibbs' appearances will not be numerous. The story, as told in the farce, differs so little from the original, that it is unnecessary to detail it. Harley, personated by Mr. Tibbs, and was the life and soul of the piece; but, ex nihilo nihil fit, and his incessant bustle, vivacity, and humour, though admirably displayed, were not an equivalent for the want of incident; and the piece met with much disapprobation; so much so that the audience would scarcely bear it announced for repetition.

COVENT GARDEN.—The opera of Love in a Village was played at this theatre on Tuesday night, when, in contradistinction to the metamorphosed edition of the opera at the rival house, it was here played with the original music. Miss Stephens played Rosetta; in the whole range of her characters, there is not one more adapted to her talents. The music of this opera has always been one of her triumphs. The union of the simple and scientific, the pastoral and the refined, which characterize it, display, with a peculiar charm, the power, facility, richness, and sweetness of her voice. She was encored almost in every song; and that, in which she banters Justice Woodcock in the garden, was called for a third time, but the majority of the house, in humanity to the actress, did not press it. The other parts of the opera were well sustained.

Kenilworth, which, from its being in nearly all the minor theatres, has become stale, was produced at this house on Thursday, with so little to recommend it, that it was properly condemned. Who had the 'doing' of this piece we know not, but the author of Waverley will not easily forgive him for the atrocious outrage he has committed on his work, by attempting to dramatise it. In vain did we look for the personation of the characters in the novel as we saw their names in the bill. Mrs. Faucit was gaudily dressed as the 'Virgin Queen,' but she had little or nothing to do. Leicester was made a mere pageant. We saw nothing of 'England's proudest earl' in his deportment, although Mr. Vandenhoff was his representative. The unfortunate Amy, though the heroine of the novel, might have been omitted in the play, for any good purpose that was made of her. With difficulty, and only when we heard their names, we discovered that Giles Gosling, Trevelian, and Janet, had been preserved, but they were so unlike what the novelist had drawn, that we should not have recognized them. Varney was preserved, and well sustained by Mr. Abbot. Michael Lambourne and Antony Foster would have been well played by Harley, and Comer, if the author had not spoiled their parts. The catastrophe is copied from Mr. Dibdin's Kenilworth. In short, this piece had not one single merit to recommend it, except a good view of Kenilworth Castle. The acting was worthy of the piece; indeed, all the performers seemed ashamed of their parts, and well they might: for the piece would have disgraced any house or any actor.

SURREY THEATRE.—On Monday night, Mr. Dibdin produced one of those burlesque spectacles, in which he has often been so successful. It is intitled, The Daughters of Danans and Sons of Egyptians, or Fifty Weddings and Nine and Forty Murders. The classical story, from which this piece derives its title, must be familiar to most of our readers. In burlesquing it, Mr. Dibdin has combined ludicrous effect, magnificent drollery, and terrific joke. Several of the songs possess much humour; and the piece is got up with considerable splendour. We do not, however, think it one of Mr. D.'s happiest efforts; but we must not always expect him to furnish burlesques like Don Giovanni and the Siege of Troy. The play bill, which announced this piece, is a very amusing production; and we cannot forego the following well-pointed hit at the puffing of the large theatres:—

'The Manager, fully aware that Marriage and Murder are now regarded as the most successful features of modern Melodrama, and sincerely impressed with a wish that the Surrey Theatre should excel in every fashionable mode of advancing in the Public Opinion, has selected an ancient and classical Story, which, from its unexceptionable Morals, and terrific variety of Incident, will, no doubt, attract Crowds even superior to those described in the genuine diurnal reports of more fortunate Theatres; and to supersede the necessity of stating that no one can be admitted, it is determined (till further notice) not to issue any.—Those Ladies and Gentlemen who have been disappointed of Places for the 50th night of this forthcoming Prodigy, are respectfully informed, that a few back Seats are more than likely to be vacant about Easter, and that there is very little doubt of a front Row being attainable at Whitenside; at any rate, should a Private Box be unbespoke at Midsummer, it will be let without partiality or respect of persons.'

Literature and Science.

Royal Society's Library.—A Letter addressed to Sir Humphry Davy, has just been published by a F. R. S., giving him some advice how to act in his new situation of President of the Royal Society, and calling upon him to exert his authority, as a trustee of the British Museum, in opening more freely the access to the library of that establishment. This we conceive is by no means necessary; and are of opinion that every facility of access is given, consistent with the security of the invaluable treasures there deposited. The author of this Letter has, however, omitted one subject, which comes more home to the worthy President, and wherein he may be of essential service to the cause of science; namely, the state of the Royal Society's own library. It is well known that this library contains many valuable works, (both printed and MSS.) not to be met with in any other library in the kingdom; but which are in a great measure rendered useless, from the want of an easy-reference, there being no catalogue of its contents. In the library of the National Institute, at Paris, there is not only a well-formed catalogue, but two or three librarians, constantly employed in bringing the books to the different members who visit the library for occasional reading or reference. This, too, is the case in the British Museum; where several messengers are employed, who supply whatever books may be wanted, with the utmost readiness, and change them as often as required. This, however, is not the case in the Royal Society, where very few of the members can avail themselves of their own library, or even know the treasures it contains.

The New Comet.—We have been favoured (says the Windsor Express) with the following account from Mr. Bird, the astronomical lecturer of Eton:—'I obtained a view of the celestial stranger, for the first time, March 1, at half-past seven p. m.; it was visible about ten minutes. I took its position with my quadrant, when I found its azimuth 75 deg. west of north altitude, allowing for refraction, 7 deg.; right ascension, 355 deg.; declination, 12 deg. north in the wing of Pegasus; about 5 deg. south-west of a star of the second magnitude, called Algenib; it rises at London, at six in the morning, and sets at eight in the evening. Its appearance is very different from the comet in 1819: the tail is much longer, and has the appearance of a streak of fire, and does not spread much at its greatest distance; it makes an angle of 33 degrees with the ecliptic, extending to the head of Andromeda. Its difference in right ascension, from the last, is 103 deg. westward. I think it will be visible longer than the former: in a few nights its course may be seen by the star Algenib; it can be seen from every part of the northern hemisphere, and the greatest part of the southern, as it is near the equator.'

Literary Conversazione.—Mr. Frederic Webb, whose extensive benevolence has gained him the honourable cognomen of the philanthropist, has determined on opening his mansion in Langham Place, for conversazione weekly. The first took place on Friday week last, when upwards of a hundred individuals of rank and talents were present.

LUCRETIVS.

Alice Pierce.—In the 48th year of King Edward III. (A.D. 1275,) Dame Alice Perrers or Pierce, the King's concubine, rode as lady of the sun, from the Tower of London through Cheapside, accompanied by many lords and ladies, every lady leading a lord by his horse's bridle, till they came into West Smithfield, and then began a great just, which endured seven days after, says Howell, in his Londinopolis, 1657.

Jack of Newbury.—John Winccombe, commonly called Jack of Newbury, whose name and 'effigy' adorns many an ale-house sign, was the most considerable clothier that England had, either in his own time or before; he kept a hundred looms in his house, each managed by a man and a boy. He feasted King Henry VIII. and his first Queen, Catherine, at his own house, in Newbury, and built the church of that town, from the pulpit westward, to the tower.

Guess Work.—When I see a man suffer a simple wife to run in debt at the stores, for whatever she fancies I guess he will soon wish he had never been married. When I see a young lady possess a large portion of pride and affection, I guess she lacks delicacy and sense. When I see a woman usurp the whole conversation, I guess she has more loquacity than sense.—Amer. Pat.

Aphorisms.—Disaffection in great men to a prince is a double crime, for their duty and loyal example are like laws to the people.

From the nature and dignity of princely power and station, there is always enough of fear mixed with affection; but when a prince seeks only to be feared, he ceases to be loved.

It is a kind of incest in a prince to violate the laws of his country, for he is the father of the laws.

The ill government or tyranny of a prince, is to the body politic what a violent fever is to the body natural, for as the one causes convulsions and great alteration in the natural frame and constitution, so the other troubles and convulses a state, and disfigures the natural complexion of a people.

J. LIMBIRD, BOOKSELLER and STATIONER, 355, Strand, respectfully informs the public that a few complete sets of THE LITERARY CHRONICLE may be still had in boards, vol. 1., price 17s. 6d.; vol. 2., price 11 7s. 6d.

Review of New Books.

Letters from the Havana, during the Year 1820; containing an Account of the present State of the Island of Cuba, and Observations on the Slave Trade. 8vo. pp. 135. London, 1821.

THE author of these letters is a lively and agreeable writer, who has made good use of his year's residence in the finest island in the Western Archipelago, of which he gives an excellent and highly interesting description; although this appears to have been no easy task; as, since the affairs of the island of Cuba have become of sufficient importance to be inquired into, darkness and difficulties have attended research, and it is much easier to give an account of the state of the island for the first century of its colonization than to detail it during the last. It is from the year 1776, when commerce was in a small degree unfettered, that the history of Cuba begins, the narrative of its infancy being only interesting to its natural relatives.

The author notices very happily, and with characteristic brevity, the face of the country, its natural productions, the inhabitants, their manners, customs, and peculiarities; and, in his account of slavery and its horrors, his reflections are so just and so touching, that he makes us almost blush that we are Europeans. The subject of the slave trade, which is treated by our author with so much ability and feeling, is noticed at too great length for us to enter into it, but we cannot omit the following picture of West India Society. He says,—

'In the description of all countries, an account of the natives forms a principal subject of interest, but there is a distinctive singularity in the islands of the new world, called the West Indies, that obliges their historian to be concise on that head, and to dispatch such portion of his history in these few but comprehensive words—the natives are extinct. Out of an indigenous population, consisting of above three millions, who were spread over these islands, not one remains. The causes of this catastrophe are too well and too generally known to allow of repetition; there is nothing of novelty to throw into the detail, except it be an expression of horror at the ravages which the pestilential fever of avarice has made amongst so large a portion of our fellow creatures. Dwelling on the graves of this wretched race, are seen a people of most motley description, collected from nearly all the nations of the old world, drawn together by commercial enterprise, speculative cupidity, or the spirit of adventure; amongst whom appears a numerous progeny of beings, shaped like men, but who are bought, sold, trampled on, and despised as the veriest brutes I could name. This mass of beings is forcibly conjoined—their bond of union is a real chain. Fear, say the metaphysicians, first formed society, and it is undoubted that such is the elemental principle of West India society. Every house is a sort of garrison, filled with domestic conscripts, serving without pay, and whom it is necessary to guard strictly. In the ingenios, or plantations, regiments, (to carry on the allusion,) of these pressed men, are stationed with a proportion of two or three whites to a hundred blacks. The physical proportions in such situations, (and, generally, in all the islands except Cuba,) is endeavoured to be remedied by the depression of the moral faculties of the majority, and by severe enactments against their acquiring factitious force. The black man is not allowed to carry any sort of weapon. He dare not venture abroad after night-fall, without having a lighted lantern in his hand, which marks him out to the white passenger in the same way that a beacon does a point of danger. On the other hand, the white man seldom stirs a league from his dwelling without a sword by his side or pistols in his holster; he breathes round himself a halo, that magnifies his strength and hides his weakness; and, to add to his security, clusters himself with his fellows in large bodies, notwithstanding the pestilential consequence of such union under a vertical sun.'

The white population of Cuba is supposed, by the author, to have amounted to 250,000 in 1820. The coloured population, in 1817, including mulatto and black, bond and free, amounted to 314,202. The total number of slaves, in 1819, was 181,968. How severe, yet we fear too true, is the following remark on these unhappy beings:—

'The European farmer finds that the best manure is composed of the most offensive materials; so does the West India planter, he spreads his fields with orphans and captives, and expects to find his harvests prosperous in proportion to the mass of misery he has heaped together.'

The author, after this declaration, may well assert, that he has not yet suffered that ossification of the heart, which a residence in the West Indies too often occasions. It appears, that from 1789, when the traffic was thrown open (for England, commenced the trade in 1663, and after the peace of Utrecht, was the sole carrier for a time,) to 1799, 41,500 negroes were imported into Cuba, or rather more than 4000 annually. During the next four years, 34,500 were imported, or about 8600 annually. From that period to the year of the abolition treaty, in 1817, being a period of thirteen years, above 150,000 were introduced, or more than 10,000 annually. In the years 1817, 1818, and 1819, there was a great increase of importation; nearly 60,000 have been brought into this island during that period. Thus, in the last thirty years, more than 200,000 negroes have been brought from Africa to Cuba, and 50,000 more, at least, perished in the transit! We turn with horror from the appalling picture.

The news of the King of Spain having acceded to the constitution of 1812, was hailed with enthusiasm in the Havana; and the governor found it advisable to publish a Diario Extraordinario, in which, after acknowledging the receipt of such intelligence, he added, 'but his Excellency the Captain-General knows no other guide than the will of his sovereign, and he waits its expression.' The people, however, particularly the military, assembled, and 'his excellency' was the same day compelled to take the oath of allegiance to the new order of things. The following is a curious picture of the manners of the people of Havana:—

'Luxury need not starve here, nor does it. The tables of the rich are covered with a mob of dishes, and, after the grace, (which I may call the riot act,) the surrounding authorities fall on them with proper vigour. Dinner parties, however, are not usual. When a festive occasion occurs in a family, the entertainments commence with a breakfast, which is, in fact, an early dinner.

The Cubano caballero rises early, and takes a cup of chocolate as soon as risen. He then lights his cigar, and either strolls in his patio, or balconies, or mounts his horse. At ten o'clock he breakfasts on fish, meat, soup, eggs, and ham, with wine and coffee. Before the company rise from table, a little pan, with live charcoal, is brought, for every one to light their cigars with. The females, except in the upper ranks, smoke also. I can scarcely draw the line precise here, for this inclination of the females to turn into the neuter gender, seems very great. I have seen the wives and daughters of an official real smoking in the streets! I have seen the wives and daughters of abogados, physicians, and alcaldes, smoking, and yet it is certainly true, what the gentlemen tell you, that no lady smokes. This is a knotty paradox; but, if I remember right, the clown in "The Winter's Tale" makes some observations very illustrative of the point; for my part, I am not content enough to attempt it. Smoking, indeed, is so general, that the people all look like pictures of saints with glorified halos. It is said the poor Mexicans were conquered so speedily by their handful of invaders, from the consternation excited at the appearance of Cortes' sixteen dragoons, they conceiving the man and horse to be one animal. If a body of Spaniards were now to invade some untobaccoed Mexico, the man and his cigar would certainly have the same fearful effect. The children even smoke! Little creatures of five or six years old strut about with their cigars; and, as parents dress the boys of that age in long coats with little canes, they have all the air of manhood, and only want whiskers to make them appear as if set up to ridicule their fathers.

We now pass on to the theatre at the Havana, where,—

It is usual to take a box for the season, or a certain length of time—three or four months; and if you do not, you will get no box seat. You pay four reals for your admission at the outward door, and afterwards an additional sum, according to the part of the house, or nature of the accommodation you choose. The company is tolerable, and the house convenient, though not large. It is only slightly lighted on grand nights, which circumstance is always advertised, as is the programme of the piece, as—“This evening will be presented to the illustrious and respectable people of the Havana, the famous and much admired comedy, entitled, ‘El Triunfo del Ave Maria,’ in which Senor Garcia will perform the part of a Gracioso, who delivers many truly agreeable and witty speeches, as will the Senora Gaborino, the character of a Graciosa, whose diverting observations and smart speeches will give great delight to the audience. The comedy will be adorned by appropriate dresses and scenes; amongst others, the march of the heroic Spanish army to attack the infidels, with suitable warlike accompaniments—the Spanish hero on horseback—the Moorish chieftain advancing to challenge the Spaniards, when the Spanish conqueror, with the assistance of the Ave Maria, will cut off the head of the Moor; with many other agreeable and surprising incidents. After this will be performed, the excellent and much admired piece, called ‘The Re-establishment of the Constitution,’ written by an eminent patriot, where will be seen the ceremony of laying the lapida of our most glorious constitution. Also will be seen the portraits of those Spanish heroes, Quiroga and Riego, and a procession of alcaldes and other authorities. The theatre will be illuminated with perfect brilliancy, so as to afford this most respectable public every satisfaction.”

Of the animals, reptiles, insects, &c. peculiar to the Havana, we have the following notice:—

The black cattle are a very fine breed, and are used in great numbers to draw produce. Sheep are rare, a few only being kept, rather as curiosities than as stock. The hogs are most abundant, and form the favourite meat of the lower orders, most of whom keep them. Horses and mules are bred in the island, but a great many of the latter are imported from the Costa firme; and of the former, a large bony breed, called frisoines, (or friseslanders), are brought from North America. These are not found to thrive, the first hot summer carrying them off. The price of horses ranges from sixty to five hundred dollars; the usual price of a decent serviceable horse being two hundred dollars.

Venomous creatures this island is, happily, almost entirely free from. The snakes found here, are very similar to those that infest the woods in England, and are very shy of society. Their bite is not mortal. The worst of the venomous species is the arana peluda, or hairy spider, a hideous reptile, as large as a man's hand, covered with brown hair. The bite is considered highly dangerous. The scorpion is so common, that its frequency almost takes off the feeling of the dread with which it would otherwise be regarded. It is, when fully grown, as large as the arana peluda, with a long jointed tail, which it carries curved over its back, but is extended at pleasure. The sting is at the end. The effect (for I speak from experience,) is sharp and painful, and creates a local paralysis, but wears off through time and the application of spirits. The mosquito insect, though insignificant, be ranked in this order, for its sting, to the recently imported, is frequently very troublesome, and productive of much pain and eruption.

Amongst the wants of the country, and which an English ear, attuned to the melody of its native groves, almost directly discovers, is the total absence of birds of song.

But if the evening hour is deprived of the notes of the nightingale, it is enriched by the brightness of the cucuyo, or fire-fly. This singular insect bears, in the upper parts of its head, a phosphoric light, like that of a glow-worm, and numbers are seen circling in the air like meteors. It is perfectly harmless, and too often suffers from puerile tyranny on this account.

Amongst the animal rarities of the island, let me not forget to notice the Cuba blood-hound, that celebrated friend of the whites and enemy of the blacks.

In chief and general air, he is not much unlike the English mastiff, but possesses all the ferocity of the bull-dog. Every plantation has several of these creatures, for the pursuit of cimarones, or fugitive negroes, and the preservation of the whites, as the negroes stand in more dread of one of these ferocious brutes than of an armed overseer. I have no reason, however, to believe that they are employed otherwise than as guides in the pursuit of fugitives, and house-guards for their masters; but it is undoubted that the spirit of persecution against the unhappy negroes is instilled and fostered by every kind of encouragement and allurement, for I deny that nature, (as some allege,) has violated her own feelings and principles by making the blood-hound a natural enemy to the man of colour. In England, you have often noticed the sagacity with which a pampered house-dog scents out and attacks a beggar, who has fewer distinctive marks than the slave. The principle of education is the same, and insolent tyranny of persecution equally the effect of human instruction.

The author of this work, who writes in a lively manner but thinks profoundly, when again speaking of the influence of the slave trade on Cuba, shows, and we think satisfactorily, that the abolition of slavery will be favourable to the real and permanent interests of the island; we do not doubt, and if doubt exists in such a case, that grand axiom, that 'what is morally wrong cannot be politically right,' would influence our decision, did not humanity alone decide the question. In conclusion, we must express our hearty commendation of this work, and would recommend it to statesmen and senators, to philanthropists, and to every one who can feel for another's woe, and look with pity on the untutored and enslaved African.

Memoirs of the Life of Anne Boleyn, Queen of Henry VIII. By Miss Benger, Author of Memoirs of Mrs. Hamilton, John Tobin, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. pp. 548. London, 1821.

ENTERTAINING as we do, considerable respect for Miss Benger's talents, and a high regard for the sex of which she is an ornament, we are sorry that her pen has not been more suitably employed than on the present occasion. For, although we believe that Anne Boleyn was innocent of the charge for which she suffered, and fell a victim to the caprice and jealousy of an odious monster, yet some historians have entertained a different opinion, and her levity has often been admitted. Now, as an investigation into the criminality or levity of woman, is not the 'proper study' of woman, we wish that Miss Benger had become the biographer of some of those illustrious ladies who grace the annals of British history, whose character is less doubtful; especially as, notwithstanding all her research, she has not brought any new fact or new evidence to decide the merits of Lady Anne Boleyn.

If we at first regretted to find Miss Benger engaged in this work, we were not less surprised to find that she spun the barren subject out into two volumes—we beg pardon, two half volumes only; for the whole work is paged straight forward; but, by the addition of an extra title, it has been done up in two thin volumes,—a wretched book-selling expedient, which reflects no credit on the publishers.

The life of Anne Boleyn, and the particulars of her melancholy fate, are so well known, that it would be a work of supererogation to repeat them here; especially as what relates to her personally, appears to us to be the least interesting, and is certainly the least novel part of the work, which contains some curious information relative to the court manners during the reign of Henry VIII., as well as a view of society during the two preceding centuries. Of the activity and skill of Henry in many exercises, many instances have been recorded. The following is one:—

'One day, an engagement having been made by some of the courtiers to run at the ring for a wager, the king declared his willingness to enter the lists with six companions, the prize being promised to him who, within a certain space of time, should most often reach the goal. At the hour appointed, the ambassadors, the court ladies, repaired, with the pomp and ceremony usual on such occasions, to the barrier, where, at the sound of the trumpet, appeared the king and his martial train, each mounted on a mettled courser, clothed in purple velvet and cloth of gold; the royal steed was distinguished by his embroidered drapery, and the gallant plume of feathers pendant from his head, and which rose ambitiously to the saddle of the rider. The signal being given, the coursers flew like lightning; each cavalier ran twelve courses: the youthful monarch struck the ring five times, and finally bore away the prize in triumph, abandoning the ornaments of his charger to the applauding multitude. In another public festival, at Greenwich, the king challenged all comers to fight with the target; and afterwards exhibited still greater prowess in hurling the spear; nor did the indefatigable prince desist till he had achieved equal honour with the two-handed sword.'

Such were the amusements of princes and gentlemen. Of female occupations at that period, we are told, that—

'The maids of honour appear to have been always considered rather as ornamental than useful: neither serious charge nor weighty responsibility was ever imposed on these fairest ministers of royalty, whose business it was, like nymphs, to encircle their queen only to shed around her the ineffable charm of grace and beauty; accustomed to attend her on all public exhibitions of pomp and splendour, to dress with taste, to move with elegance, comprised their most important duties: their accomplishments, if any they possessed, were reserved for the recreation of her private hours, when, according to her humour, they were required to sing, dance, work, and pray, alternately associated in her labours and devotions. Finally, their conduct was closely inspected by an elderly gouvernante, whose duty it was to maintain amongst them strict order and decorum. In the absence of schools and other seminaries of instruction, an establishment such as this must have offered some equivocal advantages to childhood, and few attractions to youth: to the former it might supply habits of docility and application, of promptitude and self-possession, eminently useful in the intercourse of after-life; nor was it a defect peculiar to the education received in a court, that it blasted, by a specious semblance of maturity, the artless simplicity of childhood. Amongst the other vices inseparable from the artificial system transmitted by the middle ages, it was not the least, that it abridged what is usually esteemed the best and happiest season of human existence: the cheerfulness of infancy was soon clouded with care. At four years of age the sons of the nobility commenced their studies; at six they were initiated into the Latin grammar; at twelve they were introduced into company; at fourteen they exhausted their strength in hunting; at sixteen they were exercised in jousting; and at eighteen they were boldly ushered into public life. The education of girls was still more perniciously opposed to simplicity and nature; from the earliest period, they appear to have been taught to imitate the manners, and even to adopt the dress of grown women: at thirteen they were not only disfigured by the stiff costumes, but infected with the pride, the vanity, and folly of their elder associates. From the moment that they were allowed to assume their place at the tournament, they affected to dispense smiles and favours on real or pretended votaries; and, whilst glittering with gold and jewels, they began to expatiate on the reciprocations between the mistress and the servant, they learnt to envy the distinctions conferred by the bold successful champion, and to sigh for the sovereignty conceded to peerless beauty.'

Of the celebrated interview between Henry and Francis, in the field of the Cloth of Gold, our author gives a very animated description, from which we make a few extracts:—

'Aware of Henry's predilection for the age of Edward the Third, the King of France submitted to him, whether he should not, in imitation of the Black Prince, have his dinner served and carried on horseback. Although this proposition was negatived, in every other instance the ordinances of chivalry were to be religiously observed; and it was especially stipulated, that, in the ensuing joust, the number of strokes given on either side, should be referred to the ladies! Finally, after a longer interval than had been spent by the Edwards and Henries of former days in acquiring the fairest provinces of France, the plain of Guisnes was chosen for the interview, and the young Emperor Charles, by a dextrous stroke of policy, engrossed to himself the fruits of the costly enterprise. In his passage to Flanders, he approached the English coast, when, under pretence of paying his respects to his aunt Catherine, he threw himself on Henry's generosity, and voluntarily came to his court without a single precaution for safety and protection. Charmed with this proof of confidence, so consonant to the spirit of chivalry, Henry was easily persuaded to pledge his friendship to the avowed rival of that prince he was about to visit as an ally and a brother.'

'At some little distance from the town of Guisnes, a temporary palace was prepared for Henry's reception, which the combined powers of English and Flemish mechanism had rendered rare and beautiful as the marvellous house of Aladdin, so exquisitely constructed by his obedient genii.' - 'It appears to have been formed of moveable planks of timber, and covered with canvass so well painted as to resemble stone. Within, it was hung with arras and tapestry, the most rich and tasteful that the looms of Ghent could supply; but, after all these efforts of ingenuity, it was found totally inadequate to the occasion; since two thousand five hundred of the king's suite had no better resource than to lodge in tents, of which the inside was hung with white cloth, richly embroidered, and surmounted by the union rose, interlaced with the fleur-de-lys. The spot selected for this encampment was about half a league beyond the town of Guisnes, and about the same distance from the town of Arras, in whose castle lodged Francis and his gallant court. Whilst Henry and his retinue, like crusaders, remained in their splendid pavilions, necessity must have led to a different distribution of the quadrupeds in his train, of which the horse alone amounted to the enormous number of four thousand three hundred and twenty-six. To these, according to stipulation, an equal number was opposed by the French party: thus the cordial meeting which was to form an eternal union of friendship, resembled the clashing of two hostile armies, and seemed rather calculated to create impressions of distrust and jealousy than to suggest images of peace and amity, hospitality and concord.

The two kings met on the 10th of June, when they embraced and walked arm in arm around the encampment. Their attendants on both sides also fraternized, and all national prejudices seemed forgotten:—

‘After the first ceremonies between the two kings, both withdrew to a tent of cloth of gold, where, after reiterated congratulations, Henry began, pro forma, to read the articles, when, instead of designating himself the King of France, he stooped abruptly after “I, Henry, King of England,” and laughing, exclaimed, “No, not the king of France; I should be an impostor if I claimed that title, for the King of France is here.”’

Of the state of Henry's court at home, and of his singular regulations, we have the following ludicrous description:—

‘In the gorgeous finery of King Henry's court, we often trace a resemblance to the barbaric splendour and magnificence exhibited by the despots of Asia and Africa; and poorly as that age was furnished with the more elegance, conveniences, and accommodations, that essentially contribute to the comfort and refinement of modern life, it will be found, that, wherever wealth abounded, there prevailed a superfluity of all that was rare and precious,—an excess of pomp and prodigality, to which modern Europe scarcely offers any parallel. Under the Tudors, the frank hospitality of the rude Saxon monarchs was still perpetuated on public festivals, at Christmas and Easter, on Twelfth-day and Michaelmas, and some other extraordinary occasions, when the king lived in Hall, and freely treated all who asked for entertainment. In general, the palace, like the pageant so often admitted within its walls, presented a motley combination of bloated luxury and squalid wretchedness, fantastic elegance and sordid penury. The royal apartments were strewn with rushes; the stairs and floors of the other rooms were often laid with filth; and whilst fires blazed in the great chambers, hung with arras, the inferior officers were shivering with cold; and some of their attendants literally beggars.

‘Among other statutes published in the seventeenth year of this reign, at Eltham, was one, by which it was enacted, that none but decent persons should be admitted into court service; that in future no rascal should be employed in any domestic capacity; and that the scullions of the kitchen should not be permitted to go naked. By another article, it was prohibited to any of the king's household to follow the king when he should go on his pastime, unless invited. By another article, obviously dictated by Henry's personal feelings, it is enacted, that, in future, none be admitted but persons of good demeanor, fashion, gesture, countenance, and stature, so as the king's house may be furnished with such as are tried, elect, and picked for the king's honour. To the privilege of maintenance, implied in the bouche of court, a comparatively small number of the palace inmates were admitted; but, for the personal attendants, both for the king and queen, there was, in general, kept a plentiful table, and to the six maids of honour were allotted, a chet loaf and a manchet, a chine of beef, and a gallon of ale for breakfast.’

The conclusion of the picture of the court is taken from Loyd, who says,—

‘King Henry understood a man and a diah. Among the dainties which he relished, were, giggots of mutton or venison, stopped with cloves, chickens in crittury, larks, sparrows, or lamb stued, with chimes of mutton, venison pastry; jelly hippocras, cream of almonds.

‘Stabling was allowed to such of the queen's gentlewomen as were peers' daughters. Seven messes of ladies dined at the same table in the great chamber;

‘Coals were only allowed for the King, Queen, and Lady Mary's chambers.’

‘A rascal implied an illiterate vagrant; one who could not even repeat his Creed.’

‘It was expressly stipulated, that the officers of the scullery shall see silver and pewter vessels kept safe, (pewter vessels being them costly); and it is forbidden to the king's attendants to steal locks or keys from cupboards, or other articles of furniture out of noblemen's or gentlemen's houses where he goes to visit. The king's barber is enjoined to be cleanly, and by no means to frequent the company of misguided women and idle persons. The knight marshal is directed to take good care that all such upstarty and common women as follow the court be banished.’

a chet loaf and manchet, ale and wine, beef and mutton, were supplied in abundance, with the addition of capons or hens, pigeons and conies. On fast days, salt salmon, salted eels, whittings, gurnet, plaice, and flounders: fruit was reserved for lent; butter was always allowed in profusion.

‘The queen's table was furnished with more elegance, and with the additional delicacies of fricandes or custard, frythour or tart; besides every delicacy of the season.

‘The brewer is enjoined not to put hops or brimstone into the ale.

‘A swan was five shillings, a capon eighteen-pence, pigeons eight-pence per dozen; a fat heron was eight-pence, a partridge four-pence, pullets three-pence each, conies two shillings per dozen; the stork, the bustard, and the crane, were then admitted to the table.

‘A munificent provision of twenty-four loaves per day was made for the king's greyhounds; other dogs were banished the court, with the exception of spaniels kept for the ladies.

‘A gift was allowed to whoever married or made the king a present.’

In our extracts, we have hitherto scarcely noticed the heroine in these volumes, but her history cannot but be familiar to our readers, whom we refer to Nos. 57, 67, and 75, of the Literary Chronicle, where they will find many interesting particulars respecting her. As, however, love letters are very important affairs, and those of sovereigns very rare, we shall present our readers with a couple from that ‘gallant gay deceiver,’ our Eighth Harry, to Anne Boleyn. The first has a passage in it respecting the Mores, which is inexpressible:—

‘My Mistress and Friend,—I and my heart put ourselves into your hands, begging you to recommend us to your favour, and not to let absence lessen your affection to us. For it were great pity to increase our pain, which absence alone does sufficiently, and more than I could ever have thought; bringing to my mind a point of astronomy, which is, that the farther the Mores are from us, the farther, too, is the sun, and yet its heat is the more scorching; so it is with our love; we are at a distance from one another, and yet it keeps its fervency, at least on my side. I hope the like on your part, assuring you, that the uneasiness of absence is already too severe for me; and when I think of the continuance of that which I must of necessity suffer, it would seem intolerable to me, were it not for the firm hope I have of your unchangeable affection for me; and now to put you sometimes in mind of it, and seeing I cannot be present in person with you, I send you the nearest thing to that possible, that is my picture, set in bracelets, with the whole device which you know already.

wishing myself in their place, when it shall please you. This from the hand of Your servant and friend, H. Rex.'

When the popular clamour became strong, Henry found it advisable to remove Anne Boleyn from court, which Miss Benger says she quitted with 'painful impressions of disgust, not unmingled with resentment.' The following is one of Henry's letters to her during her absence:—

'To Anne Boleyn.

'The approach of the time which I have so long expected, rejoices me so much, that it seems almost ready come. However, the entire accomplishment cannot be till this two persons meet, which meeting is more desired by me than any thing in the world; for what joy can be greater upon earth, than to have the company of her who is my dearest friend? Knowing, likewise, that she does the same on her part, the thinking on which gives great pleasure. You may judge what an effect the presence of that person must have on me, whose absence has made a greater wound in my heart, than either words or writing can express, and which nothing can cure but her return. I beg you, dear mistress, to tell your father from me, that I desire him to hasten the appointment by two days, that he may be in court before the old term, or at farthest, on the day prefixed, for otherwise I shall think he will not do the lover's turn, as he said he would, nor answer my expectation. No more at present, for want of time, hoping shortly; that by word of mouth, I shall tell you the rest of my sufferings from your absence.'

With this letter we close our extracts from Miss Benger's Life of Anne Boleyn, which would have been more properly entitled, in the quaint style of less modern writers, 'Some Memorable Passages in the Reign of Henry the Eighth.' The work, however, contains much that is interesting, although we fear it will not enhance the literary reputation of the author.

The Lilian Bride, and other Poems.
By Barton Wilford. 12mo. pp. 71.
London, 1821.

If our readers do not already give us credit for a tolerable share of critical independence, they may, perhaps, call our strict impartiality in question, when we inform them, that the Lilian Bride is by a favourite correspondent, who has often enriched the poetical department of the Literary Chronicle with his elegant effusions; and further, that the work is from the press of our friend Mr. Davidson, who 'exhibits our lucubrations in fair black and white, weekly, to the public. Happipily, however, we are relieved from the task of subjecting ourselves to any suspicion in this respect, by adopting the critique, (and a poetical one too, which is a novelty,) of another of our correspondents, who sent us an 'Impromptu to Wilford, on receiving a copy of his first publication.' This impromptu we shall not insert, but merely quote a passage from it, which relates to the Lilian Bride:—

—'Nicely scattered through each part,
There's something that will touch the heart,
With many a well-told homely truth,
To suit each anxious low-sick youth.
I pity much the Arab chief!—
His was a thorough life of grief;
Though round him some few roses grew,
Fate did its thorns so thickly strew,
That when the joy was in his arms,
He clasped a mass of poisoned charms.
Ill-fated heroine! in the prime
Of life cut off!—'

We must, however, observe, in addition to the remarks of our poetical critic, that the Lilian Bride possesses many beautiful passages; the merits of which are a strong recommendation to the poem, independent of the interest of the story. The following picture of human life is finely drawn:—

'How sweet's the retrospective glance
That's ta'en of early hours,
When the young life was but a trance—
A dream of rosy bow'rs!
But dire the change from youth to age
In life's delusive pilgrimage!
A summer lake whose breath has ceased—
A raging sea that's tempest-tost—
A tender bud of early spring
That often dies—while blossoming!
But, though we are with grief oppress'd,
And the scar'd heart's a foe to rest,—
Though never more the eye may close,
Till death has darkness o'er it thrown,— Though frenzy fire the throbbing brain—
The frame be rack'd with every pain;
Still, still of life we grasp the chain.'

There is a fine tribute to the sex, and to the influence that love has on woman's heart, which we cannot forbear quoting:—

'How beautiful is that pure flame,
That finds its home in woman's heart!
Till time expires, 'tis still the same,
And never—never will depart!
The crown may be repulsive, yet
It cannot make affection fly.
Which deep within the mind is set—
'Too deep for hate to venture nigh!
For what the object lov'd has been,
When hours of joy went fast,
Is still upon the memory green,
And blossoms in affliction's blast!
And Lila, she had felt the power
Of love in a more genial hour,
And still that passion round her clung,
As if existence on it hung;
And when she saw pale sorrow's stings
Dive deep in Antae's youthful breast,
She lov'd him most when most oppress'd—
She lov'd him for his sufferings!'

The Minor Pieces possess much merit, and the whole volume shews a refined taste and a mind well cultivated. It is neatly printed, and 'got up in a style' which is calculated to increase the doting attachment of a young author to his first born, and to render it admissible into all good company.

Select Female Biography; comprising Memoirs of Eminent British Ladies, derived from Original and other Authentic Sources. 12mo. pp. 331.
London, 1821.

This volume is a pleasing memento of departed excellence; it is confined to a biography of religious females only, with the object of interesting the mind by a delineation of virtues sustained amidst all the diversities of human society, and to excite a serious consideration of the important connexion which subsists between the present character and the future destiny. The lives of the principal persons noticed in this volume, have often been before the public; they are, however, re-written and much improved.

The life of that amiable woman and elegant writer, Miss Catherine Talbot, might have been rendered more interesting, by inserting some of her letters, which are models of epistolary writing; but this would, perhaps, be extending the plan further than the biographer, who is a female, intended. We, however, would suggest to any one who may have leisure and inclination to make an interesting little volume, to collect the letters of Miss Talbot, several of which have been published in fugitive works, recently; and, we believe, there are some that have never been printed in Dr. Birch's collection of MSS. in the British Museum. Some specimens of Miss Talbot's talents are, however, given, and we select one; it is an imitation of Ossian, and was written before the peace of 1763:—

'True, Ossian, I delight in songs;
Harmony soothes my soul. It soothes it, O Ossian, but raises it far above these grassy clods and rocky hills. It exalts it far above the vain phantoms of clouds, the wandering meteors of the night.

'Li-ien in thy turn, thou sad son of Fingal, to the lonely dweller of the rock. Let thy harp rest for a while, and thy thoughts cease to retrace the war and bloodshed of the days that are past. Sightless art thou, O Ossian, and sad is thy failing age. Thine ear is to the hollow blast, and thy expectation is closed in the narrow house. Thy memory is of the deeds of thy fathers; and thy fathers, where are they? What, O Ossian, are those deeds of other times? They are horror and blood and desolation.

"Harp of Ossian, be still. Why dost thou sound in the blast, and wake my sleeping fancy? Deep and long has been its repose. Solid are the walls that surround me. The idle laugh enters not here; why then should the idler tear? Yet, Ossian, I would weep for thee: I would weep for thee, Malvina. But my days are as the flight of an arrow. Shall the arrow turn aside from its mark?"

"Bright was thy genius, Ossian! But darkness was in thy heart. It shrunk from the light of heaven. The lonely dweller of the rock sang in vain to thy deafened ear. The Grecian was not blind like thee. On him the true sun never dawned; yet he sung, though erroneously, of all-ruling Providence, and faintly looked up to the parent of Gods and men. Thy vivid fancy, O Ossian, what beheld it but a cloudy Fingal? Vain is the pride of ancestry; thou remainest by choice an orphan, in an orphan world. Did the dweller of the rock never point out to thy friendless age, a kindred higher than the heavens? A brotherhood wide as the world? A staff to thy failing steps? A light to thy sightless soul? And didst thou reject them, Ossian? What, then, is genius, but a meteor brightness? The humble, the mild, the simple, the uneloquent, with peaceful steps followed their welcome pastor, into fair meads of everlasting verdure—while thou sittest gloomy on the storm-beaten hill, repeating to the angry blast the boast of human pride, the tales of devastation, the deeds of other times. Far other times are these. Ah! would they were! still destruction spreads; still human pride rises with the tigers of the desert, and utters its horrid boast!"

A striking instance of precocity is furnished in some poems written by Caroline, daughter of the Rev. Charles Symonds, who was born in 1792, and died at the early age of eleven. We select the last by this infant genius, and which was afterwards inscribed on her tomb—

THE BLIGHTED ROSE-BUD.

Scarce had thy velvet lips imbibed the dew,
And nature baid thee, infant Queen of May;

Scarce saw thy op'ning bloom the sun's broad ray,
And on the air its tender fragrance threw;

When the north wind enamour'd of thee grew,
And from his chilling kiss, thy charms decay;
Now droops thine head, now fades thy blushing hue,

No more the queen of flow'rs, no longer gay.
So blooms a maid, her guardian's health and joy.

Her mad array'd in innocence's vest;
When suddenly, impatient to destroy,
Death clasps the victim to his iron breast:
She fades—the parent, sister, friend deplore
The charms and budding virtue, now no more.

This work we sincerely recommend to all young persons; to the religious world it can require no recommendation.

Memoirs of Mrs. Dyott, under the solemn Form of an Oath, written by herself, accounting for her Separation from General Dyott; with various Letters of the General and other Personages. 8vo. pp. 48. London, 1821.

Should any of our readers doubt that married people have often serious misunderstandings, or that law is expensive and lawyers are rapacious, let them read this little Memoir, which is ornamented with a 'goodly' portrait of the author and heroine. We, who are no sceptics on these subjects, who would not interfere between man and wife on any occasion, nor in law, if we could avoid it, shall say nothing further in this business, than that 'such things are,' and we regret their existence.

A brief Description of the Marbles collected by Lord Elgin, at Athens, &c.; and also of the Phigalian Marbles, now deposited in the British Museum. A New Edition. By J. Coombe Laskey, Esq. 12mo. pp. 35. London.

This little work contains a more minute and enlarged description of those valuable collections, the Elgin and Phigalian Marbles, than the Synopsis of the British Museum, which is published at so limited a price, as to render its notices excessively brief; besides, several of the statues, friezes, &c. not noticed at all in the Synopsis, are here described, and frequently with classical explanations, which cannot but be of service to the general reader, and must render the work a useful rade mecum to all who may visit those splendid monuments of art.

Foreign Literature.

ORIGINAL LETTER.*

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq.

Late President of the United States, to the Chevalier Julien, Editor of the Revue Encyclopédique, at Paris.

Monticello, Dec. 26.

SIR,—Long-continued ill health and a slow and uncertain convalescence, have put it out of my power to acknowledge sooner your favours of Feb. and March of the last year, and particularly to thank you for the several tracts you were so kind as to send me. The duplicate copies were disposed of as you wished, to our societies, academies, and literary characters. I read them all with pleasure, and especially the number of the Revue Encyclopédique, and its interesting views of the new works of science in Europe.

I rejoice, indeed, that the commemoration of the life and virtues of my friend Kosciuszko, is undertaken by a person so able to present them worthily to the world; the connection, too, which the several scenes of his services furnished between the three great revolutions of Poland, France, and America, cannot fail to render the work of great interest to those three countries. A citizen of the U. S. sometime since informed me, he wished to undertake this work, but I discouraged the attempt, by assuring him, it was already in hands fully qualified for the task, in a situation to learn better the incidents of his early, as well as latter life, (to which I know my fellow citizen had no means of access) and that the short interval Kosciuszko had passed in America, could hardly authorize the account of that to be entitled the History of his Life; he has, consequently, declined it, and will, I am sure, have cause to felicitate himself on having avoided a competition for which he was so little prepared.

I read, with great pleasure, the views you present of the progress of France towards a rational government; some late incidents, I had feared, portended trouble, but the earth will as soon reverse its course in its orbit as the mind of man fall back from the lights recently shed on it, to the darkness of monkish ages and impositions. The general insurrection of the south will bid defiance to the tyrants of the north, and thus armies will catch the flame they are sent to extinguish, and spread its salutary purifications over their native soil. Man has, for countless ages, been enveloped in darkness, civil and religious. The lights of science have at length found their way into his mind; he had always the power, and needed only the will to resume his rights and be free; he now has that will, and the world will at length be free. At the age of seventy-seven years, I cannot expect to see this; it is comfortable, however, to foresee it, and to pass the few days remaining to me in prayers for its speedy consummation, to which I add those for the continuance of your useful labours through long years of health and happiness.

Tablettes de la Reine D'Angleterre. &c.
The Queen of England's Tablets, in which are described the daily Occurrences which took place during Her Majesty's Travels in Sicily, Greece, Barbary, and the Holy Land; with an Historical Notice of Baron Bergami, written by himself, and his Correspondence, from his Entrance into Her Majesty's Service, to the 10th June, 1820. Translated from the Autograph MSS. of Her Majesty the Queen. By A. T. Desquiron, de St. Agnan. 1 vol. 8vo. pp. 324. Paris, 1821.

THE title of this work piqued our curiosity; for, if authentic, it is a remarkable, and even important work; our first care was, therefore, to ascertain its authenticity, by applying to M. Eymery, the publisher; his written answer was, 'Je puis vous assurer, mon cher monsieur, que le manuscrit est authentique entre mes mains.'—I can assure you, my dear sir, that the MS. is authentic, and in my hands. With this guarantee, we have perused the work with much interest, and we are happy to say that it is written with moderation, and an air of truth in every page. The journal of the Queen's travels was kept, it appears, by M. Schiavini, day by day. In our next number, we shall give copious extracts from it. The letters of the baron are to persons of rank and consideration: the Advocate Cadozzi, the Countess A.—the Marquis de Ghisliery,—the Marquis de B.—the General Borgia, whom he addresses, 'My dear general,' &c.

He thus describes his family:—
'I was born at Creone, of noble parents. The hospital of the town was founded by my ancestors, and it is well known that the right of making pious foundations belonged, formerly, in Italy, only to the most illustrious families.

'There exists two great families in the world, one which rises, the other which descends. Mine, after being raised to the pinnacle of fortune, is fallen into obscurity, and then into oblivion.

'He who reproaches me with my point of departure, from which I have arrived at the honourable title of Chamberlain to the Queen of England, would not be what I am had he been in my place.

'I was destined to the study of the higher sciences,—my country called me to arms, and I obeyed the appeal. A soldier from choice alone, I was soon distinguished for my courage; it was in the field of battle that I gained and merited my successive steps of rank,—how many of my proud detractors, without having merited any thing, have been happy enough to obtain every thing.'

From another part of the work, it appears he had here Colonel Brown in his eye, whom he states to have been raised from a lieutenant to the rank of a colonel, for his military services at—Milan.

'Is it thought that any one has a right to slander me, because, in the household of the Queen of England, I have filled offices unworthy of my birth,—true nobility only loses its dignity when it has forfeited its honour; and what gentleman is there in adverse fortune who would not solicit the title of valet de chambre to his King?' p. 54.

As this is only a preliminary article on this highly curious and interesting work; we shall conclude it with a translation of one of his letters to General Borgia, at Naples:—

'De la Baronna, 15th Dec. 1816.

'My Dear General,—H. R. Hss. charges me to express to you her gratitude for the pains you have taken in procuring the information she wished to obtain; it is impossible to confer a favour with a greater grace.

'I address you from the Baronna. H. R. Hss. has been graciously pleased to visit this little domain, which I partly owe to her generous presents; at first she only intended remaining two days, but the situation pleasing her, and the house being commodious, she staid longer; besides, the milk and fruits of this part of the country are excellent, the air is salubrious, and its proximity to Milan adds to its charms; I, therefore, am induced to hope, that H. R. Hss. will deign to honour it a second time with her presence.

'You will readily conceive, my dear general, that I omitted nothing to make the Baronna wear the air of a fête during H. R. Hss's residence: a little ball, got up without any securing preparation, seemed to please her much. You must know that, like monarchs of former ages, we have a buffoon in our suite. This I must explain to you. On our return from the Holy Land, I was shewn at Jaffa, a man called Mahomet, a kind of savage, more man than ourang outang, but quite as uncivilized, untractable, and wild; he inspired fear, but never felt it; disliking labour, he became a stable boy, taking care of travellers' horses, which he could break and master admirably.

'The persons he was with, desiring, no doubt, to get rid of him, persuaded me to get him into the service of H. R. H. and I got her to take him as groom. He left without either pain or pleasure; I alone have been able to master his savage temper—he trembles at my sight, and even endeavours to anticipate my orders.

'At present, the Turk Mahomet, more humanized by half, repeats, even before H. R. Hss. at the least sign that I make, a dance very common in India, which the Spaniards have imitated in their bolero, and that the Turks are remarkably fond of.

'Nothing in the world can be more grotesque than to see a man, whose looks are disgusting, and whose figure is far from being handsome, agitate himself, change place with agility, hasten and slacken his motions, rise and fall in cadence, advance with measured step, and retire as modestly would shrink back at an insult offered.

'These kind of sports are much in vogue at present at the Baronna, and, according to all appearances, the Turk Mahomet will not wait for occupation.

'But I dwell too long, my dear general, on such a subject; I have scarcely left myself room to renew to you the expression of the friendship I have vowed for you; never shall I forget the moment when, visiting me on my sick bed at Naples, you delivered me the brevet of Captain of Lancers. Had it been possible for me then to accept the honourable service offered me, I should have taken part in the war just concluded, in which I, perhaps, might have distinguished myself in following your steps. I conclude.

'Adieu, dear general, preserve me always a place in your valuable friendship.

B. PARGAMI.'

The work contains many curious anecdotes of Baron Ompteda, Sir William Gell, the Hon. Keppel Craven, Miss Forbes, Lady Charlotte Lindsay, &c. from which we shall make selections for the concluding article of this review.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

[It has long been a reproach to this country, that neither our temples nor our monuments can be seen by either subjects or foreigners, except at an expense which must keep them concealed from a great proportion of the residents and visitors of the British metropolis. The lower, we believe, cannot be seen at a less expense than half a guinea. At St. Paul's, you are made, at almost every step, to pay twopences, sixpences, &c. until they amount to five or six shillings; unless you go during divine service, when you save twopence. Westminster Abbey costs you half a crown, independent of a gratuity to the exhibitor, who, before he has finished, assures you that he has nothing but what he gets from the generosity of the visitors. We might enumerate the Monument—the Roman Catholic Chapel in Moorfields, &c.; but, in fact, there is nothing in London worth seeing, for which you must not pay dearly, the British Museum excepted. And yet there appears to be a disposition to complain of the limited access to this splendid establishment, while the clerical extortions at our temples are entirely unnoticed. A few weeks ago, a young gentleman, Mr. Lennard, who is in his legislative honeymoon, moved for some returns from the British Museum, namely, 1. An account of the number of applications to the trustees for admission to the collections of minerals not generally shown, and to the medals and coins, the prints and drawings, and to the reading room; and the number of admissions granted on such applications during the last five years.—2. An account of the amount of the annual salaries, and of the monies paid to each of the librarians and other officers attendant on the Museum; the nature and extent of their accommodation, as to lodging, perquisites, &c.; and also all statutes and rules of the trustees of the British Museum now in force, with respect to admission to the reading room, and the different collections, &c. The returns have now been made to the House of Commons, and most satisfactory they are. They fully justify our assertion of last week, that, at the British Museum, 'every facility of access is given consistent with the security of the invaluable treasures there deposited.' As the Museum is a national establishment, the public should be rightly informed as to its management; and we now, therefore, proceed to present our readers with the most important parts of the report, reserving any further remarks on the subject to a future opportunity.]—Ed.

The Report states the applications to see the minerals not generally shown have been either for the private view of a party of visitors, or more generally for the inspection of a single class of minerals or even an individual specimen by some geologist. In all which cases, the officer of the department has always granted the request.

In the case of the Medal Room, Tuesday, from twelve till four in every week, was fixed, by the trustees in 1814, for the exhibition of Coins and Medals to persons making particular application to see them. But in all cases where inquiry was made by collectors, or by persons for literary or other useful purposes, they have been immediately shown by the keeper of the Antiquities and Medals; 'referring those parties only to the principal Librarian's permission who were desirous of seeing the collection without any particular object.'

Since the extensive thefts committed in 1806, access to the collection of Prints was closed until they could be arranged and fastened in port-folios. After that arrangement was completed, one day in each week was set apart to view the collection. Since 1816, the Print Room has been nominally opened two, but really, by the direction of the Trustees, five days in each week."

'In respect of applications for admission to the Reading Room, they have been, as nearly as possible, commensurate with the admissions. No refusal having been ever given even to persons unknown or unrecommended; but the application postponed till the person applying could furnish the required reference.

'The admissions to the Reading Room have been of three descriptions.—The first, consisting of persons admitted as students for the full term, by the Standing Committee. The second, of persons who have, for special purposes, received admission for a shorter term, above the space of a day, and not exceeding a fortnight: these permissions have been granted by the Principal Librarian. The third description consisting of persons who have made casual and momentary researches only, such as inquiring after a single book or manuscript, a fact or a date, or who have had permission to consult particular articles for a morning. Of this last description no record or register whatever has been preserved.

'The number of tickets of admission and renewal to the Reading Room, for the full term allowed by the Standing Committee, for the last five years, has been as follows:—

'A.D. 1810	292
1817	437
1818	477
1819	503
1820	515

Making a total of.. 2224

'Admissions not exceeding a fortnight in duration, as far as they can be recollected:—

'A.D. 1816	28
1817	39
1818	67
1819	59
1820	48

Making a total of.. 251

'Total of admissions in the last five years recorded, 2475.

'The statute for the admission of Students to the Gallery of Sculptures being among those required by the order of the House of Commons, it may not be irrelevant to add, that the number of students who were admitted to make drawings in the Townley Gallery, from the year 1809 to the year 1817, amounted to an average of something more than twenty.

'In 1818, immediately subsequent to the opening of the Elgin Room, two hundred and twenty-three students were admitted; in 1819, sixty-nine more were admitted; and, in 1820, sixty-three. In 1821, from Jan. 1st to Feb. 20th, twenty-five. Making a total, since the opening of the room, of three hundred and eighty.

'Every student sent by the keeper of the Royal Academy, upon the production of his academy ticket, is admitted without further reference to make his drawings; and other persons are occasionally admitted, on simply exhibiting the proofs of their qualification.

'According to the present practice, each student has leave to exhibit his finished drawing, from any article in the Gallery, for one week after its completion.

'AMOUNT OF ANNUAL SALARIES and other MONIES paid to the present Officers, &c. of the British Museum.

'Principal Librarian.—Joseph Planta, Esq. salary 200l. per annum. No extra remuneration of any kind.

'Under and Assistant Librarians.—Each bound by the statutes to give two days attendance in the week to the duties of their respective offices:—

'Under Librarians.—1. Henry Ellis, Esq. keeper of the manuscripts. Salary 200l. per annum for two days attendance. Extra allowance for two additional days in the week (at the rate of 75l. per annum for each day*) 150l.—(He is also secretary.)

—2. The Rev. H. H. Baber, keeper of the printed books. Salary, 200l. per annum for two days. Extra allowance for two other days, 150l.—3. Charles Knog, Esq. keeper of the natural history. Salary, 200l. per annum, for two days. Extra allowance for three other days, 225l.—4. Taylor Combe, Esq. keeper of the antiquities, including coins and medals. Salary, 200l. per annum for two days. Extra allowance for three other days, 225l.

'Assistant Librarians.—1. The Rev. T. Maurice, assistant keeper of the manuscripts. Salary, 120l. per annum. No extra allowance.—2. The Rev. James Bean, assistant keeper of the printed books. Salary, 120l. per annum. Extra allowance for two additional days of duty, 150l.

—3. Dr. Leach, assistant keeper of the natural history. Salary, 120l. No extra allowance at present, being absent upon account of illness.—4. John George Children, Esq. assistant keeper of the antiquities. Salary, 120l. Extra allowance for three additional days, 225l.

'Extra Assistant Officers.—Each bound to five days attendance in the week:—

'Dr. G. H. Noehden, in the department of printed books. Salary, 200l. Extra allowance for an additional day, 75l.

'Mr. J. T. Smith in the department of antiquities. Salary, 200l. No extra allowance.

'Secretary.—Henry Ellis, Esq. Salary, 60l. No extra allowance.

'Accountant.—Mr. T. Keith. Salary, 30l. Extra allowance for assisting the expeditor, 10l.

'Attendant of Reading Room.—Mr. James Cates. Salary, 100l. Extra allow-

* The extra allowance of the officers was first made in 1811. It was increased from 50l. to 75l. a year for each extra day, Feb. 12, 1814.

ance on Saturdays, when employed, 5s. per day.

There are also five attendants, who, under the direction of the librarians, perform all menial services in the different departments; their duty extending to five days in the week. These have each 75l. per annum. There are likewise eight extra attendants, who are stationed on the three open days in every week in different parts of the house, to prevent any trespass or irregularity on the part of the companies; they are paid at the rate of five shillings per day each.

We pass over the particular duties of each officer, but there does not appear to be any sinecure. The total amount of the extra allowance of the British Museum, during the last ten years, amounts to 11,130l. In this period, catalogues have been made of the 900,000 volumes of which the Library of printed books consists; of the Lansdowne and Hargrave Collections of MSS.; and others are in preparation. Several volumes of descriptions of the Antiquities, Medals, &c. have also been prepared in the same time. Eight officers of the Museum are lodged within its walls. The only perquisites they have is that of stationery, which amounts to an average of from 5l. to 6l. each.

In respect to the Rules for Admission, the Museum is open for public inspection every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, in every week, from ten o'clock till four, except in Christmas, Easter, and Whitsun weeks, on Thanksgiving and Fast Days, and during the months of August and September.

The members of the Royal Academy, and artists, as well professional as dilettanti, may have access at all admissible times to copy from the sculptures in the Gallery of Antiquities, upon application to the trustees, or to the principal librarian, or the senior officer in residence; but it is expected that young artists or students produce recommendations from a professor of the Academy.

The Reading Room of the Museum shall be kept open from ten till four every day in the week, except Saturdays and Sundays, and for one week at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, and on thanksgiving and fast days; and it shall be constantly attended by one of the librarians in the manner above directed.

Persons desirous of admission into the said room are to send their applications in writing to the principal librarian, or, in his absence, to the senior under librarian; these officers are to lay the same before the next general meeting, or committee of trustees, who will, if they see no objection, grant admission for a term not exceeding half a year. But in all cases which may require such dispatch, as that time cannot be allowed for an application to the trustees, the principal librarian, or, in his absence, the senior officers in residence, shall be empowered to grant a temporary leave till the next general meeting or committee.

Persons who apply for admission to the reading room are to specify their descriptions and places of abode; and, as it might be dangerous, in so populous a metropolis as London, to admit perfect strangers, it is expected that every one who applies should produce a recommendation from a trustee or an officer of the house.

Every reader may, at the expiration of his term, apply for a prolongation of the same, without a fresh recommendation.

BONAPARTE.

On what foundation stands the warrior's pride? How just his hopes? Let Bonaparte decide.

A frame of adamant, a soul of fire,
No dangers fright him, and no labours tire;
No joys to him pacific sceptres yield,

War sounds the trumpet, he rushes to the field;
Behold surrounding kings their power combine;
And some capitulate, and some resign;

Peace courts his hand, but spreads her charms
in vain;

'Think nothing gain'd,' he cries, 'till nought remains,

On Moscow's walls till Gollic standards fly,
And all be mine beneath the polar sky.'

The march begins in military state,
And nations on his eye suspended wait;

Stern famine guards the solitary coast,
And winter barricades the realms of frost;

He comes, nor want nor cold his course delay;
Hide, blushing glory, hide Smolenko's day!

The vanquish'd hero leaves his broken bands,
And shews his miseries in distant lands;

Condemn'd a needy supplicant to wait,
While ladies interpose and slaves debate;

But did not chance at length her error mend?
Did no subverted empire mark his end?

Did rival monarchs give the fatal wound?
Ox hostile millions press him to the ground,

His fall was destined to a barren strand,
A petty island, and a dubious hand;

He left the name at which the world grew pale,
To point a moral or adorn a tale.

PAINTINGS

IN PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Whatever difference of opinion may exist in the minds of your correspondents, Mr. Parry and Mr. Price, or others, relative to the encouragement of paintings in places of worship, it will give me sincere pleasure to reconcile the matter so as to please all. And, in unison with my own sentiments, I believe all will feel. There are a great number of public institutions at the present day, and they have commodious places in which to transact their private and public business. Some of them are national and others are private property. The proposition which I have to offer is, 'that such places should be decorated with the choice efforts of artists of every description, suitably to the nature and means of the institutions.' Corporate bodies particularly, and courts of justice also, might annually spare sufficient from their funds and fees to forward the object. There are walls enough in this populous city to contain the wonders of the divine art of painting; and while thousands of pounds are annually spent on less worthy objects, it would immortalize distinguished characters to encourage this. A new painting now and then in each of the old walls would be a most desirable acquisition, and without interfering with the portraits of aldermen and prime wardens, to 'cheer them up a little,' how refreshing would works of modern execution be in the society of ancient paintings. I have read some of the most beautiful poetry on a canvas leaf, and how valuable a book must magnificent walls, with light windows, contain?—I mean, full of paintings!

But, Sir, the truth is, good eating and drinking are the last things an Englishman relinquishes; this is a reformation very desirable*, but which will scarcely happen except in a time of famine. But as there are many worthy citizens and opulent members of church and state, who see nothing in the times requiring charity, I advise them, who have the means in their purses, to be more liberal towards artists and the arts, and to eternize their own memories in the fruition of that which is not transient and perishable; then every public edifice would become hallowed, and every observer, in the survey, would tread on classic ground.

I have so high a veneration for the art, that I wish to hear of orders for large paintings, and that the palette, the pencil, and the brush, might be in full exercise by every tracing hand and heaven-directing eye.

I am, Sir, yours constantly.

A FEW WORDS ON THE LETTER O!

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

O!—What a useful, little, circular letter thou art! It would be a vain effort of importance, if the crier were to attempt to issue his proclamation without thee. It is with thy exquisite parenthesis that the cry of mackerel reaches the housewife's ears, and reminds her of the pot and larder during divine service. It is with thy accommodating sound that the queen of the barrow penetrates the avenues of the kitchen. As the tenor bell is to cover the rest of a peal, so it is thy highly valued privilege to cover the intonations of bad grammar. As the first commences its career upon silence, so dost thou precede thy companioned litterers, and call the attention of an auditory. I know not who is thy contemporary, for thou art above competition. Thou art attached to the land of cakes, for ever dwelling in Scotland. Thou residest in Hibernia's names, and art honoured with a capital. Thou art the strength of a town and the second in a tower. Nothing is dear to the lover or his mistress unless thy expressive force be applied to the lip with the fond emotion of the heart. The nurse, who sits patiently beside the cradle, or lulls her careful charge, the infant upon her knees, in joy and sorrow, encouragement and impatience, calls thee to atone for all misdeeds, misgivings, and deed-giving misses. Young master cannot stride his rocking-horse and whip his servile port without thy indulgence and application. The hen-pecking common-councilman's lady, exclaims to her dear partner, 'O how foolish!' and, 'O what an unsensible man for a husband!' Her daughter, who, in London, is not afraid of an officer in the Guards, or a posse of constables in her papa's office, is the first to call O to her assistance at the sight of an industrious frog, leaping across the paddock for his dinner. O! what a treasurable virtue there is in gold, locks the miser in his secret and solitary chambers. Thou art a note of admiration; and the most admirable notes are indited by thee. Xerxes took thee on his tongue to the waves, Cicero to the senate, and Demosthenes to his cell. Kean formed thee to the appalling essence of beautiful sublimity and touching grandeur, in Brutus. The judge gives the awful impression of his sentence to the criminal, when he says, 'O, young man!' and the exquisite, at meeting his acquaintance, 'O Tom! is it you?' or the suspicious critic, 'O, I thought so!' or the exasperated father, 'O thou arrant rascal!' or the shivering beggar, when ascending your steps, 'O sir! have pity on the poor unfortunate tradesman;' or the philosopher, 'O wonderful!' the clergyman, 'O sinner!' Though P is the first letter of priority, yet in every dramatic fracas, whether of opposition or of old prices, thou art first pronounced, and makest a drowning key. Thou art the supreme concord to a lottery-office keeper, because thou canst be nothing more than a cipher, and art ever ready to prove a blank. The school-boy screws thee into his mouth at the thought of castigation; the catholic priest draws thee from his breast on approaching the sacristy; the mathematician describes thee in his circles as an infallible guide; the pretty heart-killing coquette makes a dozen conquests in an evening, with the adroitness which thou inspirest; the methodist itinerant surveys the bountiful luxury of his benefactor's table, and breathes thee over the delicious steam and hunger-creating odour. Thou risest on the wind from the perishing seaman's despair, and slippest round the corners of streets like a messenger, from the nervous throat of a dustman. Yet, after thy thousand uses, abuses, and ejaculations, thou, like the world, art round but hollow. Thou art sincere, too, and the last whisperer of dying lips. There is often more expressive truth breathed from thy one sigh, than millions can purchase. Thou art the child of the acute pang,—the child also of elastic joy. The flower of true affection,—the tongue's last effort of life,—the nearest fugitive that lingers and dies from death.

IO SONO.

THE OPINIONS OF ANCIENT PHILOSOPHERS ON THE MARRIAGE STATE.

Euripides, the Greek Poet.—Happy is the man who hath a good wife; more happy is he who hath none. And again, whether in sickness or in health, a man will find his sweetest consolation in a loving wife; for, in that compound of good and evil, with which our life is blessed or cursed, she divides the one, and increases the other, by her diligent and frequently successful care.

Socrates, (as we are informed by Xenophon.)—Whether you marry or not, is your affair, not mine. But, whichever you do, you will every day have a hundred reasons to repent; for, if you do not marry, you will be incessantly complaining of the inconvenience attending a state of celibacy; your imagination will want its object; you will be officiously painting the happiness you conceive to exist in a marriage state, and you will sigh that you cannot partake of it; and if you do marry, you will scarcely be in possession of a wife, before you wish you had none.

Hipponar.—The two happiest days you pass with a wife are, the day on which you marry, and the day on which death walks off with her.

Theodectes.—Old age and marriage are similar things. We desire both to happen, and when they grant our request, we are so ungrateful as to complain.

* We confess we differ from our correspondent, and do not consider there can be any reformation as to good eating and drinking; the excess is the only evil.—ED.

Diogenes, (the Woman-Hater.)—If you are young, my friend, it is too soon to marry; for liberty is sweet. He must be a fool indeed, who deprives himself of this blessing in the flower of his days. If, on the other hand, you are old, what would you do with a wife? Be advised, friend, neither to marry nor let it alone: remain in suspense till to-morrow, and death will settle the matter.

Cato, (as is said by Erasmus.) was of opinion, that the happiest condition of man was to be free from wedlock. But, however, we read in another author, that he was also of opinion, that though it is inconvenient to live with a wife, yet it is more so to live without one; therefore, a wife may be justly termed a necessary evil.

Secundus.—A wife (says he) is the shipwreck of her husband—a tempest at home—the death of quietness—the captivity of life—a daily curse—a voluntary strife—a superfluous war—a ferocious guest—a malicious animal—and a necessary evil.

NORTHERN EXPEDITION.

Our readers are aware, that the expedition over land, towards the Polar Sea, under the conduct of Lieutenant Franklin, had arrived on the Athabasca Lake* in June last. Upon this subject, the Gentleman's Magazine has published interesting extracts from a private communication, whence we select the following passages:—

* The journey, a distance of eight hundred miles, was performed in two months. I need not describe to you, who are such a general reader, the mode of travelling with dogs and sledges; nor mention the inconveniences produced by the severity of a North American winter; but I will bear my testimony to the painful initiation into the daily practice of walking on snow shoes, the misery of pained ankles and galled feet, which a novice

* Athabasca Lake is situate in 59 deg. N. lat., and extends from 110 to 115 deg. W. long. It is surrounded by the dreary wilds of North America; which is solely inhabited by savage tribes of Indians. It is bounded by the Chipewyan Indians and the Great Slave Lake on the north; by the Peace River, the Caribbee Mountains, and the Strongbow Indians, on the west; the Great Athabasca River on the south; and by the dismal and solitary wilds of America on the east.—Hudson's Bay is about one hundred miles east of Athabasca Lake, and that vast extent of territory is almost uninhabited.

invariably has to contend against, and which patience and perseverance alone will enable him to surmount; they were my companions for seven or eight days; afterwards I felt no inconvenience.

* You can easily imagine the pleasure which a traveller feels at arriving at his encampment under such circumstances. This you will probably suppose to be a sheltered place, whereas its preparation simply consists in clearing away the snow on the ground, and placing thereon branches of pine, on which the party spread their blankets, coats, &c. and sleep in comfort, with a large fire at their feet, though the thermometer be forty degrees below Zero, and with nothing but the canopy of heaven to cover them. Here the voyager soon forgets his fatigues and cares; and, having supped, lolls, stretched at his ease, listening with pleasure to the various narratives of his experienced companions, who usually expatiate at length on the never-failing subject of past adventures.

* I had a great treat on my rout in seeing the huge and shapeless buffulo (or bison of Buffon,) and witnessing the different methods of obtaining them. The most dextrous way is, when a well-mounted rider dashes at a herd, singles out an animal, which he contrives to separate from the rest, and by managing his horse keeps him apart; and whenever he can get sufficiently near for the ball to penetrate the hide, he fires, though going at full speed, and seldom fails in bringing down his mark. The principal dangers on this service are, either that his horse will fall into some of the numerous holes which the hädger makes, or that the enraged animal should turn furiously round when wounded, and gail his horse, or succeed in dismounting him. When the herd are particularly on their guard, horses cannot be used. The rider then dismounts, and crawls towards the herd through the snow, taking care to remain motionless when any of them are looking towards him. You will easily imagine this service cannot be very agreeable, when mercury will freeze, which is often the case.

* The Indians have another method by constructing a pound. The principal dexterity in this, consists in getting the animals once to enter the roadway—fear then urges them on, and many men are stationed at the head to dispatch them. We visited one of these places near an Indian encampment, and one of my companions took an accurate drawing of the whole scene. In the animal he has been particularly fortunate, which has been wanted; for I never saw any thing bearing the least resemblance to a buffalo before.

* In the countries where these animals chiefly resort, (grassy plains,) the natives are much more independent than the others; having food and clothing easy to be provided.

* All the nations southward of this have suffered much this year, from the prevailing diseases which have raged amongst them, and carried off many, especially children. They have now generally recovered their strength, but not their spirits which are always depressed on the loss of relatives. There was an instance of keen sensibility exhibited here a few days ago by a whole tribe, which would be scarcely excepted in such uninformed minds; they declined to pitch their tents this season on a spot where they had long been accustomed to do, for fear the circumstance should revive the moments of grief they had all experienced in the loss of many relations, or the place should remind them of past pleasures in the society of friends whom they were never to see again. This race of men, Chipewyans, are a mild, timid set of persons, excellently described in Hearne and Mackenzie's voyages.

* The cold was more severe than has been for many years. Both the old stagers and Indians have complained very much. I have not experienced more severity than I was prepared to expect; when travelling, I could generally keep myself warm by walking.

* You would enjoy the clear frosty nights; the stars appear with uncommon brilliancy, but the weather is too cold for making observations with any accuracy. The Aurora Borealis is occasionally very fine, and of the most variable kind, both in motion and colours.*

CURIOUS EPITAPHS.

On Mr. Thomas Brown.

Heark lies Thomas Brown, who brown paper made,
And making of brown paper was his trade.

Shall all we die?
We shall die all:
All die shall we?
Die all we shall.

On a Lawyer.

See how God works his wonders now and then,
Hark lies a lawyer and an honest man.

In the Church-Yard of Boughton, near Northampton.

Time was, I stood where thou dost now,
And view'd the dead, as thou dost me;
E'er long thou'lt lie as low as I,
And others stand, and look at thee.

On a Grave-stone in Cheriton Church Yard Warwickshire.

Here old John Randal lies,
Who, counting from his tale,
Lived three score years and ten,
Such virtue was in ale.
Ale was his meat,
Ale was his drink,
Ale did his heart revive;
And if he could have drunk his ale,
He still had been alive.

In the Church-Yard at Datchet, near Windsor.

Here lies the body of John Bidwell,
Who when in life wish'd his neighbour no evil;
In hopes up to jump,
When he hears the last trump,
And triumph over death and the Devil.

Epitaph on William Pryne.

Here lies the corps of William Pryne,
A bencher late of Lincoln's Inn,
Who restless ran through thick and thin.
This grand scriptural paper speller,
This endless, needless, margin filler,
Was strangely toss'd from post to pillar;
His brain's career was never stopping;
But pen with rheum, with gall still dropping,
Till hand o'er head brought ears to cropping.
Nor would he rest surcease such themes,
But prostitute new virgin realms
To types of his fantastic dream;
But whilst he this hot humour tugs,
And for more length of tether tugs,
Death fang'd the remnant of his legs. 1699

INDIAN ELOQUENCE.

THE following specimen of Indian eloquence is given in a letter from Major O'Fallon, U. S. agent at Prairie du Chien to Governor Edwards. Logan is dead! but our readers will discover that the fire which animated his soul still lives among his descendants.—American paper.

On the close of a grand council that I held, a few weeks since, with the chiefs and warriors of several bands of Sioux, residing on and near the St. Peter's, one of them rose and addressed me as follows:—

'American chief! since my remembrance, my heart (medal) has been that of an Englishman; I have borne it upon my breast: I have worshipped it as my God; but the Big Knives (the Americans) returned again masters of my land. The red coats (British) appeared no longer gay. The greedy, but timid wolf (still in allusion to British) sought the thicket for a hiding place. I became ashamed! I tore from my neck the unfaithful heart; not to destroy it—I kept it until the last wanetoo (winter), when a difference occurred between my nation and the Chippewas. Some of my young men cried (suffered in the conflict). Their hearts were blackened for revenge. I saw the gathering cloud, I knew they still wore and valued much the British hearts. I yielded mine, and dispelled the cloud. I looked back; I look forward. I heard the Big Knives had made you our chief. I was told to turn my back upon the smooth-faced chief. I closed my ears; I was no longer deceived. I heard of your arrival. I am come, accompanied by some of my warriors, to see you. I have listened with attention to your words—such as I have never heard before. I will remember them, carry them to my nation, and recount them to my people.

'American chief! you have hung upon my neck an American heart; mine feels glad; from this day it is yours. American chief! you talk of visiting our land the ensuing spring. I will be glad to see you—my nation, I am in hopes, will treat you well; but, my friend, believe not that I speak for my mighty nation, which, I am sorry to say, is too much divided, cut up into small bands, which are scattered over an extensive tract of country, and most generally headed by chiefs whose ears are closed against truth, and whose eyes are blind to their own interest, and whose hearts are attached to the designing British. It is not for myself alone to speak, but also for those few adherents who have followed me to see you. I have said enough. I have done. I am going. I will try (to influence my tribe in your favour.)'

COMMERCIAL INTEGRITY.

The Spanish gallies destined to supply Terra Firma, and the kingdoms of Peru and Chili, with almost every article of necessary consumption, touched first at Carthagena, and then at Porto Bello. In the latter place a fair is opened; the wealth of America, is exchanged for the manufactures of Europe; and during its prescribed term of forty days, the richest traffic on the face of the earth is begun and finished with unbounded confidence, and the utmost simplicity of transactions. No bale of goods is ever opened, no chest of treasure is examined; both are received on the credit of the persons to whom they belong; and only one instance of fraud is recorded, during the long period in which trade was carried on with this liberal confidence. All the coined silver which was brought from Peru to Porto Bello in the year 1654, was found to be adulterated, and to be mingled with a fifth part base metal. The Spanish merchants, with their usual integrity, sustained the whole loss, and indemnified the foreigners by whom they were employed. The fraud was detected, and the treasurer of the revenue in Peru, the author of it, was publicly burnt.

A YOUNG RAW PREACHER.

(From Bishop Earles's Micro-Cosmography, A. D. 1659.)

A YOUNG raw preacher is a bird not yet fledged, that hath hopt out of his nest to be chirping on a hedge, and will be stragling abroad at what peril soever. His backwardness in the university hath set him thus forward; for had he not trauented there, he had not been so hasty a divine. His small standing and time hath made him a proficient only in boldness, out of which and his table-book he is furnished for a preacher. His collections of study are the notes of sermons, which, taken up at St. Mary's, he utters in the country. And if he write Brachygraphy, his stock is so much the better. His writing is more than his reading; for he reads only what he gets without book. Thus accomplished, he comes down to his friends, and his first salutation is grace and peace out of the pulpit. His prayer is conceited, and no man remembers his college more at large. The pace of his sermon is a full career, and he runs wildly over hill and dale, till the clock stop him. The labour of it is chiefly in his lungs; and the only things he has made in it himself are the faces. He takes on against the pope without mercy, and hath a jest still in lavender for Bellarmine. Yet he preaches heresy if it come in his way, though with a mind, I must needs say, very orthodox; his action is all passion, and his speech interjections; he hath an excellent faculty in bemoaning the people, and spits with a very good grace; his style is compounded of twenty several men's, only his body imitates some one extraordinary: he will not draw his handkerchief out of his place, or blow his nose without discretion; his commendation is, that he never looks upon book, and, indeed, he was never used to it: he preaches but once a-year, though twice a-Sunday; for the stuff is still the same, only the dressing a little altered; he hath more tricks with a sermon than a taylor with an old cloak to turn it, and piece it, and at last quite disguise it with a new preface. If he have waded further in his profession, and would show reading of his own, his authors are postils, and his school divinity a catechism. His fashion and demure habit get him in with some town precisian, and make him a guest on Friday nights. You shall know him by his narrow velvet cape, and serge facings, and his ruff, next his hair, the shortest thing about him. The companion of his walk is some zealous tradesman, whom he astonisheth with strange points, which they both understand alike. His friends and much painfulness may prefer him to thirty pounds a-year, and this means, to a chamber-maid with whom we leave him now in the bonds of wedlock. Next Sunday you shall have him again.

A GRAVE DIVINE.

From the same.

A Grave Divine is one that knows the burden of his calling, and hath studied to make his shoulders sufficient; for which he hath not been hasty to launch forth of his port, the university, but expected the ballast of learning and the wind of opportunity. Divinity is not the beginning, but the end of his studies, to which he takes the ordinary stair, and makes the arts his way. He counts it not profuseness to be polished with human reading, or to smooth his way by Aristotle to school divinity; he hath sounded both religions, and anchored in the best, and is a protestant out of judgment, not fashion; not because his country, but his reason is on this side. The ministry is his choice, not refuge, and yet the pulpit not his itch, but fear. In his discourse there is substance, not all rhetoric, and he utters more things than words. His speech is not helped with enforced actions, but the matter acts itself; he shoots all his meditations at one butt; and beats upon his text, not the cushion, making his hearers, not the pulpit, groan. In citing of popish errors, he cuts them with argument, not cudgels them with barren invectives; and labours more to show the truth of his cause than the spleen. His sermon is limited by the method, not the hour-glass, and his devotion goes along with him out of the pulpit. He comes not up thrice a-week, because he would not be idle; nor talks three hours together, because he would not talk nothing; but his tongue preaches at fit times, and his conversation is the very day's exercise. In matters of ceremony he is not ceremonious, but thinks he owes that reverence to the church to bow his judgment to it, and makes more conscience of schism than a surplice. He esteems the church's hierarchy as the church's glory; and, however we jar with Rome, would not have our confusion distinguish us. In symoniacal purchases he thinks his soul goes in the bargain, and is loth to come by promotion so dear. Yet his worth at the length advances him; and the price of his own merit buys him a living. He is no base grater of his tythes, and will not wrangle for the odd egg. The lawyer is the only man he hinders, by whom he is sighted for taking up quarrels. He is a main pillar of our church, though not yet dean or canon, and his life our religion's best apology: his death is the last sermon, where, in the pulpit of his bed, he instructs men to die by his example.

PLAYING CARDS.

CARDS are mentioned as the diversion of the Scottish Court in 1501, before our's had an idea of them. They were called quartes, four sided things; in French, cartes. Charles the Sixth was the first we read of in Europe who made his amusement consist in arranging and disposing the four suits, originally devised to represent the four classes or description of men, hommes de choir, viz quier men, choir men; clergy, now called hearts; carreaux, or piques or spades, for the soldiery; and trefle, or trefol, clubs for the agriculturists. These are green still in some packs of cards on the Continent, and, as to the suit of diamonds, they have in Italy now, when playing taracco, the representation of a coin upon them. The king of hearts had a chorister's gown on his back, A. D. 1783, at Seville and Barcelona; but l'as de pieq, as a good soldier, conquers in every game. The nine of diamonds had a reference to nine luckless merchants, combined for some discovering enterprise, about the time when all eyes were turned westward; it is called the curse of Scotland, from their failure. It is a well known vulgarity in England to say, 'Come, Sir, will you have a stroke at the history of the four kings?' meaning, will you play a game at cards. Yet has this phrase a deep and rational meaning. These four kings represent the four great monarchies, under—

Jews, Greeks, Romans, Franks.
David, Alexander, Cesar, Charlemagne.

They lead the four suits—
Hearts, Spades, Clubs, Diamonds.

The Queens are,
Esther, Angine, Pallas, Judith.

The above names are yet on the packs of cards in France. Knaves are valets. Servetus Burn tells us, that in Sezon, knafa, or knapha, signifies a servant. The Spaniards, notwithstanding the trefle, call that suit bastos. Accordingly we find the ace of clubs at ombre and quadrille called basto. We, translating thence, say clubs; and the thing we call spades, is evidently a pike's head; but we do not mean a gardener's spade, we mean a sword, from the Spanish espada.

Original Poetry.

TO ERIN—ST. PATRICK'S ANNIVERSARY

'Much thou hast yet to see.—MILTON.'

LAND of the shamrock's triad leaves,
Blue lakes and minstrel'd hills,
In whose green bosom nature weaves
Her woodlands, glens, and rills —
Thy sons invoke their saint to-day
And triumph o'er the string,
To sweeten the musical chords away
With a 'health to George the King!'

Land of the brave and Oasian's sires;
Dome sky and emerald wave,
Where freedom lingers in her fires,—
The patriot in his grave!
Inspire their fervid hope and feeling,
Espouse the birth of spring,
Emancipation's cause revealing,
And a—health to George the King!

O may thy sons united live
In glory, without war;
And in the arms of peace receive
The light of reason's star!
Then, under their lov'd roof and tree,
Their joyful choir will ring;—
And the nations of Scotia, Britain, and These,
Give a 'health to George the King!'

RIFFOR.

OH DEAR TO ME!

Oh dear to me the silent hour,
When twilight dies along the sea,
When zephyr seeks its favorite flower,
Oh dear to me, oh dear to me.

Then fancy o'er me throws her veil,
And, as her dreams upon me steal,
I see the proudly swelling sail,
And watch the flight of many a keel.

Oh dear to me the sacred time,
When dews refresh the day's parch'd flow'r,
And evening, in her robe sublime,
Steals softly o'er the ruin'd tower;

Again their heads its turrets rear,
And shadowy hands its flag unfold—
And issuing forth in proud career,
Its mail-clad chiefs my eyes behold.

Oh dear to me the hour so still,
When night comes down on lake and fell;
And winds are whispering on the hill,
And faeries frolic in the dell—

• It also signifies a youth.

And young lips breathe those mummings sweet,
Affection so delights to hear—
And hearts, by morning panted, meet
In silent grove, and none are near.

When birds are sleeping on their boughs,
And waters in the moonlight rest,
And the warm breath of fervent vows
Steals forth as heart to heart is press'd,

Oh dear to me the silent hour,
When twilight dies along the sea—
When zephyr seeks its favourite flow'rs,
Oh dear to me, oh dear to me.

UNCHANGING LOVE.

INSCRIBED TO —.

It may be that when some are parted,
Their love sinks to forgetfulness,
And all the tears that ere while started,
Are chased by joys that gaily press!
But my love, not so false or fickle,
Through all life's changes shall abide;
And sighs that heave—and tears that trickle,
Have proved it long and deeply tried.

'Tis not thy peerless beauty flourishing—
'Tis not thy untaught innocence,
That thus within my breast is nourishing,
A passion gentle and intense;

'Tis not thy unsuspecting blindness
To aught of wrong or fault in me,— 'Tis not thy never varying kindness
To one who oft is harsh to thee;

'Tis not thy patience 'neath life's trials—
Thy joy to soothe another's woe—
Thy calmness when thou meet'st denials—
Thy sympathizing tears that flow;
It is not these for which I love thee,
For which I turn to thee alone,—
Which make me happy when I prove thee,
In weal or woe for any own.

It is that thou hast suffer'd, dearest,
Many a bitter pang for me;—
This makes thee to my heart's core nearest,—
This makes me love and worship thee!

And this, when other ties are breaking,
Still cause this wayward heart of mine,
(Its vain pursuit at once forsaking),
To cling with firmer truth to thee!

J. W. DALRY.

LINES.

HAIL! thou little twinkling star,
That shed'st it around thy silv'ry way,
And shew'st thy brightness from afar,
To guide the pilgrim on his ray.

Sparkling are all joys below,
That vainly urge us on to bliss;
Cheer'd by hope, our way we go,
Thinking to find happiness.

But our efforts crown'd, we find
All life's pleasures fleeting are,
Without contentment in the mind—
Distant, as the twinkling star.

JULIAN.

The Drama.

THE KING'S THEATRE.—The difficulties under which this theatre has long laboured, seemed to threaten a suspension of a season's performances. Several noblemen, however, came forward and removed the difficulties so far as to induce Mr. Ebers to take a short lease of the theatre; and it was opened under his management on Saturday last with every prospect of success. The performances commenced with a new opera by Rossini, entitled La Gazza Ladra (the Magpie Thief), and, as far as the fable is concerned, it does not vary materially from the melo-drame of The Magpie and the Maid, so well known to the public. Rossini does not appear to have considered the character of the piece when he applied his music to it; a great portion of it would have suited any other subject quite as well; and no inconsiderable share was of no value at all. The principal objection to the music, is that it is too boisterous: it depends more on the strength than the harmony of the orchestra; as if the author thought to drown all disapprobation in the roll of the drum and the brazen vigour of the trumpet. There are, however, some pretty duets and trios in the opera, and it went off with much applause, although, strange as it may appear, not one piece was encored.

The ballet of La Prise, or L'Offrande a Terpsichore, followed, and was received with much approbation. It is splendidly got up, and was very effectively supported. From the strength of this department, there is no doubt that the ballets will prove attractive. The house was crowded with fashionables.

DRURY LANE.—Who will now deny that we are a musical people, when nothing but opera is popular. Love in a Village and Ariarxes are the only pieces now performed at this theatre. On Tuesday night, in consequence of the sudden indisposition of Miss Wilson, the part of Rosetta, in the first-mentioned opera, was undertaken at a very short notice, by Miss Povey, and that of Lucinda by Miss Cubitt. Both these ladies acquitted themselves very well under the circumstances, and Miss Povey was encored in the Echo Song.

The second Oratorio, at this theatre, for the season, took place on Wednesday night. The first part consisted of Haydn's Creation, in which the combined talents of Mrs. Salmon, Miss Goodall, with Messrs. Braham, Pyne, Nelson, and Cutler, displayed that richness of harmony and strength of expression which the style of this divine composition requires. The second act was a grand Requiem, composed, expressly for the occasion, by Bochea, in which the distinguished vocalists we have named, with Madame Camporese, Mrs. Bellchambers, and, indeed, the whole vocal strength of the house, were brought forward to give effect to the different parts. It is a singular and very unequal composition; it concluded with a beautiful quartetto, by Madame Camporese, Miss Goodall, Mr. Braham, and Mr. Cutler, with the novel accompaniment of thirteen harps. These formed three orchestras, occupying the whole breadth of the stage, and were played by Mr. Bochea and twelve of his pupils, eight of whom were young ladies. The effort was very striking, and the quartetto was loudly encored. After the second act, Mrs. Salmon and Mr. Braham sang the echo duet with a thrilling sweetness that electrified the audience. Mrs. Salmon displayed all that melody of voice, correct taste, and brilliant execution, for which she is unrivalled, and Braham never sung better. The duet was enthusiastically encored. The performance concluded with Handel's Coronation Anthem, which was received by the audience, standing and unencored. The house was well attended at half-price, but not so much as the merits of the performances deserved. We learn, with regret, that this is the last season that theatorios will be under the direction of Sir George Smart, as it will be difficult to find a successor.

COVENT GARDEN.—'Richard is himself again.' Every admirer of Shakespeare will rejoice to hear, that the managers of this theatre have brought forward The Life and Death of Richard the Third, as written by the bard of Avon, retaining only so much of Ciber's additions as were necessary to connect some of the scenes. Mr. Macready did not appear to us to that advantage which we had anticipated; but, in the principal scene now restored to the stage, that of the council, in which Richard orders Hastings for immediate execution, he was very fine. The arduous vehemence with which he stung the council, when he showed his own wrongs in his withered arm, was a fine combination of art and judgment. Indeed, if Mr. Macready did not strike out many new beauties, he discovered no inconsiderable degree of discrimination and good taste. Mr. Egerton spoke that immortal monument of poetic inspiration, Clarence's dream, in excellent style. We must have mistook this gentleman all the while, for we now find him a marvellous proper man, since he can do so much justice to the delivery of passages of such great poetic beauty. Mr. Abbott and Mr. Yates played Richmond and Buckingham, in a very spirited manner, and Mrs. Vining is intitled to much praise, in the character of Lady Anne. The tragedy was received with that enthusiasm to which the productions of our immortal Shakespeare are intitled, and was announced for repetition amidst thunders of applause.

The Oratorios commenced at this theatre on Friday week, under the direction of Mr. Bishop. The first part consisted chiefly of selections from Handel and Haydn, with a grand Te Deum, for the first time in this country, composed by Andreas Romberg, expressly for the Emperor of Austria. It was deficient in sublimity, and was not very well performed. Miss Stephens gave a solo from Handel in a rapturous style, and was encored most enthusiastically. The second part was exclusively from the Messiah, and the third part was miscellaneous, ending with 'a new grand Triumphal Ode,' consisting of a chorus and trio. The words are by the Poet Laureat, Mr. Southey, but will not raise his poetical talents. The music is by Mr. Bishop, and does him much credit. Mr. Stephens sang 'If o'er the tyrant Love,' from the opera of Artaxerxes, most delightfully; and Miss Povey, who is engaged here for the oratorios, sung very prettily. Brahm and Mrs. Salmon are also engaged for some of the forthcoming nights, when we hope to meet with more novelty and variety than Mr. Bishop (under whose direction the oratorios are,) presented us with on the first night.

SURREY THEATRE.—The Lord Mayor of London has, for once, at least, shown good taste; we do not mean gastronomic taste, for all citizens possess that long before they reach the civic 'godship.' We allude to his ordering the performance of Mr. Dibdin's far-famed Heart of Midlothian, which has been revived.—We beg pardon, it can never die; but which has been played two or three nights to splendid houses. All the old performers acquitted themselves with their usual excellence. A young lady, we understand, not more than seventeen years of age, played Effie Deans with much feeling; and an old lady danced and sung through Mrs. Glass, admirably. Mr. Murdochson, in the hands of Mrs. Norton, Huttley, as Robertson, and Bengough, as the Duke of Argyle, gave powerful effect to the piece.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—Mr. Mathews at Home.—On Thursday night, Mr. Mathews brought forward his new budget for the season, which consisted of his travels in air, earth, and water. At so late a period of the week, we can only give a slight outline of this entertainment. The public have, for some days, been informed that Mr. Mathews, with the desire of rising in the world, had ascended in the air, and he now first presents himself to the audience descending to the stage in the car of an immense balloon. He assigns his reasons for rising, being the assurance from those who write his pieces, that there was nothing new in the world to afford another season's entertainments. He, of course, meets with various adventures and personages, particularly Major Longbow, a modern Munchausen, who has almost out-done the baron in his miraculous adventures. The major accompanies the aeronaut, and, with the aid of a good telescope, not only sees the performance rehearsing at the Opera House, but by drawing it out another joint, hears Madame Cam-porese sing. At Putney Bridge, they met with a patient angler, who has only had one bite and a nibble in a fortnight, but consoles himself, that the steam-boats and balloons are the cause in 'frightening the fish.' They also meet some cockney sportsmen, who had shot a jack ass for a jack daw, and mistaken a cock-chaffer for a cock-pheasant. Two songs, on 'Air-balloon-ing' and the 'First of September,' finish the first part. The second commences with the descent of the aeronauts on Margate Pier; a humorous description of a dejeuner à la fourchette, &c. One of the best drawn characters here introduced, is that of 'Paul Pinnacle, the quality tag,' who cannot speak to any one under the rank of a baronet, in Picadilly, but who will venture to recognize a more humble acquaintance in the Strand. We have also an amusing donkey driver—the disasters of the non-aspiration of an H.—Daniel O'Rourke's dream, in which he visits the moon, and descends on the back of one of his own country wild geese, but finds, when awake, that he had thrown himself out of his own window into a carpet, which some men were beating, and who tossed him in it. There is also a Mrs. Guffin, who always carries an album about with her, in which she has the autographs of cheesemongers and tailors, and the mark of Sam Swelter, the engineer of the steam-packet. This lady has recorded the two first lines of the song of Tom Tough, as Lord Byron's, and given, 'I'm a briak young lad, just come home from sea,' to Samuel Rogers. Her collection of epitaphs are equally common place, although, she says, she deems them much finer than 'Shakespeare's elegy in a country church-yard.' The last and the best part of Mr. M.'s adventures are the pleasures of a sea voyage in the Polly Packet, with the following passengers:—

Mr. Theophilus Tulip, a novice on the ocean.

Mrs. Tulip, his maternal mama.

Monsieur Jeu-Singe, French artist in dancing dogs and monkeys.

Isaac Tabinet, a Jew merchant.

Major Longbow, } aeronauts on their
Mr. Mathews, } return.

Daniel O'Rourke, steward of the Polly.
Invisible Captain.

Poultry in the hold.

These varied characters are represented with a fidelity and a rapidity in the change of voice, dress, and appearance, which is really astonishing; and drew forth the most unbounded plaudits from a very crowded house. The whole of the entertainments were completely successful, and strikingly displayed Mr. Mathews's extraordinary talents.

Literature and Science.

The new comet is now visible to the naked eye in the west, till eight o'clock in the evening. It is a little to the westward of Algenib, and nearly the height of Saturn, at a distance to the right of him.

American Imposture.—In the National Intelligencer of the 18th January last, there is the following advertisement:—

'Walter Scott's new Poem, Search after Happiness, just received, and for sale, at the Subscribers Book Store, Bridge Street, Georgetown. 'G. Davis.'

How cruel in Walter to let the Yankees thus have the start of us!

Bibliomania on the decline.—The same edition of an early printed book, Caxton's Faytes of Armes, sold in the Roxburg collection for 350*l.*; at the sale of Earl Spencer's duplicates, for 60*l.*; and, on Saturday last at a sale, by Mr. Sotherby, it only produced seven guineas!

The author of 'Waverley' is said to have another novel in the press to be called the Bucanier.

Remarkable Stone.—The Mnemosyne, a Finland newspaper, mentions a stone in the northern part of Finland, which serves the inhabitants instead of a barometer. This stone, which is called Ilmakiuri, turns black or blackish grey when it is going to rain; but, on the approach of fine weather, it is covered with white spots. Probably it is a fossil mixed with clay, and consisting of rock-salt, ammoniac, or saltpetre, which, according to the greater or less degree of dampness of the atmosphere, attracts it or otherwise. In the latter case the salt appears, which forms the white spots.

New South Shetland.—In consequence of Captain Smith's discovery of this continent, the Admiralty have sent out the Conway, Capt. Basil Hall, to explore the coasts, and procure whatever information may be attainable.

A correspondent in The Farmer's Journal, communicates the following useful information respecting the planting of potatoes:—"I last year," says he, "planted a row of sets, cut out into single eyes, from large potatoes chosen out of a heap; the row was twenty-five yards in length; and next to it I planted another row, of equal length, from the smallest potatoes, picked from the same heap; some of these latter were set whole, and some cut in half. When I took them up, the former row produced four bushels and a half of fine large potatoes, with scarcely any small ones. The other row gave so few in measure that they all went into a half-bushel scuttle, and were miserably small."

The silly antipathy of the Emperor of Austria to revolutionary doctrines, is too well known. His Majesty lately edified the Professors of the Lyceum of Labach, with the following significant lecture:—"Gentlemen,—The students of Carniola have ever deserved my praises; study to preserve to them this high distinction; faithfully adhere to your ancient institutions: these institutions served for our ancestors, and why should they not be good enough for us? In other places people have become enamoured of new doctrines, of which I cannot, or will ever, approve. Preserve yourselves from the contagion of these fancies, attach yourselves to that which is certain and practical (positif). I want no philosophers (savans); my ambition is to reign over loyal and virtuous citizens, and those you can educate for me. He who serves me must obey my orders; and he who feels that he cannot condescend to do so, had as well remove himself, or I will remove him."

Omnia nos itidem depascimur aurea dicta.*

LUCRATIUS

The Cypress Tree.—The unperishable chests which contained the Egyptian mummies, were of cypress. The gates of St. Peter's Church, at Rome, which lasted from the time of Constantine to that of Pope Eugene the Fourth, that is to say, eleven hundred years, were of cypress, and had in that time suffered no decay. According to Thucydides, the Athenians buried the bodies of their heroes in coffins of cypress as being not subject to decay. A similar durability has also been ascribed to cedar.

Snowdon.—The height of Snowdon, as measured by Mr. Wollaston's barometer, from Caernarvon Bay, is 3546.25 feet. The same mountain, taken trigonometrically, by General Roy, was found to be 3553.4; and barometrically, by the same officer, 3548.9 feet in height.

Lord Nelson.—By the ship which conveyed his lordship's despatches to England, after the battle of Copenhagen, he sent a note to some respectable wine merchants, to whom he was indebted for some wine, in which he sportively said, that 'he trusted they would pardon his not having sooner sent a cheque for his bill, on account of his having been lately much engaged.'

Frogs.—A type of the spirits of demons, which, by their croaking alarms, excite the supreme powers of the Roman empire to adopt iniquitous measures as just and necessary, to gather them to the last great battle.—Granville Sharpe.

Epigram.

Curio, 'tis said, a comedy has writ,
Replete throughout with novelty and wit,
If it has wit,—to both will I agree;
For wit from Curio must be novelty.

MEMOIR of Mrs. DYOTT, written by herself, with a striking likeness of the Author; accounting for her separation from General Dyott, with various letters of the General and other personages, with this motto:

'Patience is the surest remedy against calamities:
Time, soon or late, discovers the truth.'

This work is replete with portraits of attorneys; among others, James Hartley, of New Bridge Street, and Thomas McKiernan, of the house of Slade, Bedford, and Slade, Doctors' Commons. A word is said of Randie Jackson, Esq., Barrister at Law; with remarks on the testimony of Robert Thompson, Esq., of South Audley Street; Colonel Dale and Disbrow, &c.

Review of New Books.

A Narrative of Travels in Northern Africa, in the Years 1818, 19, and 20; accompanied by Geographical Notices of Soudan, and of the Course of the Niger, &c. By Captain G. F. Lyon, R. N. companion of the late Mr. Ritchie. 4to, pp. 383. London, 1821.

ALTHOUGH Africa has been the grave of so many adventurous spirits, yet such is the zest for inquiry, that there is no want of a succession of new travellers, ready at all hazards to pursue the daring enterprise of exploring lands unknown. It would be a melancholy narrative to recapitulate the fate of those who have hitherto endeavoured to traverse the interior of Africa: most of them, however, have left memorable records of the disposition by which they were actuated; and while we shed a tear for their sufferings and their end, we draw a veil over the sad picture and turn to the more successful adventurers, whose records must be read with an increased interest from their comparative rarity.

Captain Lyon was the companion of Mr. Ritchie, when that gentleman was employed by the British government on a mission to the interior of Africa, in 1818. The tour is divided into two parts. The first comprises the original purpose of the mission from Tripoli to Mourzouk, where the unfortunate Mr. Ritchie died, the second embraces Captain Lyon's examination of the remainder of the kingdom of Fezzan, from the death of his companion until the final return of the mission to Tripoli; it being deemed too hazardous to attempt advancing farther into the interior without fresh authority and additional pecuniary supplies from government.

It is too much to be lamented that, in consequence of Mr. Ritchie's frequent and debilitating attacks of illness, and his having relied too much on a singularly retentive memory, he had from time to time delayed committing his remarks to paper, in the delusive anticipation of ease and leisure, which unhappily he was destined never to enjoy; and it was owing to this unfortunate procrastination that much valuable information has been lost. Captain Lyon, however, having kept a regular journal, has been enabled, in some degree, to supply the defect; his object being, as he assures us, 'only to detail facts in the plainest manner, without attempt at embellishment of any kind;' this not only bespeaks indulgence, but gives an additional value to his narrative. Deferring for the present all critical remarks on the literary merits of this work, we shall proceed to notice the principal incidents which it records.

It was on the 10th of October, 1818, that Mr. Ritchie, accompanied by M. Dupont, a Frenchman in his pay, whom he had engaged for the purpose of collecting and preparing objects of natural history, and a shipwright named John Belford, sailed from Malta for Tripoli; at which place he was joined by Captain Lyon on the 25th of November. Mr. Ritchie's intention was to proceed to Mourzouk, the capital of Fezzan, with the Sultan of that country, who was about to take a large body of men for the purpose of waging war on the inhabitants of Waday (the Borgoo of Brown); which is to the southward and eastward of Fezzan. Mohammed el Mukni, the Sultan of Fezzan, had by intrigues and force got the government of that country in 1811, when, having established himself, he waged war on his defenceless neighbours and annually carried off 4000 or 5000 slaves.

In order to prepare for the journey, Mr. Ritchie and Captain Lyon suffered their beards to grow, and had their heads shaved. Their costume was that of the better class of Tripolitans, who have two kinds of dresses; the one long and worn chiefly by elderly men and persons of great consequence, the other short and worn generally. Our travellers fully adopted the dress and appearance of Moslems, using all their endeavours to become acquainted with their manners. Mr. Ritchie assumed the name of Yusuf el Ritchie; Belford was called Ali; Dupont, Mourad; and Captain Lyon was styled Said ben abd Allah. Before we accompany Captain Lyon on his journey, we shall quote a few passages from his work relating to Tripoli, where—

The most extraordinary characters are the Marabouts, a set of people much spoken of in all Moslem countries; but it strikes me that the requisites necessary to constitute one of these saints are not every where the same. In the interior they consist in keeping up the outward show of sanctity, in abstaining from proscribed liquors, in avoiding improper or profane expressions, in being faithful to the limited number of wives, (namely, four,) and in not intruding with the wives of other men; whilst in Tripoli, such forbearance is by no means considered necessary. The Marabouts there are of two classes: ideots, who are allowed to say and do whatever they please; and men possessed of all their senses, who, by juggling and performing many bold and disgusting tricks, establish to themselves the exclusive right of being the greatest rogues and nuisances to be met with. There are mosques in which these people assemble every Friday afternoon, and where they eat snakes, scorpions, &c. affecting to be inspired, and committing the greatest extravagancies.

On the 9th of January, 1819, their annual festival began, and continued for three days, with all its barbarous ceremonies. On, or rather before this day, the great Marabout is supposed to inspire those who are to appear in the processions, and who, according to their abilities, are more or less mad and furious. The natural fools are always ready for the exhibition; and it is amusing to observe their looks of astonishment at being on that day, more than any other, brought into notice. During the time the Marabouts, (who are guarded and attended by a great number of people,) are allowed to parade the street, no Christians or Jews can with any safety make their appearance, as they would, if once in the power of these wretches, be instantly torn to pieces; indeed, wherever they show themselves on their terraces or from windows, they are sure of a plentiful shower of stones from the boys who are in attendance.

As I was in the dress of the country, and very anxious to witness the whole of the ceremonies, I ventured to go out with our dragoman, and to make my way to the mosque from which the procession was to set out. I certainly felt that my situation was a very dangerous one; but being resolved on the attempt, and telling the man to follow me closely, I dashed in with the crowd, and succeeded in getting near the saints who, with dishevelled hair, were rapidly turning round, and working themselves into a most alarming state of frenzy. A band of barbarous music was playing to them, while several men were constantly employed in sprinkling them with rose-water. Had I been discovered, my life would have been in very great jeopardy; but, fortunately, I was able to keep my countenance, and to pass unnoticed; and, when the performers were sufficiently inspired, sallied out with them, and followed through the streets. One had a large nail run through his face, from one cheek to the other; and all had bitten their tongues in so violent a manner, as to cause blood and saliva to flow copiously. They were half naked, at intervals uttering short groans and howls; and as they proceeded, (sometimes three or four a-breast, leaning on each other,) they threw their heads backwards and forwards with a quick motion, which caused the blood to rise in their faces, and their eyes to project from the sockets to a frightful degree. Their long black hair, which grew from the crown of the head, (the other parts being closely shaven,) was continually waving to and fro, owing to the motion of the head. One or two who were the most furious, and who continually attempted to run at the crowd, were held by a man on each side, by means of a rope, or a handkerchief tied round the middle. As we passed through one of the streets, a party of Maltese and other Christians were discovered on a terrace, and were instantly assailed by showers of stones. I observed, that whenever the Marabouts passed the house of a Christian, they affected to be unmovable, and endeavoured to get near it, pretending they made the discovery by smelling out unbelievers. After following for an hour or two, during which I witnessed the most horrible and revolting scenes, I returned home, when, to my great amusement, I learnt that a rumour prevailed of my having been attacked and very ill treated; and that I had, in defending myself, stabbed a Marabout, and run away, no one knew whither. I was happy to be enabled in person to contradict these reports, and to prove that I had escaped not only unhurt, but unobserved. There were two parties who traversed the town; but from their being of opposite sects, and at war with each other, it was so arranged that they should take different routes.

That which I did not see was the superior one, and took its departure from under the walls of the castle. It was headed by a man named Mohammed, who had been much at our house, going on errands, and attending our horses. I did not, until afterwards, know he was so celebrated a character. Before the time of the procession, he was confined in a dungeon, in consequence of his becoming very furious. When all was in readiness for the ceremony, the bashaw took his station in the balcony overlooking the arsenal, and this man was set at liberty, when he rushed on an ass, and with one thrust pushed his hand into the animal's side, from which he tore its bowels, and began to devour them. Many eat dogs and other animals; and on that day a little Jew boy was killed in the street, either by the Marabouts or their followers.

As the power of taking up serpents and scorpions is supposed to constitute a Marabout, I determined on acquiring that honourable title. Mr. Ritchie bought some snakes, which we all learnt to handle, and I soon found out an effectual way of taking up the largest scorpions without the slightest chance of being stung.

Drunkenness is more common in Tripoli than in England. There are public wine houses, at the doors of which the Moors sit and drink without any scruple. The better class of people also drink very hard; but their favourite beverage is Rosolia, an Italian cordial. As a singular instance of the enterprising spirit of our northern brethren, it may be mentioned that the admiral of the fleet at Tripoli is a Scotchman by birth, though now turned a Mamluk, and called Mourad Rais. He bears an excellent character. The modes of punishment at Tripoli are totally different from any of those practised by Europeans:—

Some crimes are considered capital by law; but many are rendered so by the whim of the Bashaw, in which case hanging, decapitating, and strangling are used. The Moors are never employed as hangmen; but the first Jew who happens to be at hand has that office conferred upon him, and he is obliged to accompany the culprit to the ramparts over the town gate, attended by the guards and mob, when he puts on the rope well or ill, according to his ability, attaching it to a bolt fixed in the wall for that purpose. The unfortunate victim is then forced through an embrasure, and suspended by the side of the gate way, so as to be seen by all who enter or leave the town. When decapitation is the punishment, the head alone is exposed to public view.

Torture is not unfrequently made use of; but as all punishments of that kind are confined to the dungeons of the castle, none can or dare give any description of the nature of it. Theft (as presented by the Koran) is punished by cutting off a hand, and if to a very great extent, a foot also; but repeated offences of this kind extend sometimes to an amputation of the other hand or foot, and I once saw a man, who,

for a capital crime, had been mutilated in this manner. The operation is performed with a razor. The limb is first tied tight above the joint with a piece of cord, and the hand or foot is taken out of the socket of the wrist or ankle joint. The stump is then dipped into hot pitch, and the sufferer is permitted to go away with his friends; and it is astonishing how soon he recovers, without any other dressing than the one which I have mentioned. Beating with a stick on the posteriors or soles of the feet is the general punishment for minor offences; although, in some cases, it is so severe as to occasion death. Four or five hundred lashes are frequently given; but fifty is about the general allowance. Some culprits, who, by bribery or other means, are able to influence the persons employed to see the sentence executed, contrive to stuff their trousers so as to escape without much suffering. This punishment is inflicted equally on all ranks, at the pleasure of the Bashaw; and, should even his own sons, his minister, or the sheikh of the town displease him, they would be obliged to submit to it, as well as the lowest of his subjects; nor would they consider themselves at all degraded, or their dignity in any degree lessened by it.

The Tripoline marriages (which no man is allowed to see) are conducted with great splendour, and the night is the time chosen for the bride to be conveyed to the house of her husband, when she is attended by a large troop of women, who carry torches, and utter loud and repeated cries of joy. The burials have nothing remarkable. It is the custom at all the funerals to liberate one or more slaves, who may at the time belong to the family of the deceased, and food is distributed among the poor, who, on these occasions, never fail to attend in great numbers.

Mr. Ritchie, finding that Mükni still delayed his departure, determined on visiting Benioloed and the Gharian mountains. For this purpose, he set out on the 7th of February, 1819, accompanied by Captain Lyon, and a Chowse with two camels; M. Dupont having resigned his office, and Belford being left in charge of the house at Tripoli. The Arabs in the Gharian mountains live under ground, so that a person unacquainted with the circumstance might cross them without once suspecting that they were inhabited. All the dwelling places are formed in the same manner, and therefore the following description of the Sheikh's will serve for the rest:—

The uppersoil is sandy earth, of about four feet in depth, under this sand, and in some places limestone, a large hole is dag, to the depth of twenty-five or thirty feet, and its breadth in every direction is about the same, being, as nearly as can be made, a perfect square. The rock is then smoothed, so as to form perpendicular sides to this space, in which doors are cut through, and arched chambers excavated, so as to receive their light from the doors. These rooms are sometimes three or four of a side, in others, a whole side composes one; the arrangements depending on the number of the inhabitants. In the open court is generally a well, water being found at about ten or twelve feet below the base of the square. The entrance to the house is at about thirty-six yards from the pit, and opens above ground. It is arched over head; is generally cut in a winding direction, and is perfectly dark. Some of these passages are sufficiently large to admit a loaded camel. The entrance has a strong wall built over it, something resembling an ice-house. This is covered over head, and has a very strong heavy door, which is shut at night, or in cases of danger. At about ten yards from the bottom is another door, equally strong, so that it is almost impossible to enter these houses, should the inhabitants determine to resist.

Captain Lyon, while in these mountains, went in search of animals called gundy, and after lying down flat in the rain for three or four hours, was fortunate enough to shoot three, which he prepared, in order that they might be sent to the British Museum; they being the first of the species known in Europe:—

‘These animals resemble very much a guinea-pig in form, but are of a light brown mouse colour. The fur is longer than that of a rat, and is very silky; the eyes are black, large, and prominent; the orifices of the ears, (which are quite flat against the sides of the head,) are also black, and free from hair; the tail, or rather a little stump resembling one, is just perceptible to the touch, and from it grows a bunch or tuft of long black hair. The body is very round and fat, particularly broad at the shoulders. These animals burrow among the rocks. They are eaten with great relish by the Arabs, and no doubt are very good, as the flesh is exceedingly white and fat, and resembles that of a rabbit.’

The Arabs of the tribe of Orilly are a fine handsome race of people, and the young girls are really beautiful. These poor Arabs are dreadfully oppressed by the Bashaw, who has reduced them all to a most miserable state of poverty. Those who remain in the country are in rags; the others, who let their camels out to hire, and accompany traders to the interior, are somewhat better off. They were once a brave daring set of men, who defied the government of Tripoli; and, during the youth of the present Bashaw, fully protected him from his father's troops.

Our author gives a long and interesting account of the Arabs, and their manners and customs. He describes them as generally tall, straight, and well-formed, rather thin and muscular. Their countenances are expressive and handsome, and their noses aquiline; their complexion naturally white, but become dark from continual exposure to the sun. They are very active, capable of undergoing great fatigue and abstinence from food, lively in their manners, daring, and possessed of much cunning; though generous, they are great beggars; revengeful and unforgiving. The general costume of the man is a large loose shirt and trowsers of cotton, sandals, or tight half boots of red leather, and a red cap. A wrapper of woollen cloth like flannel, twenty or five and twenty feet long, is wound round the body in folds. The dress of the females differs but little from that of the men in the materials, but they put it on in a different manner. Young women wear their hair in tresses, to which they attach beads, pieces of coral, silver, &c. The old women frizzle their hair over the forehead, so as to make it project to some distance; and they dye it of a dull red colour:—

‘All the females have a practice of tattooing their chins, the tips of their noses, and between the eyebrows. Their necks and arms are also frequently marked. The favourite figure is that of a hand, which is intended to avert the “evil eye.” They wear red lacing boots, in the same manner as the men. When young (that is to say, fifteen or sixteen), they have fine figures, and are exceedingly handsome; but they soon lose their good looks and pleasing form, and become as ugly as they were before beautiful. Their eyes are black and large; their noses straight and well proportioned; they have small lips, and their teeth are exquisitely white. Nothing, in fact, can exceed in prettiness an Arab girl; but the old women are, without exception, the most hideous and disgusting creatures I ever beheld. Both sexes blacken their eye lids with kohl, or lead ore powdered, which adds much to the brilliancy of the eye, and makes it appear larger than it is. They all wear an immense quantity of agebs, or charms, against disorders and misfortunes.’

Marriages are conducted in most instances without either party having seen the other, the agreement being entirely on the part of the parents. Though four wives are allowed to a Mohammedan, the Arabs very rarely have more than two and sometimes only one. The ceremony of conducting a bride to her husband is singular; a frame is fixed on the back of a camel which has very gay trappings for the occasion. The bride is placed in the frame and while thus sitting is housed over with carpets, shawls, and ostrich feathers. We shall conclude for the present with some further interesting extracts relating to the Arabs:—

‘The Bedouins sow their scanty stock of corn, after turning up the earth with a rude plough, or more generally with a hoe. These cultivated spots are respected by other wanderers, and the corn is rarely stolen; should the Bashaw, indeed, be at war with the Arabs, he never fails to destroy their crops. When a sufficient time has elapsed to allow of the grain being in a state of maturity, those to whom it belongs come and gather in their harvest (sometimes before it is perfectly ripe), lest the Bashaw should be informed of the circumstance, and deprive them of a larger portion than they can afford; emissaries, indeed, are never wanting, who make it their business to ascertain the exact time when the corn is to be cut, and then pounce on the poor Arabs for the Bashaw's share of it. To avoid such taxes, therefore, they sometimes gather it so prematurely, that it will not serve as seed for the ensuing year. When the date season commences, many families come and pitch their tents in the Mesheh of Tripoli, in order to purchase dates for their future subsistence; these they deprive of the stones, and when kneaded together, keep them in skins, so as to preserve them from insects or wet: these form their chief support, assisted by the milk of their sheep and camels. That of the camel, as I have before noticed, is thin, of a bluish colour (resembling cow's milk mixed with water), and rather salt to the taste; it throws up no cream, but soon conglutates like new curds. The ewe milk is excellent, but is never drank fresh, the Arabs preferring it sour, or, more properly, as butter-milk. The flocks are milked morning and night into large bowls, and when a sufficient quantity is thus collected, it is poured into skins, without much attention being paid to its cleanliness, when, by shaking and rolling it about, butter is procured, and generally attaches itself to the side of the skin; the milk being then strained from it into other vessels, is allowed to grow sour, and a quantity of butter being produced, it is boiled with a little salt until it becomes like oil, and is then poured into goat-skins, and is fit for use or market.’

‘Cheese is procured by turning the milk with a certain herb (the name of which I have forgotten), and the curds, being salted, are spread out to dry in the sun, when they resemble little crumbs, and are very pleasant to the taste. I did not see any other kind of cheese than the one I have mentioned, and this is rather scarce, and used as a luxury in many of their little messes. Sometimes it is toasted, and has a very agreeable flavour. It is called Jibn.

A great article of commerce is the fat, which the shepherds procure from the sheep they kill. They cut it from every part of the body, salt it, and lay it by until a large quantity is collected, when, whether putrid or not, they boil it, until it bear some resemblance to the grease used by tallow chandlers; it is then poured into skins, and is fit for use. In the interior it sells at about a shilling a pound; but at Tripoli it is much cheaper. It is put into almost every article of food by the Arabs, and though not very savoury, we soon became accustomed to its taste. It is called Shahm.

Bazeen (which, in Fezzan, is called Aweeda) is the most common food, as being the easiest prepared. It is made of the flour of any grain (bishna and barley are mostly used near Tripoli) in the following manner. A large pot, of copper or iron, is placed on the fire, with a little water in it, which is suffered to boil. Flour is then thrown in, until it acquires the consistency of dough, when it is stirred well about with a large stick (water being occasionally added, if necessary,) until it is quite thick, and begins to assume the appearance of a pudding, when it is taken out, and placed in a bowl. After being beat into a circular shape, and having a hole made in the centre, gravy, oil, butter, or grease, is poured on it, and it is then ready for eating, which is done by pinching pieces out with the right hand, and kneading them with the grease until they assume the appearance of thick paste. Should there be no gravy or grease to be procured, a little flour mixed with hot water is used instead of it. It requires much strength of arm to make bazeen properly, as the stick is wielded by both hands, and the put is confined on the fire by having a forked piece of wood placed against it, on which the woman kneels while preparing the mess.

Bread is made as in Europe. It is leavened with flour, or a preparation of dates, moulded into little cakes, shaped like buns. The ovens are generally formed in the ground; a hole is made about two feet in depth, and in the shape of a large jar, contracted at the mouth; it is then encrusted inside with clay. Wood is thrown in and burnt, until a thick layer of glowing ashes is collected at the bottom, and the oven is thoroughly heated; the loaves are then put in by a woman, who bares and wets her arm, and sticks them against the side with great dexterity; when done enough, if not speedily taken off, they fall into the embers. Sometimes meat is dressed in these ovens; a kind of crumpet, also, called fetan, made in the same way as mogatta, but without leaven, is slightly baked in them: one of these crumpets is then placed in a bowl, and soup and vegetables are poured over it; another is then put in, and soup added as before, and so on in successive layers, until the bowl is full. All these messes are eaten with the fingers.

There is great variety in the manner of dressing meat, which is stewed, boiled, or baked; but for journeys, the Arabs have a very good way of preserving it, by cutting it into thin slices, drying it in the sun, and afterwards stewing it in fat. I have often observed them eating small grasses, which they found as they pursued their journey; and to my inquiries how they knew them to be innocuous, the general reply was,—that whatever an animal which chewed its cud could eat with safety, must be food for man. There is a species of dandelion, very bitter, and exuding a white juice, which is very much liked by the sheep as well as their masters. The taste, at first, is very unpleasant; but I soon became accustomed to it. The colocynth apple grows in great quantities in some parts of the desert, and is almost the only medicine used by the Arabs. Burning is always had recourse to, and many of them are in consequence covered with scars; it is also occasionally used to show the force of love; and both sexes practise it when they wish to give proof of very strong affection.

The Arabs have but few amusements beyond dancing and a game called helga, which resembles draughts, and is played with camels dung or date stones, in holes made in the sand. The noise uttered by these people at their festivals, or on any joyful occasion, is most extraordinary; and being very shrill, it may be heard at a great distance, particularly if several persons join in chorus: it is a piercing cry from the throat (the mouth being quite open), to which a tremulous sound is given by a rapid motion of the tongue from side to side; it is very enlivening, and when it becomes familiar to the ear, far from disagreeable.

The manner of salutation used among the Arabs is particularly striking, and certainly not ungraceful. Friends, on meeting, seize each the right hand of the other, then loosen and apply the tips of their fingers to their mouths, afterwards laying the open hand on the heart, they press it, and gently incline the head at the same time. Very intimate acquaintances mutually lift their joined right hands in such a manner that each kisses the back of the other's hand, repeating, with the greatest rapidity, "How are you? well, how are you? Thank God, how are you? God bless you, how are you?" which compliments, in a well bred man, never last less than ten minutes; and, whatever may be the conversation afterwards, it is a mark of great good breeding occasionally to interrupt it, bowing solemnly, and asking, "How are you?" though an answer to the question is by no means considered necessary, as he who asks it is perhaps looking another way, and thinking of something else. I must not omit to mention a particular instance of good breeding which I met with amongst these people: a man begged me one day to reach him a piece of straw which lay near me, that he might take out of a cup of water a bird which had fallen into it. I perceived, however, that it was only a fly; and was afterwards informed, that they consider it disrespectful to make use of the word fly in the presence of a superior.

The questions asked, and observations made by some of the inland Arabs respecting our country, were very curious; amongst other extraordinary fancies, they have an idea, originating in the name given to the Atlantic, Bahr el blem, sea of darkness, that we have no sun or moon in the countries which are in the sea, and, in consequence, they imagine that our ships sail about with great lanterns attached to them. They also believe that Christians use the milk of pigs as a beverage, and, in fact, that it forms their chief subsistence. That we have horses, cows, and sheep, is not at all credited by them; and that our country should be destitute of dates excites their greatest commiseration. They cannot at all conceive how we avoid falling off our islands and rolling into the sea, or how, being surrounded by water, we have sufficient room for animals to graze. There are some, on the other hand, who think highly of our wealth and dignity, until they are told that our country is an island, when their admiration decreases considerably. Buonsaparte, or, as the Arabs call him, Bono barto, is in great estimation amongst them, not on account of his military achievements; but because they have heard that he has 200,000 dollars an hour, and that he sits on a golden throne.

After returning to Tripoli, Mr. Ritchie and Captain Lyau made preparation for the journey to Morzouk, where we shall accompany them in our next.

A Vision of Judgment. By Robert Southey. Esq. LL.D. Poet Laureate, &c. 4to. pp. 79. London, 1821.

How are the mighty fallen! how is the fine gold changed? must be the exclamation of every admirer of Mr. Southey, when he reads this abortion of his genius, the 'Vision of Judgment.' Is this the man who sung the 'Maid of Orleans,' 'Wat Tyler,' and 'of Thelusa the wild and wondrous song.' To what extent the debasement of talents, and the prostitution of principle may be carried, Mr. Southey furnishes a memorable instance. We know not which to condemn most, the posing absurdity of this poem, its wanton political profligacy, or its blasphemy. Let us no longer be told of the licen-

lousness of the press, of the irreligious tenets of Carile, or of the parodies of Hone; the poet laureate—yes, the poet laureate himself, outstrips them all, in a poem which he has the hardihood to inscribe, in a false dedication, to his sovereign, not without the hope, we suppose, that this production, wretched as it is, will be afterwards considered as one of 'the achievements of the Georgian age.'

Mr. Southey, it appears, has long been of opinion, that an English metre might be constructed in imitation of the ancient hexameter, which would be perfectly consistent with the character of our language, and capable of great richness, variety, and strength; and although Sir Philip Sidney failed in the 'attempt to naturalize this fine measure,' yet Mr. Southey, by making the experiment, has 'fulfilled one of the hopes and intentions of his early life,' and has the vanity to think that it 'may be considered hereafter as of some importance in English poetry.' Of what importance, we think we can enable our readers to decide, without entering at all into the inquiry, how far the English metre is suited to hexameters.

The subject of this poem is no less a personage than our late venerable sovereign, whom Mr. Southey attends beyond the grave, and wishes to inform us of his reception in the world of spirits. The poem commences with the author's trance, when he was standing at some window, whence he had a panoramic view of 'mountain and lake and vale,' and of—

'The hills that, calm and majestic,
Lifted their heads in the silent sky, from far Glacinar, Blacarag, and Maidenmawr, to Grizedal and westernmost Withop.'

As he stood contemplating these hills, with their harmonious names, the bell 'sent for its note again toll, toll,' which we are told is 'a deep dull sound, that is heavy and monotonous at all times, for it tells of mortality always.' This bell tolled for an common death,—

'For this was the day when the herald
Breaking his wand should proclaim, that George our King was departed.
Thus art released! cried, thy soul is deliver'd from bondage!'

This voice was answered by 'a startling voice from the twilight,' which gave our entranced poet 'a stroke as of lightning,' and made all around him 'blackness utterly blank and void,' as if he 'were alone in the chaos; but, recognizing him for a poet, and the poet laureate we presume,—

'Then came the Voice, but then no longer speaking;

Like the voice of a friend it came: O son of the muses!

Be of good heart, it said, and think not that thou art abandoned;

For to thy mortal sight shall the grave unshad-ow its secrets,—

Such as of yore the Florentine saw, Hell's peril ous chambers—

He who trod in his strength; and the arduous mountain of Penance,

And the reign of Paradise, sphere within are interlaced

Child of earth, look up! and behold what passes before thee.

The poet is conducted to the vault, where we should almost suspect he had for a second time inhaled some of Sir Humphry Davy's nitrous acid gas*, if we may judge from the effect of the circumambient air upon him. He inquires,—

'And whence this air that infuses Strength while I breathe it in, and a sense of life, and a will—

Filling the heart with peace, and giving a joy that contents it!

Not of the earth that light; and these paradisi-sacal breathings,

Not of the earth are they!"

The description of the strain of heavenly music which he heard is pretty, but he has left us to question his orthodoxy, and to doubt whether he is heathen or Roman Catholic, from his allusion to 'the beatified virgin,' and to the strains of Amphion and Orpheus. The music is described to have been—

'Such as the hermit hears when angels visit his slumbers.

Faintly it first began, scarce heard; and gentle its rising,—

Low as the softest breath that passes in summer
at evening,

O'er the Eolian strings, felt there when nothing is moving,

Save the thud-down, lighter than air, and the leaf of the aspen—

Then, as it swell'd and rose, the thrilling melody deepened."

We now come to the third part of this poem, for so, we presume, we must still call it, which is the awakening of the King; and here the good old monarch is introduced as entering into a colloquy with Spencer Percival, and talking about the news—'what course by the prince had been followed,' and how peace 'was obtained at last with safety and honour. We will not inquire how Mr. Percival learns so accurately all the events which occurred after his death, and which he relates with so much minuteness to his sovereign, who died eight years after him; all these things are, no doubt, easily reconciled to Mr. Southey's fancy, when, in a

'When Mr. Southey inhaled some of this gas, a few years ago, he declared that he supposed 'the atmosphere of the highest of all possible heavens to be composed of this gas.' See Literary Chronicle, No 57.

'fine frenzy rolling,' be jumbles together 'the ghosts obscene of Robespierre, Danton, Hebert, Faux, and Despard.'

'The Gate of Heaven' is the fourth part. Here an angel proclaims that 'King George of England cometh to judgment,' and calls on hell to bring forth his accusers; when 'hell, in her nethermost caverns, heard and obey'd in dismay.' This brings us to the fifth chapter, 'The Accusers,' and as our readers would find some difficulty in guessing who would stand forth to impeach the good old King, we must inform them who Mr. Southey, we beg pardon, who the Devil has selected; for the choice is left to him. Why, no other than Wilkes, whom the poet recognized by 'the cast of his eye oblique,' and who comes amidst 'the hubbub of senescent sounds;' and Junius, 'his comrade in guilt and in suffering,' who, leaving behind him 'the pest of an evil example, went to the world beyond, where no offences are hidden.' Wilkes and Junius, however, turn out to be very bad witnesses; they are dumb, and more like the accused than the accusers. The 'multifaceted demon, in anger,' failing in his evidence by the non mi ricordos of Wilkes and Junius, called them catiffs, 'swung them aloft, and in vengeance hurled them all abroad, far into the sulphurous darkness;' while the demon, 'caught up by a vehement whirlwind, he, too, was hurried away.' Poor Wilkes is accused of having caused the American revolution, which caused the French revolution; and, of course, all the ills past, present, and to come, arising from that event, are chargeable on the catiff with 'eye oblique.' The poet not being able to describe the personal appearance of Junius, rivets 'a visor of iron round his head,' which 'abolished his features for ever.'

When the accusers have been dismissed, the absolvers are introduced, and this brings the poet to 'the middle of his song,' alias the sixth division of his poem. Among the principal absolvers is Washington, who approaches the King, 'not unprepared for the meeting were I,' and they mutually acquit each other of all blame in the American war, and express a wish that all nations should 'cognate knowledge and freedom,' and 'live in brotherhood wisely conjoined.'

The Beatification, which is the seventh chapter of the Vision, we pass over, as we wish every reader of the poem to do; for, if it is not blasphemy, it is so near an approach to it, that the distinction is by no means apparent. The eighth division is entitled The Sovereigns; here Charles I. and William III., Queen Elizabeth and the Black Prince, all hob-nob together; while Richard, whose—

'Leonine heart was with virtues humaner ennobled, (Otherwise, else, be sure, his doom had now been appointed,'

is holding a tete-a-tete with Alfred and the other Saxon kings; and the poet perceives—

'The joy which fill'd their beatified spirits,
While the Georgian age they thought and the glory of England.'

Having dismissed the sovereigns,—and, by the by, the poet has only placed half-a-dozen of them, since the conquest, in this abode of eternal happiness,—we come to the Elder Worthies, who form the ninth part. First comes Bede, next Bacon 'the marvellous friar,' Wicliffe, Chaucer; then,—

'Bearing the palm of martyrdom, Cranmer was there in meekness;—
Ho! name, to be ever rever'd! And Cecil, whose wisdom

'Stablish'd church and state—Eliza's pillar of counsel'

And Shakespeare, who, in our hearts, for himself hath erected an empire
Not to be shaken by time—nor e'er by another divided.'

Spenser, Mr. Southey's 'master dear,'—Milton, 'no longer here to kings and to hierarchs hostile,'—Taylor [Jeremy], Marlborough, Newton, and Berkeley, fill up the list of the elder worthies, and lead us to the tenth division, which includes The Worthies of the Georgian Age, 'who came forth to welcome their sovereign. Many were they and glorious all.' Mr. Mathews, in his present novelty, has a song entitled, 'High and Humble, what a Jumble.' Mr. Mathews's humble jumble is nothing to that of the poet laureate, who classes his subjects admirably. Here we have, in regular order, Wolfe and Captain Cook, Handel and Sir Joshua Reynolds, Hogarth and Wesley, (the founder of Methodism,) Mansfield and Burke, Warren Hastings and the poet Cowper; and Nelson, too, was in this 'kingdom of peace,' although—

'His calling,
While upon earth he dwelt, was to war and the work of destruction.'

The poet's heaven not being yet peopled, he brings in his Young spirits, who comprise the eleventh division of his vision. These young spirits consist of—

'The gallant youths of high heroic aspiring,
Who, so fast had allow'd, with the martial renown of their country
Would have wedded their names.'

They are the—

'Followers of Nelson's path, and the glorious career of the Wellesley.

Many are they, whose bones beneath the billows have whiten'd,

Or, in a foreign earth they have moulder'd, hastily cover'd

In some wide and general grave'

'Here also were spirits
To have guided, like Cecil of old, the councils of England;

Or have silence'd and charm'd a tumultuous senate, like Canning,

When to the height of his theme, the consummate orator rising,

Makes our Cataline pale, and rejoices the friends of their country.

Others came in that goodly band, whom benniger fortune

Led into pleasant ways on earth: the children of science

Some, whose unerring pursuit would, but for death, have extended

O'er the unknown and material, man's intellectual empire,

Such their intuitive power; like Davy, disarming destruction

When it moves on the vapour; or him, who discovering the secret

Of the dark and ebullient abyss, with the fire of Vesuvius

Amid the chemist's hand: well then might Eleusinian Ceres

Yield to him, from whom the seas and the mountains conceal'd not

Nature's mystery, hid in their depths.

'Here lost in their promise
And prime, were the children of art, who should have deliver'd

Works and undying names to grateful posterity's keeping,

Such as Haydon will leave on earth; and he who, returning

Rich in praise to his native shores, hath left a remembrance

Long to be honour'd and loved on the banks of Thames and of Tiber:

So may America, prizing in time the worth she possesses,

Give to that hand free scope, and boast hereafter of Allston.'

We wish our poet had told us the names of these lost Cannings, Davys, and Haydens; but, after the compliment he pays to these living geniuses, we shall think them the most ungrateful of men if they forget the bard. Mr. Canning must procure Mr. Southey a better sinecure than that of Poet Laureate; Sir Humphrey Davy must make him a F. R. S. which, perhaps, he will deem a greater honour than that of being 'Member of the Royal Spanish Academy,' or of the Royal Institute of the Netherlands.' Mr. Haydon must paint an historical picture from this poem, of, at least, the same dimensions, that is fifteen feet long. Should these gentlemen, however, be so ungrateful as to neglect the poet, they will have no place in his heaven, but—

'Otherwise else be sure their doom will then be appointed.'

We now come to the twelfth, and, thank God, the last part of this vision; and never did unwilling school boy reach the end of a severe task with greater pleasure than we approach the concluding part of this wretched mass of absurdity, y'clept a vision of judgment. It is but justice, however, to say, that this is by far the best, we feel almost said the only unexceptionable part, of the whole poem: and, therefore, wishing to deal fairly with the author, we quote it. It is intitled 'The Meeting.'—

'Lift up your heads, ye Gates; and ye everlasting Portals,

Be ye lift up! Behold the splendid train of the worthies

Halt; and with quicker pace a happy company issues

Forth from the gate of bliss; the parents, the children, and consort,

Come to welcome in heaven the son, the father, and husband!

Hour of perfect joy that o'erpays all earthly affliction;

Yes, and the thought whereof supporteth the soul in anguish!

There came England's blossom of hope;—the beautiful princess;

She in whose wedded bliss all hearts rejoiced, and whose death bell,

Heard from tower to tower thro' the islands, carried a sorrow

Felt by all like a private grief, which, sleeping, smother'd

Will not be shaken away; but possesses the soul that disturbs it.

There was our late lost queen, the nation's example of virtue;

In whose presence vice was not seen, nor the face of dishonour;

Pure in heart, and spotless in life, and secret is beauty,

Queen and mother, and wife unreprieved.—The gentle Amelia

Stretch'd her arms to her father there, in tenderness shedding

Tears, such as angels weep. The hand was toward him extended

Whose last pressure he could not bear, when merciful Nature,

As o'er her dying bed he bent in severest anguish,

Laid on his senses a weight, and suspended the sorrowing eve.

He hath recover'd her now: all that was lost is restored him;

Hour of perfect bliss that o'erpays all earthly affliction!

They are met where change is not known, nor sorrow nor parting.

Death is subdued, and the grave, which conquers all, hath been conquer'd.

The poet now awakes from his—what shall we call it—trance or madness, and instead of—

'The rapturous sound of halleluiah,
Heard the bell from the tower toll! toll! the silence of evening.'

This concludes the Vision of Judgment, but the poet, having written it in a measure of fifteen feet long, determines it shall be fifteen shillings in price.

and, to make the bargain the better, adds notes, consisting principally of an extract from St. Pierre's Harmonies of Nature, with an English translation; and some specimens of Sir Philip Sidney's Hexameters, to prove that he, Mr. Southey, was not the first to write a foolish poem in such a measure.

Mr. Wordsworth's Peter Bell and Benjamin the Waggoner, were nothing to Mr. Southey's absurdities in his Vision of Judgment; and if neither his pipe of canary as laureat, nor Sir Humphrey Davy's nitrous acid gas will inspire his muse more happily, we beseech him to abandon her entirely, and never again hazard that reputation for poetical talents which he had once so justly acquired.

The Rebellion of Absalom; a Discourse, preached at Kirkcubright, on the 30th of July last, before the Stewartry Gentlemen Yeomanry Cavalry. With a Preface, Explatory of the Extraordinary Circumstances under which the Author was Arrested for Praying for the Queen. By the Rev. William Gillespie, Minister of Kells. 8vo. pp. 37.

THE sermon before us has attracted our notice, less from the political circumstance, extraordinary as it is, which has led to its publication, than from the pleasing impression with which the name of Mr. Gillespie stands associated in our recollection, as the author of a volume of poems, which appeared some years ago, entitled 'CONSOLATION,' &c. We have often wondered that a volume of such merit could by any chance have slumbered in that obscurity which we suspect to have been its fate; but have as often ceased to wonder when we reflected on the length and difficulty of the way which lies between writing a poem deserving of admiration, and ushering it into the presence of the public with that degree of ceremony and bustle and noise, which are all so necessary to ensuring to it a candid examination into its merits. What can a country pastor, who woe the muses amidst the wilds of Galloway, who prints his productions on his own account, and who consigns them like 'a pud o' woo', to be made the most of, to some house in the Row called Paternoster, hope in the way of justice being done to his publication? Let our friends in the Row tell. If we recollect rightly, 'Auster Fair,' a poem now deservedly of great reputation, had been in print upwards of three years before any notice was taken of it, solely because, in these discerning times, it happened to be printed at a village press, on coarse paper, and on the author's own account? It is no part of the plan of the Literary Chronicle to diverge into retrospective criticism; but having alluded to the volume of poems, by the author of the production immediately before us, and to the unmerited neglect they have experienced, we should be guilty of a misprision of injustice were we to omit the opportunity of recommending them to the notice of all lovers of poetry as abounding in many of the features of genuine poetic excellence.

The strange circumstances under which the Discourse before us was sent to the press, may serve the double purpose of accounting for its appearance and exempting it from nicety of criticism. The author appears, at present, as a clergyman placed under military arrest, for no other reason on earth than that he had the honesty, the charity, and, we will add, the loyalty to pray for the Queen! He has printed the Sermon, which preceded this prayer, precisely as he delivered it, in order to shew that, altho' he conceived it to be his laudable duty as a Christian Pastor to offer up his prayers to Heaven for that much persecuted individual, Her Majesty, he entertains none of those dangerous opinions or projects which have been so calumniously imputed to all who have dared to lend a helping hand or offer an encouraging word to Her Majesty in her hour of severe trial; but that, on the contrary, his aim in this, as in all his addresses to the corps to which he is chaplain, has been 'to enliven the flame of patriotism as well as devotion, and to advocate the great cause of religion, morality, and social order.'

Mr. Gillespie thus relates the circumstances of his arrest, and we see no reason to quarrel with the compliment which he pays to the 'Stewartry of Kirkcubright', in supposing that they 'will scarcely be believed' any where else:—

'Early in the month of July last, he received a letter from James Gordon, Esq. younger of Culvenan, his colonel-commandant, (the hero of the tale) requesting him, as usual, to attend the corps while in quarters, and preach before them on Sunday, the 30th of that month. But, it was added, that, as he was informed there was either a public or private agreement on the part of the ministers of the Presbytery of Kirkcubright, to pray on all public occasions for her Majesty,

&c. he wished to know from the author, whether he should deem it incumbent on him to adhere to this practice, when preaching before the regiment on the 30th. This information Colonel Gordon stated to be absolutely necessary, in consequence of the oath of allegiance which every yeoman must take, and which he himself had taken in his judicial capacity, on the accession of his present majesty.'

'It was answered on the part of the author, that no such agreement had ever been thought of by his brethren—that it did not appear, he believed, to the majority of the Presbytery of Kirkcubright, of much importance whether her majesty was prayed for nomiatim, or generally with the royal family, in which she was necessarily included, and that, with regard to himself, he would certainly act, on all public and private occasions, according to the best of his apprehension of the law of the church and the land.

'In obedience to this intimation, the author went to Kirkcubright on the 28th ultimo, where he delivered before the corps, on the following Sunday, the discourse here given to the public; and, in his concluding prayer for the royal family, introduced the words, "Bless likewise the Queen."

No sooner was this bold yet honest act, made known to Mr. Commandant Gordon, who was not himself at church, than he was pleased to put the reverend preacher under military arrest: and so immediate and urgent did the necessity of the proceeding appear to this champion of all Tory godliness, that the arrest took place on the evening of that hallowed day, when the even hand of the law is suspended in favour of all hot felons.

On the legality of this extraordinary step, Mr. Gillespie makes the following spirited remarks:—

'By accepting the appointment of chaplain of the cavalry, the author surrendered none of his rights and privileges as a minister of the church of Scotland. He never undertook to pray according to the word of command, nor to submit the terms in which he was to address the Almighty, to military censorship. In the duties he was to perform as chaplain, he was to be guided solely by the doctrines, laws, and usages of that church of which he was a member, and to which, by his ordination vows, he had solemnly bound himself to adhere. But that church, which has no liturgy, disclaims all civil interference with its forms of worship. The independence of the Presbyterial establishment in Scotland, is secured by a fundamental and essential article of the treaty of union, and which every sovereign for a century past, down to his present Majesty inclusively, has sworn inviolably to maintain and preserve. What has been attempted, therefore, by subordinate authority in this case, implies a power which cannot be claimed even by Majesty itself. Of such interference the church of Scotland wisely entertains a salutary jealousy, and on this subject its eventful history is pregnant with instruction. And whilst the author trusts he will always act as becomes a dutiful and loyal subject, so he will continue to resist every infringement on the rights of his order—every attempt to violate that sacred charter of his church's freedom, which was obtained through so many persecutions, and purchased with so much blood."

The author appears, however, to admit, that though the Scottish church disclaims all interference with its forms of worship, the King and council have not abstained from passing orders which had that tendency. He says, in a note to the passage we have just quoted:—

"A mere order in council, as to praying for the royal family, has never literally been observed by the Scottish clergy; if they have paid any attention to the substance of the order, they have never used the express words. Even the most loyal have prayed in language of their own choosing. It is the general assembly alone which has any right to prescribe to the ministers of our establishment in what expressions they are to pray."

After all, from any information we have on the subject, we are much inclined to be of opinion, that the claim of the Church of Scotland to an utter independence of the civil power, is a thing rather passed over in silence than solemnly acknowledged. Why does the King, by his representative the Lord High Commissioner, preside at all the general assemblies of the Scottish Church? What has the King to do there if it is not as head of the Church? Can or dare the assembly meet without the royal presence and sanction? Nay, is it not a fact, that at each meeting of assembly, the Lord High Commissioner first opens and constitutes it in the name of the King (acting, of course, on the assumption that he is the head of the church), and that the moderator (or president) then proceeds as if he knew nothing at all of what his grace had been doing, and without in the least adverting to the circumstance, opens and constitutes the assembly in the name of Christ (as the real head of the church)? Is it not equally true that the commissioner sits on the throne in the midst of them during every hour and minute of their deliberations; and that, at breaking up, the same double sort of ceremony is gone through as at the opening of the assembly? What do we see in all this but a mere adjustment of pretensions for peace sake; each party taking their own road to the same end, and saying nothing of the debatable ground between them? There may be worldly wisdom in this sort of management, but as long as it exists, the less that is said about "sacred charters of freedom" the better.

The sermon having, as we have before mentioned, been printed precisely as it was delivered, and written with no view, we presume, to publication, it would be unfair to subject it to any thing like a critical analysis. We shall content ourselves with making one brief extract, which will shew how little pretence there was for the absurd measure of his arrest, on the ground of any deficiency in sound and patriotic principles, and at the same time serve as no unfavourable specimen of the author's style:—

"To stand forth in defence of a constitution so noble and excellent, is at once honourable and praise-worthy,—and is, I am persuaded, on your part, the impulse of affection as well as the dictate of duty. I trust that you consider it a sacred deposit intrusted to your care, to be preserved inviolate, which your fathers have transmitted unimpaired to you, and which you, also, will transmit unimpaired to your children. I trust, that no misrepresentations of the factious, no clamour of the multitude, no personal inconvenience or privation, will prompt you to renege your discipline or abate your ardour in so glorious and so patriotic a cause. I trust, that no unhappy family questions at home will ever be made a rallying point to the disaffected, will ever shake your fidelity or diminish your affection to your common country, whose independence your fathers have achieved by their arms, and purchased with their lives; which is hallowed by the ashes of the martyr, and consecrated by the blood of the brave."

Poems. By P. M. James. 12mo. pp. 224. London, 1821.

AFTER undergoing the penance of reading Mr. Southey's hexametrical absurdities, under the torturings of impatience and disappointment, which ultimately gave way to the hopelessness of despair and to disgust, we turn with peculiar pleasure to this little volume, which restores us to our love of poetry and of poets. Mr. James, if we may judge from the motto he has adopted, is a young poet, but from his productions we should think him a matured one; and we have seldom been more gratified than we have in the perusal of the sixty-one short pieces of which the volume consists. These are songs, sonnets, elegiac stanzas, &c. &c.

One great characteristic of Mr. James's poetry is its simplicity and the harmony of the versification; many of the poems breathe the most amiable disposition and the most genuine philanthropy, and we should not be much surprised to learn that the author is a member of the Society of Friends. Be this as it may, the work before us does him much credit, not only as a poet, but as an able advocate of the best feelings which dignify human nature. A few extracts will justify our commendation:—

'THE BEACON.

The scene was more beautiful far to mine eye,
Than if day in its pride had array'd it;
The land-breeze blew mild, and the sure arch'd sky

Look'd pure as the spirit that made it.
The murmur rose soft, as I silently gazed
On the shadowy wave's playful motion;
From the dim distant isle, 'till the beacon-fire

blead'd,
Like a star in the midst of the ocean.

No longer the joy of the sailor-boy's breast,
Was heard in his wildly-breath'd numbers;
The sea-bird had flown to her wave-guided nest—

The fisherman sunk to his slumbers.
One moment I gazed from the bill's gentle slope,
(All hush'd was the billow's commotion,)
And thought that the beacon look'd lovely as

hope,
That star of life's tremulous ocean!
The time is long past, and the scene is afar,
Yet when my head rests on its pillow,
Will memory sometimes rekindle the star,
That blaz'd on the breast of the billow.

In life's closing hour, when the trembling soul
flies,
And death stills the heart's last emotion;
O then may the seraph of mercy arise,
Like a star on eternity's ocean!"

There is much beauty and pathos in the following:—

'CANZONET.

When time shall heal my wounded peace,
And bid the heart's repining cease;
When the rude storm of memory's away
Shall die in calm despair away,

Think not I'll then forget thee!
With wasting sighs that ever swell,
Thou heart'st me bid thy love farewell;
Thy smiles of fondness I resign,
The will is heaven's, the woe is mine,

For I can ne'er forget thee!
When youths, aroused by joy's control,
Shall call to love my drooping soul;
And many a smiling form appear,
They'll wonder at my starting tear,

For then I'll not forget thee!
The curious breast shall never know
The griefs that nurse my silent woe;
The treach'rous sigh shall ne'er recur
The name love teaches to conceal,

Yet I shall not forget thee!
I wish not that thy throbbing breast,
Like mine should mourn its unaid'd rest!
No sighly tear thine eye should dim,
Yet thou may'st at sometimes think on him,
Who never can forget thee!"

Mr. James's tribute to the sex is at once forcible and elegant:—

‘WOMAN’S LOVE.

Thy ‘bards have sung that woman’s love
(Their bosoms nature’s lesson’s morning),
Is sweeter than the western gale,
But fiercer as the dew of morn;
Yet all that tread this toilsome sphere,
Hath fond affection taught to prove,
In fortune’s smile or sorrow’s tear,
No love so true as woman’s love!

Whillet man his brother’s peace betrays,
And shuns the sinking clod of pain;
Fond minion of the blissful hour,
That flies when woe and misery reign:
The amaranth flower that blossoms ever,
The seal of joy no art can move;
The tie that interest can’t sever,
Grief’s soothing balm is woman’s love!

And when the fault’ring tongue complains,
And faintly breathes pain’s sickly moan;
What care can soothe the trying scene,
Like woman’s care and tender tone!
The love that soothes the dying hour,
The charm all earthly joy above,
That makes the grave a bed of rest,
And smooths the path—is woman’s love!”

The poor enslaved African has a feeling and an eloquent advocate in our author, as will appear from the

‘VERSES

Written upon reading the following, which is part of a “Proclamation to the Negro Population of Barbadoes, 1816.”

“The most wise and just men, the most humane and zealous advocates of the abolition of the slave trade, who possess practical knowledge, and the most sincere friends of those who are actually in slavery, have considered their emancipation to be morally impracticable.”

‘Then how blest is the death of the slave! he hath rest

From the wrongs of his merciless doom;
The scorn of his tyrant, the griefs of his breast,
Are hush’d in the calm of the tomb.

His spirit hath fled to the land of his dreams,
Where the waves of forgetfulness flow;
Where the day-star of life and of liberty beams
On the desolate offspring of woe!

Mourn—mourn for the living! O not for the dead,

Who have rest from their wrongs in the grave;
But woe for the living! destruction hath shed
Her curse on the lot of the slave.

The tree struck by lightning ne’er blossoms again—

Its branches wave dead in the wind;
And the blight of the soul, like a murderous stain,
Destroys the pure blossoms of mind!

O tell not of liberty’s joys to the slave,
Still destined his fetters to wear!

Tis to bring the parch’d lip to the brink of the wave,

To deepen the pang of despair!
When burns the pale meteor of tyranny dim,
And the shouts of the ransom’d resound;

The pens of liberty swell not for him,
The gloom of his soul is profound.

One’er to the slave the glad tidings unroll,
That a Saviour hath brought them from the skies!

For who that’s a Christian, but feels in his soul,
The day-spring of liberty rise!

Preach not to the slave! ‘tis to mock his desire,
To mingle deep scorn with his groan—
O break but his chain, and the slave shall aspire
To a destiny proud as thy own!”

We shall only insert two more poems, which need not our praise; they will sufficiently bespeak their own merits:—

‘SONG.

Tis not the beams of flanning day,
That win the lover’s fond adoring;
Tis not the morning’s cheerful ray,
Pale nature to her charms restoring;
No, ‘tis the silver star of even,
Whose radiance lights the lover’s heaven!

Dear are the tones of harmony,
From lips of rosy sweetness falling;
And dearer is affection’s sigh,
The bosom to its bliss recalling.
Yet silent looks, with sure control,
Plead deeply to the lover’s soul!

Fond lover! turn thy gaze away
From woman’s brow with beauty beaming;
Tempt not the breaks of orient day,
From eyes with dewy lustre gleaming.
But tell how dear her gentle love should be,
Whose cheek is sadden’d with a tear for thee!”

‘TO LIBERTY.

‘Spirit unquenchable! whose awful fire
Hath ever blazed amid the struggling storm,
And rush’d athwart the night with meteor form,

When tyrants bade thy living beam expire!

For thee the breast hath ever glow’d,
For thee the lyre’s high measures flow’d,
And patriot arms sublimely rear’d!
Glorious divinest deeds have dar’d.

Whilist now the crescent moon fades pale,
And loud the ocean surges roar,

What breath so pure as morning’s gale,
What fane so meet as BRITAIN’S shore,

To wake the poet’s numbers wild and free,
And pour the holy song to LIBERTY!

Hush’d be the lute’s dull measures! nor ce-twine

The rosy garland! breathe no melting lay,
Winning the free-born bosom to resign

The generous fire that spurns despotic sway!
Pleasure! thy wanton spells forego,

For thou art freedom’s deadliest foe;
And he who yields him pleasure’s slave,

Can ne’er be free, can ne’er be brave.
Ye winds of heaven! as will ye sweep,

Where rustling banners proudly float,
Bear ye the murmurs loud and deep,

Pour’d from the clarion’s brazen throat.
For, Freedom! where thy glories glide,

Where thou in loftiest power hast pass’d,
Thine eye was on the banner’s prize,

Thy spirit with the trumpet’s blast.
Or where, with brow unbound,

Thou gavest thy bright hair to the gales of peace,
And bident the battle and the triumph cease;

There Virtue breathe! her awe around,
And honour’s sun, with steady ray,

Roll’d thro’ the azure arch, and pour’d a purer day.

Call from the sullen harp a bolder strain!
For lo! their deeds ennobled scenes reveal;

And wad’d upon the heaven’s pellucid plain,
In awful radiance gleams the patriot steel!

And hail the vision-crowded air,
The pomp that fires the eastern sky!”

The golden wings of morning bear
Th’ immortal form of Liberty!
Like storm-clouds stream her helmet plumes,
Her form it’s warrior port assumes;
Bold, proud, and terrible, as when of yore,
She steep’d her steel in Persian gore!

O Liberty! thy love prevails
Albion’s wild shores and rocks among;
Swells in her mountain gales,
Lives in her poet’s song.
Defiance-breathing strains are thine,
The joy that hails the festal hour;
And oh! how bright thy lightning’s shine,
Launched on the front of lawless power!
No anger fires the eye of death,
When stern he drinks the freeman’s breath;
No lambent terrors round him wave,
To daunt the spirit of the patriot brave;
For in the struggles of the free,
The meed of death is victory!”

If real merit, accompanied by great modesty, entitle a poet to a niche in the Temple of Fame, then must Mr. James obtain it; and we only anticipate public opinion when we pronounce him to possess talents of an order which cannot suffer him to remain in obscurity, or to rest satisfied even with the praise which this volume is likely to ensure him.

Foreign Literature.

Dictionnaire des Conjugaisons Françaises, &c.

Dictionnaire of French Conjugations, preceded by an Elementary Grammar. By J. B. M. A. Lelouvier, Professor of Belles Lettres. 1 vol. 12mo. Paris, 1821.

GRAT are the benefits resulting from the union of talent and industry, which must always be combined to render any performance truly excellent; and whoever aspires to be useful, merits higher praise than he who strives to shine and amuse. M. Lelouvier’s merit is not, then, to be contemned; his task is wading through the whole of the French verbs, and giving the conjugation of them all, must have been a very laborious one, for which every student owes him a debt of gratitude. It is scarcely possible for a foreigner to retain the whole list of the French verbs in his memory, with their various conjugations and irregularities, and whether they are active, passive, neuter, reflexive, or impersonal. M. Lelouvier’s work is, therefore, indispensable to every foreigner studying the language, and who would wish to speak or write it correctly.

The author very justly observes, ‘no ancient or modern language has ever been the production of either science, observation, or any systematic plan whatever. Chance, time, and successive wants have alone presided over their formation; rules were afterwards made as well as they could be, founded merely on what custom had established; hence the numerous irregularities and the continual exceptions which fatigue the imagination and disgust beginners.'

Such a work, executed as M. Le-louvier's is, would be highly desirable in every French school in England, particularly if the English editor would be at the pains to give, immediately after the French verb, its various significations in English, as the author has done in French, this done, its utility would be greatly increased and it would not fail to find its place in every school and every library.

THE FRENCH AND ENGLISH.

CONTRASTED REMARKS,

Hastily thrown together by an Englishman in Paris.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

NEVER, perhaps, were two people, whom nature has placed at so small a distance from each other, distinguished by such remarkable contrasts as the English and the French; they seem to be mutually determined to preserve the characteristic features of their respective nations; in my remarks on the peculiarities of each, I pretend to no order; and though extracted from my common-place book, the following observations may not, altogether, deserve the title of lieux-communes.

A Frenchman cannot visit a child at nurse, or a parent at the point of death, if the one or the other reside at a distance of twenty miles from Paris, without a passport from the police-office; a Parisian cannot take his morning drive in his carriage out of Paris, without having his gig, curricule, or coach, examined at the Barrière, to ascertain if he is engaged in smuggling a miserable loaf of bread; or should he be an inhabitant of the environs of the city, he cannot take a drive into it, without undergoing a similar visit, lest he should have popt a few bottles of wine or brandy, or a joint of meat, into the sword-case, with the view of evading les impôts de la ville. Our English fashionables would not much admire the intrusion of an exciseman into their equipages, at Hyde Park corner or at Shoreditch Turnpike, on a similar mission.

The French subaltern officers wear their epaulettes on the left shoulder—their lieutenant's and ensigns on the right; and it is not unusual to see them enter a café with several of their men, drink, and even hob and nob with them, in a glass of brandy, and appear on a perfect system of equality. Such familiarity has no place in the English army; I would not certainly advocate its adoption, but the truth seems to me to be, that the French private soldier is too highly regarded—ours, not sufficiently so.

In France, the ladies of all ranks scruple not to dine at a public tavern; our English ladies would be ashamed to seat themselves in a coffee-room.

In France, the Sunday is devoted to merriment, debauchery, and noise; all the theatres are open—all the theatres are full; the public houses swarm with the lower and middle classes of society, who dance away their care and make the only substantial meal which, in all probability, many of them partake of in the entire week; reviews, exhibitions, and puppet-shows, &c. occupy the morning of the Sabbath,—the evening is devoted to festes champêtres, gambling parties, and fire-works; in England—but I need not point out the contrast in this instance!

In France, the first prince of the blood, the Duke of Orleans, lets out his palace piece-meal, to impures, gamblers, and shop-keepers of every description,—he derives a large fortune therefrom, but I do not think it should be termed a princely one; this circumstance presents a double contrast, which it may be as prudent to leave to the reader's sagacity to discover.

In France, on any solemn religious occasion, the congregation are secured from all interruption during divine service, by double lines of gend'armes and of the national guards, who, with fixed bayonets and covered heads, instil into the minds of the faithful, the respect due to the God of mercy and of peace! In England, thank heaven, we need not such an escort, even to the very steps of the altar.

In France, a Frenchman will run all over Paris with you, show you all the curiosities, procure you tickets for the play, public gardens, &c.; in England, we should first of all ask a stranger to dinner.

I have seen a man of rank, and a member of the French Institute, on being asked to carve a turkey, which was placed opposite to him at the table of an English baronet, take out a clasp-knife from his pocket,—tear the poor bird to pieces,—then pick his teeth with the same article of cutlery; and afterwards employ the identical knife to distribute the contents of a plate of preserves! Even at the first restaurateurs in Paris, you are expected to eat flesh, fish, and fowl with the same knife and fork; happy, even, if you procure a change of plates. An Englishman will desire that these abitudes may ever remain a contrast to those of his native land.

In France, servility is pushed to such a pitch, that the most sublime productions of the dramatic poets are beheld in silent sadness, should the King of France honour the theatre with his presence; it is contrary to etiquette to applaud before his Majesty; I do not think that the presence of all the kings of the whole earth, could stifle John Bull's enthusiasm at a representation of the chef-d'œuvres of Shakspeare, or repress his honest and hearty laugh at the comedies of Colman, or the farces of Garrick and of Foote.

The French eat their meat apart—their vegetables by themselves,—then the fish, and afterwards le rôti; the dessert is put on previous to the cloth being drawn, and a glass of brandy finishes the dinner of these people, who think themselves the politest, most civilized, and most liberal in the world.

The windows of every baker's shop, and of every marchand de vin, (public-house,) have the aspect of a prison; they are all secured by large iron bars; I do not think that our labourers and mechanics would admire such a means of security;—they would fancy themselves in so many spunging houses.

I breakfasted, on my arrival in Paris, at the Café de Foy, in the Palais Royal; one of the best and most respectable in the capital. A French gentleman, decorated with half-a-dozen orders, the ribbons of which, on his half-worn-out blue coat, represented a greater quantity of colours than the rainbow, placed himself opposite to me and at the same table; I demanded a thé complet, (a pot of tea, several lumps of sugar, a French roll, and a pat of butter;) the Frenchman called for a cup of coffee;—I remarked that my neighbour had been served with a less quantity of sugar than myself, although we had both much more than was required. Being pressed for time, I had finished my meal long before the other party, and was drawing on my gloves, when he very politely asked me, pointing to the five or six morsels of sugar which still remained on my plateau, if I did not take the sugar? Certainly not, was my reply; on which the chevalier, grand cross of the Legion of St. Louis, Legion of Honour, Legion of I know not what, drew out, 'avec permission donc, monsieur,' and immediately wrapt up, in a piece of white paper, the remains of my breakfast as well as of his own. I confess that I was thunder-struck for the moment, but I have subsequently found that it is an invariable custom; and, as such, expected by the proprietor of the establishment. I should certainly advise French travellers, however, to keep their fingers out of our sugar-basins on the Dover Road; for I know more than one rude host, who would be uncouth enough to make them disgorge their purloined sweets.

ON THE STATE OF EUROPE.

[A Correspondent calls our attention to the prophetic sentiments of Dr. Goldsmith and Dr. Smollett, as to the affairs of Europe. Much that these admirable writers and profound politicians anticipated, has already been realized, and the passing events at the present moment seem likely to complete their unaccomplished predictions.—Ed.]

It is (says Dr. Goldsmith) in the politic as in the human constitution, if the limbs grow too large for the body, their size, instead of improving, will diminish the vigour of the whole. The colonies should always bear an exact proportion to the mother-country; when they grow populous, they grow powerful; and by becoming powerful, they become independent also. Thus subordination is destroyed, and a country swallowed up in the extent of its own dominions. The Turkish empire would be more formidable were it less extensive; were it not for those countries which it can neither command, nor give entirely away; which it is obliged to protect, but from which it has no power to exact obedience.

Sweden, though not seemingly a strenuous assertor of its liberties, is, probably, only basking on to despotism. Their senators, while they pretend to vindicate the freedom of the people, are only establishing their own independence. The deluded people will, however, at last perceive the miseries of an aristocratical government; they will perceive that the administration of a society of men, is ever more painful than that of one only. They will fly from the most oppressive of all forms, where one single member is capable of controlling the whole, to take refuge under the throne. No people long endure an aristocratical government, when they can apply elsewhere for redress. The lower orders of people may be enslaved for a time by a number of tyrants, but upon the first opportunity, they will ever take refuge in despotism or democracy.

As the Swedes are making concealed approaches to despotism, the French, on the other hand, are imperceptibly vindicating themselves into freedom. When I consider those parliaments (the members of which are all created by the court, the presidents of which can act only by immediate direction) presume even to mention privileges and freedom, who, till of late, received direction from the throne with implicit humility; when this is considered, I cannot help saying, that the genius of freedom has entered that kingdom in disguise. If they have but three weak monarchs more successively on the throne, the mask will be laid aside, and the country will certainly once more be free.

The German empire, that remnant of the majesty of ancient Rome, appears on the eve of dissolution. The members of its vast body want every tie of government to unite them, and seem feebly held together, only by their respect for an ancient institution. The very name of country and countrymen, which, in other nations, makes one of the strongest bonds of government, has been here for some time laid aside: each of its inhabitants seeming more proud of being called from the petty state which gives them birth, than by the more well known title of German.

This government may be regarded in the light of a severe master and a feeble opponent. The states which are now subject to the laws of the empire, are only watching a proper occasion to fling off the yoke; and those which are become too powerful to be compelled to obedience, now begin to think of dictating in their turn. The struggles in this state are, therefore, not in order to preserve, but to destroy the ancient constitution; if one succeeds, the government becomes despotic; if the other, several states will subsist without even nominal subordination; but, in either case, the Germanic constitution will be no more.

When I compare the figure which the Dutch make in Europe, with that they assume in Asia, I am struck with surprise. In Asia, I find them the great lords of all the Indian seas; in Europe, the timid inhabitants of a paltry state. No longer the sons of freedom, but of avarice; no longer assertors of their rights by courage, but by negotiations; fawning on those who insult them, and crouching under the rod of every neighbouring power, without a friend to save them in distress, and without virtue to save themselves; their government is poor, and their private wealth will serve but to invite some neighbouring invader.—Citizen of the World, vol. i, letter 56, p. 292.

The following are the sentiments of Dr. Smollett on the same subject: extracted from a letter, sent a few months before his death, to the Rev. Dr. —, of —, Northumberland.

As the sentiments of dying men, particularly dying authors, have been sometimes looked upon as prophetic, you will be inclined, perhaps, to pay the greater regard to the following political speculations; and, in all human probability, they are the last, of any kind, which you will ever receive from me; for I feel the chill hand of death gradually stealing on me as those calamities are stealing upon our European states, which I foresee, but shall never live to experience. But I am perfectly resigned, and nearly wearied to death, with a life, that both in its private and public condition, is the sordid slave of interest, prejudice, and folly. The first troubles that are likely to ensue, will proceed, I think, from that overgrown and useless system of colonization, with which several nations (particularly our own) have burdened themselves. But, although the inhabitants of that immense and unwieldy empire of Spain, in South America, are sufficiently disaffected and disposed to revolt, they are so fast bound by the chains of despotism, superstition, and intolerance, that it is not probable they will take the lead, or attempt any thing for their emancipation from the cruel yoke under which they groan, until either by the especial favour of Heaven they shall become enlightened, or shall be acted upon by some considerable external force; in which case, the empire of Spain, in those parts, would pass away like a shadow. Of all the kingdoms of Europe, I think our own stands in the greatest danger respecting her colonies, and in the least with regard to her affairs at home. At home you have a few radically discontented men, with a vast and undoubted majority, who are inviolably attached to the present establishment. In our American colonies, we may almost say, they are all republicans to a man; that nothing but the tie of interest, and the want of power to stand alone, has hitherto preserved them in their allegiance to the crown of Great Britain, which (you may rely upon it) they will embrace the first fair opportunity to shake it off. Nor would such an event, in my ideas, be at all disadvantageous to the parent state, or to the colonies themselves, provided it were possible it could happen without loss and bloodshed; which, I fear, the present stock of wisdom and moderation, on either side, can afford us no certain assurance of. To turn our eyes towards our West India islands, I think the prospect looks still more gloomy and alarming. It has ever excited my astonishment, that nobody, either in England or those islands, should entertain the least dread or forecast of the dangerous consequences of introducing such an immense multitude of African slaves into them, or the smallest compunction for the enormous wickedness of the act, exaggerated as it is a thousand degrees, by being perpetrated by men whose nation sets so high a value upon their own liberty, and who pretend to such an aversion from deeds of cruelty. If we have no apprehensions of the vengeance of divine justice, for the countless and horrid barbarities which are constantly exercised on the miserable slaves of those colonies, still common sense ought to teach us, there is a point beyond which human affairs cannot go. That it is not possible that such numbers, who possess every day they live the power of their own freedom, will suffer such extremities for ever. That the blow must come at some period or other, which may be this year as well as the next; and that when it does come, it brings with it dissolution impossible to be withstood, and death in every shape. That a revolt of the slaves must happen before many years, I will venture to predict; and, if it should happen on one island, to whatever European nation it belongs, the West India isles will never afterwards be in a state of safety. To return to our own continent, France appears to me to be the first probable theatre of any material change. The present fashion of handling abstract questions of religion and government, so eagerly adopted of late by a great number of people of consideration in that country, is, no doubt, the high road to truth and justice; but, unfortunately for mankind, it must necessarily run through the confines of bloodshed and demolition. Amongst all the best informed people of that country, with whom I have had the opportunity of conversing, there seems to exist an enthusiastic passion for the discovery of moral truth, and a most ardent zeal for its propagation. And in this laudable frame of mind, seems particularly included a commiseration for the sufferings of the lower classes of mankind; and a desire to relieve them from the shackles in which they have been so long bound by religious and political frauds. If we consider the weakness, profligacy, and abandoned debauchery of the French court; which they, whose situations intitle them to be the best judges, represent as a second Sodom; the poverty, misery, and discontent of the lower classes; and the violent desire of change glowing and burning in the breasts of those who are the most able, and, indeed, the only people in whose power it is to bring that change about; we need not hesitate to assert, that some great revolution must ensue, in the course of a few years, in the government, religion, and manners of the people of that country. Indeed, from the best general view which I am able to form of the internal political state of the kingdom of France, I cannot bring myself to believe, that the present despotic system can, at any rate, continue more than twenty years longer. If religion has invented and nourished those frauds, upon whom the despotism of France was founded; and the belief of that religion is now almost obliterated from amongst all ranks, what is in future to support such a government, even when the general interest seems loudly to demand its demolition? That the change, come when it will, must be thorough, violent, and bloody, we may fairly prognosticate, both from the known character of those who are likely to have the chief hand in the reformation, and from that of the common people of France, whom their whole history proves to be the most sanguinary, unprincipled, and barbarous of any populace in Europe. Were it possible for me to live to witness it, I should by no means wonder to see the principles of republicanism predominant for a while in France, for it is the property of extremes to meet; and our abstract rights naturally lead to that form of government, and it is not the season to moderate abstraction, during the fury and concussion of political earthquakes.

Whenever a revolution upon such grounds as these shall happen in France, the flame of war will be universally lighted up throughout Europe; either from the inhabitants of other countries instantaneously catching the contagion, or from the apprehensions of their respective governments. But whenever the great mass of mankind shall become enlightened, it will be as vain as perilous for governments to attempt to combat principles, which can only be effected with success during the reign of ignorance and superstition. I see it, in the clearest light, that the people of France, Germany, and Italy, (but more especially the latter) are about to become weary of the impositions of religion, and the galling fetters of slavery. And I behold a new order of people about to arise in Europe, which shall give laws to law-givers, discharges to priests, and lessons to kings.

The Principal Performers of the Theatres Royal Drury Lane & Covent Garden.

No. XV.—Mr. WALLACK.

‘That unmatch’d form and feature of blown youth.’

SHAKESPEARE.

HOWEVER extraordinary it may appear, that a nation still in its infancy, at least with regard to intellectual acquirements, and whose progress towards civilization has barely attained the first stages of refinement, should be enabled to improve or amend any class of men, particularly the votaries of Thespis, still it cannot be denied that the western world has had a very beneficial influence on Mr. Wallack. It would be ridiculous to deny that this gentleman has returned to the metropolis a much better actor than when he left us some two years since; if his performances do not intire him to a place with our first tragedians, they undoubtedly rank him in the first class; if they are not quite chef d’œuvres, they certainly bear the stamp of great though immature genius. We think Mr. Wallack has acted foolishly in starting forwards in the very first rate tragic characters; he should have studied closely, and without remission, and have waited till time had fully developed those talents which he undoubtedly possesses in an eminent degree. In the higher walks of tragedy he is frequently miserably deficient, but in characters of heroic gallantry or amatory softness, he has no superior. His first re-appearance was in Hamlet, and he experienced a reception not a little flattering to his abilities. We cannot, however, say, that 'after what we have seen,' his representation quite met our idea of the gallant, the philosophical, the unsophisticated Dane. He certainly elicited some beauties, but the performance, taken en masse, was tame and insipid. Some of the soliloquies were well given; the interview with Ophelia, where he bids her 'go to nunery,' was chaste, and not so repulsive as we sometimes see it; and the fencing scene, with Laertes, was admirable on both sides, for grace and mastery of skill. The most certain evidence of his failure in Coriolanus is, that the play has not been repeated; still he looked the noble Roman to advantage, and in one or two scenes was effective. Three years have not yet elapsed since Mr. Wallack crossed the Atlantic with good acting capabilities, and he has returned with them very much improved, though not brought to the summit of perfection; his Brutus, in Howard Payne's tragedy of that name, was any thing but successful; with all respect for Mr. Wallack, we term it a complete failure; his Brutus, in Julius Caesar, was dignified, and sometimes animated, but certainly not the Roman chieftain drawn by Shakespeare, and embodied by John Kemble. His best scene in Montalto was that in which he wandered before the chamber-door of his wife with all that indecision, the natural concomitant of a virtuous mind about to commit a heinous offence. His attitude, on the dagger falling from his hand, was very fine, and his agony, on hearing the fondness and soothing of the being he was about to destroy, was expressed with a perfect fidelity to nature. In our opinion, his Rolla is the best thing he has attempted. We have scarcely ever seen, even in Kemble himself, attitudes more graceful than those of Wallack in this character. He was perfectly equal to it. His scene with Alonzo in the dungeon was highly spirited, the brief dialogue with Elvira still more excellent; his carrying off the child produced bursts of applause; his address to his soldiers was marked by great judgment, energy, and feeling, and delivered with considerable force and animation; his death was also excellently managed. Though the success of Mr. Haynes's tragedy of Conscience was owing far more to its own intrinsic merits, than to the exertions of the performers; yet we will not be so unjust as to deny that Mr. Wallack gave much effect to the character of Lorenzo. The gallantry of his resistance to the banditti into whose hands he had fallen, produced great effect; the internal struggle between honour and the compunctious feelings of his better nature, was good, and his refusal, when urged by Arsenio to abandon his wife, finely expressed. We are inclined to think that Mr. Wallack has over-rated his abilities, however highly we may be inclined to estimate them, by attempting Richard III. Were Richard a young and impassioned man, a sprightly lover, or a gallant cavalier, Mr. Wallack's representation of him would be inimitable; but this is not the case; Gloucester is the victim, if not of years, certainly of deformity; his love is hypocrisy, his whole conduct is a mixture of diabolical fierceness and infernal policy; ambition is his ruling passion, and such ambition, that to delineate it finely, requires a master-hand. In the nicer shades of the character he fell infinitely short of the powerful portrait drawn by Shakespeare, and many of his soliloquies were very far from being well delivered. His best scene was with Lady Anne; there were, however, other points which deserve favourable mention; his attitude, on starting from his dream, was good, and his representation of the terrors which agitate and overwhelm the conscience-stricken tyrant tolerably forcible; he was very animated during the whole of the fifth act, and his fight and death were admirable. We will not notice a single performance of this gentleman previous to his departure for America, but will content ourselves with observing, that his talents have wonderfully expanded within the last three or four years; indeed, we believe, we may safely venture to affirm, that it is a thing unprecedented in the annals of the stage, to find an actor who, seven years back, was in the habit of performing walking gentlemen of the very lowest class, or a captain of a banditti in a melodrama, now enacting the first tragic characters at the first theatre in the world. Mr. Wallack's greatest fault is the indolence he exhibits in those characters which he considers unworthy of him; even in his best performances there is, at times, a degree of listlessness and inactivity, arising, it would seem, from a conviction that his natural talent, without any exertion, is sufficient to attain his object, however great or exalted it may be. This is not the method by which he can ever expect to become a fine tragic actor. Let him rouse himself and recollect, that the honours he has already gained are only to be preserved by an undiverting attention to every character that may be allotted him, and that those honours are 'trifles light as air,' when put in competition with the 'fame, the never-dying fame,' which our great tragedian has so justly and so meritoriously acquired.

ANARCHY.

(From the "Fulminator," of St. Maura, written in Roman, by Dr. Chalkley, of St. Maura.)

Jove having heard a rumour, that Liberty had abandoned Britain, and fixed her abode on the other side of the Channel, dispatched Hermes to ascertain the fact. The messenger, having returned, relates the result of his inquiries, as follows:—

SAID Hermes, "as soon as I landed at Paris, Of all that I met I made careful inquiries, If 'twas certain that Liberty really came there, And where could I find her; but none could tell where,

Till I met with a fellow, with aspect of steel, Who baw'd that she lodged where once stood the Bastille;

"And," quoth he, "if you please, my good citizen god,

To follow, I'll instantly shew you the road." And behold, as he said, when we came to the ground,

No trace of the Bastille was there to be found.— I marvelled who could have made bold to pull down

This tower of France and this scourge of the town.

The rumour we heard, I began now to credit; There was nothing more like than that Liberty did it.

But what's 'er my conjectures, I resolved to hide, And implicitly followed the steps of my guide.—

Wide opened a portal, and displayed to the view An assemblage of figures, such a horrible crew, As I ne'er before, since the day of my birth, Beheld, or in hell, or in heaven, or earth. High placed on a rostrum of hard frozen blood, A female, gigantic and terrible stood—

In her right hand, a red-reeking dagger was seen;

She leaned with her left on a curious machine,

She called the emblem of freedom, made by Guillotine.

The mob called her Liberty; swore with one breath,

They would die to defend her, and glory in death.—

* The 'Picture of Ancient and Modern Greece,' in a former number, is from the same poem.

I grieved to behold them with blindness so smitten;
 For full in her face I saw Anarchy written.
 There Faction was seen in the guise of Equality,
 And was cheered by the rabble with vast prodigality—

These glared wild Ambition, with eyes full of flame,
 And having assumed a stern patriot's name,
 As was greeted with many a stupid huzzah,
 As his country's saviour, his country's stay;
 While in secret plotting to murder a duke,
 And admonishing him to be quick at his work;
 'For to night, sir,' said he, with a shrug and a scoff,
 'Of ten thousand Frenchmen the heads must be off.'

Suspended aloft, on the strength of a hair,
 There Atheism sat in an ebony chair, While Truth stood beside her, down ready to cut it,
 And Hell gap'd below her, as prompt to admit it;
 But so thick was the film that envelop'd her sight,
 She could not see Truth though full beaming and bright.

There Fride and Oppression and Rapine were seen,
 With many a demon unblest and obscene,
 That I verily thought Pandemonium there;
 So I curs'd them and spread my broad pillows
 in air,
 When less than a moment to Albion got over,
 Where the first I beheld, on the white cliffs of Dover,
 Apparently grieved and absorbed in deep thought,
 Was the very identical goddess I sought—
 After greetings, I said I was sorry to find That something appear'd to be troubling her mind:—

And, if 'twere not impertinent, I should be fain
 To know what could give an immortal such pain,—
 'Alas!' she replied, 'you can hardly believe
 The causes how manifold I have to grieve;
 For these Frenchmen, (may Anarchy cut all their throats!)
 For on her, the foul fiend, every fool of them does;—

When they sacrifice millions of my truest friends
 On the shrine of Ambition, to gain their own ends,—
 Till torrents of blood overflow all the land;
 It was I, they affirm, gave the dreadful command.

Not a folly or crime that they choose to commit,
 But to me all the blame they are sure to transmit—
 But sooner shall chaos resume her old reign,
 And order return to confusion again,
 And Tyranny melt into softness, and hear
 When Justice brings dictates of truth to her ears;
 And sooner Sir  shall bow to sobriety—
 Forsake Epicurus for better society.

And when 'honour and glory point out to the brave,
 The death of the hero—the life of the slave;
 The grave where for ever fresh amaranth blows,
 And the tomb of the vile, where the baneful
 weed grows;

Then sooner shall Swinton* his courage forget,
 * A gentleman who, if firm loyalty, unsullied honour, approved bravery, and great util-

And, like a base recreant coward, retreat;
 Refuse for his country, her freedom and law—
 His sword, when most she requires it, to draw;
 That she blighted the laurels, hear infamy boast
 on—

Which bravely he won on the plains of Hindostan;

And sooner shall Health lead to tipple on brandy,
 And Reason be found in the head of a dandy;
 Old R— in eloquence equal Saint Paul;
 Grave pimps and grave statesmen forget to ca-
 bal;

A— abandon his bottle and wench,
 Than I think to live on such terms with the French.

So, Hermes, tell Jove what he heard: was a flam,
 That I'm here, and resolv'd to abide where I am.

MR. HAYDON'S PICTURE OF CHRIST'S AGONY.

'When shall we behold
 The tuneful tongue, the Promethean hand,
 Aspire to ancient praise?'—AKENSIDE.

FROM Mr. Haydon's former picture of Christ's Entry into Jerusalem, though, as we at that time confessed, very deficient in many points necessary to constitute a perfect painting; we were, nevertheless, induced to hope, that every future work would, by raising him a step in the scale of excellence, at length promote him to a rank in his profession, if not the highest, at least not far removed from that superiority, which would enrol him among the brightest ornaments of British art. Shall we say, that upon his re-appearance before the public, we have found ourselves completely deceived in that favourable judgment? We fear that such must be our acknowledgment, and we likewise fear that succeeding performances will but contribute to sanction our second and severer sentence. That in this we may be again mistaken is our earnest, yet, alas! hopeless wish; and we can assure Mr. Haydon that if such superiority be possible, we shall hail the correction of that error with greater joy than even the grief we now feel at the development of that deception under which we have hitherto been labouring; a development which has been effected by a sight of that picture, on which it is now our painful duty to pass opinion. There was, perhaps, never a more glaring instance of perverted talent and of daring degeneration, we might almost say, into mental distraction, than the principle upon which this subject has been conceived, and the execution which marks its tary skill and talents, were certain steps to high military rank, would not, after forty years' actual service, be suffered to pine in obscurity on the miserable pittance of a colonel's half-pay, with the empty rank of major-general.—TRANS.

performance. The conception of the history is marked by a ridiculous and unreasonableness; and the method in which that conception has been embodied is conspicuous for the at-most paucity of exertion, and, as far as appearances would lead us to believe, the greatest negligence which can be compatible with the desire of admiration. The artist seems to have passed that decision upon his own merits which he wished, and, therefore, expected it would be the decision of the public, to whose eyes he was about to submit his performance, not, however, in the hope of profiting by their opinions, or the wish of hearing those opinions promulgated, but with all the confidence of one unused to censure, and untaught to calculate upon its probability. This is not, however, the road to attain perfection, nor even to preserve the scale of merit already mounted; and the work, now unfortunately submitted to the eye of public criticism and to the voice of public judgment, is an egregious proof of the truth of that maxim, so frequently in the mouth of the late Emperor of France, and so happily illustrated by the occurrences of his life, 'that from the sublime to the ridiculous there is but a step.'

'The Agony,' under the pencil of Mr. Haydon, has been clothed in all the coarseness and vulgarity of the Dutch school, without its truth, its nature, or its vivacity; it glows with all the rich gorgeousness of colouring in the Venetian style, without the harmony which combines and blends and chastens that glow in the works of a Titian or a Correggio; it strikes upon the soul with that wildness which astonishes us in the mighty conceptions of a Michael Angelo, without one spark of that sublimity which darts into the soul the electric force of an adoring awe, and which that transcendent genius alone knew how to draw down in its whole and undiminished strength.

All those high and ennobling reflections, all those awful and soul-subduing imaginations, all those grateful and fervid feelings which should exalt, ag-grandise, and soften the spirit of the spectator at the sight of the Messiah in the heart-rending struggle between his mortal and immortal nature, are left unawakened, unthought of, and uncalled for! while that solemn and imposing scene which Imagination presents to us at the recollection of 'the agony,' that agony which no human and no superhuman species, unless combined in Christ, could support or even experience, has been treated in a way which no period of that wondrous life, even attended with less awful circumstances, nay, which no grand history of purely mortal agency would have warranted; the veil hardly to be touched by the highest mortal genius, has been rudely torn off, and, instead of the glorious aspirations of suffering Deity, we are shocked by a scene without sublimity or beauty, at which our wounded feelings will not allow us to smile, which our disgusted senses will not permit us to admire.

W. H. PARRY.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—Sheridan's admirable comic opera of the Duenna, was performed at this theatre on Tuesday night, for the purpose of introducing Miss Wilson in the character of Clara. The Duenna is the best production of that species of opera invented by Mr. Addison, who combined sense with sound, and first introduced native music into our operas. It contains the very best of our Scotch and Irish airs, set by one of the most skilful composers of music. The harmony, melody, and expression arise from those strains which men of plain unadulterated taste do like, not from those which would be connoisseurs pretend to like. Instead of exciting surprise by mere execution, these delightful tunes please and interest the heart. Sheridan has certainly in this piece carried opera to the highest pitch of excellence which it has ever attained; for, independent of its musical attractions, the dialogue possesses more comic excellence than most comedies. Though less general and comprehensive in its satire than the Beggar's Opera, it is superior to it in brilliant wit, in distinctness and discrimination of characters, in appositeness of sentiment and language; besides, it far surpasses it in another view—it is totally unexceptionable in point of moral tendency. The characters in the Duenna are very strongly marked. Little Isaac is perhaps as humorous a portrait as ever has been presented, and the scenes between him and Margaret (the Duenna) are as comic as can well be conceived. Here is a great abundance of brilliant imagery and sterling wit, mixed with the most agreeable humour; and a better description of the shallow cunning of trivial minds is perhaps no where to be found than in the sly little Isaac.

The opera was, perhaps, never better cast than it was on the present occasion: for, in addition to the attractions of Miss Wilson as Clara, Braham was Carlos; Horn, Don Ferdinand; T. Cooke, Antonio; Munden, Don Jerome; Knight, Isaac; Mrs. Edwin the Duenna, and Miss Povey, Louisa. The part of Clara is much better suited to the powers of Miss Wilson than that of Rosetta, and she sustained the character admirably. She was encored in almost every song, and she gave some of them with a skill and execution which we have seldom heard, particularly 'Adieu thou dreary pile,' which was her greatest triumph. Braham, in whose praise eulogy is exhausted, gave 'Had I a heart for falsehood fram'd,' and 'Just like Love,' which has been introduced, in inimitable style. Horn was very effective in Don Ferdinand, Munden pre-eminently ludicrous in Don Jerome, and Knight quite at home in the humour of Isaac Mendoza; but he made a Yorkshire Jew of him, perhaps to give an additional zest to the cunning of the Israelite. T. Cooke played well, and sung better in Don Antonio, and Mrs. Edwin made an excellent Duenna, although the play-bills inform us it was her first attempt at any character of that description. Nor must we forget Miss Povey, who, in Louisa, gave proofs of the rapid improvement she has made.

The Oratorio, on Wednesday night, was well attended, when the new grand Requiem was performed for the second time. A grand selection of ancient and modern music followed, with some pieces from Beethoven's Battle Symphony, which concluded with our national anthem, newly arranged with the accompaniment of thirteen harps, by M. Bochsa and his pupils.

COVENT GARDEN.—The Stranger, which has been as much censured and admired as any play that ever kept a footing on the stage, was performed at this theatre on Tuesday night. It has been objected to Kotzebue, that, as a dramatic writer, he always chose females seduced from the path of virtue for his heroines; that, in order to appear new and original, he built his plots upon eccentric and improbable events,—that he disfigured his style with sententious observations, full of false morality, and offended alike the conventional forms of civilized society and common decency. This is, indeed, a serious charge, and, if true, would be sufficient condemnation of his dramas; but the Stranger and Lover's Vows by no means justify it. It was once, we believe, seriously proposed to Miss O'Neill, by a fastidious moralist, that it should not appear that Mrs. Haller had deviated from the path of virtue. This would certainly be like performing the tragedy of Hamlet, and leaving out the hero; for the whole interest of the character rests on the deep and sincere penitence which Mrs. Haller feels for her former guilt; and without entering into any lengthened disquisition on the morality of this play, we may safely observe, that we believe no woman would ever sin if she thought the transgression would be followed by the sufferings and repentance of Mrs. Haller.

The principal attraction of the evening, was the first appearance of Miss Dance, in the part of Mrs. Haller. This lady, of whom report had spoken very highly, possesses a good figure and a face capable of great expression. Her debut was a successful one, and she displayed talents of a very superior order, although she laboured under considerable agitation. In the interview with her husband and the children, she was particularly happy, and rendered this scene very affecting. Although it would scarcely be fair to decide from a first appearance, when the lady suffered much from her embarrassment, yet we may safely venture to say, that she possesses talents which, when matured by a little experience, will render her a very valuable acquisition to the stage. Mr. Charles Kemble sustained the character of the Stranger, and did we not know the chasteness of this actor, and the improvement which he still continues to make, we should have doubted his success. He soon, however, placed that out of all doubt; and strongly reminded us of his brother, to whom only he is second in the character. Miss Dance's performance was received throughout with much applause, and the play announced for repetition amidst continued cheering.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—Mr. Matthews's new entertainments attract crowded houses every evening. The two first parts are said to have been written by Mr. James Smith, one of the authors of the 'Rejected Addresses,' and the last part, that of the Packet Boat, has been written and produced by Mr. R. Peake, jun. of the treasury (not in Whitehall, but) at this theatre.

M. ALEXANDRE.—We have hitherto omitted to notice M. Alexandre, the professor of ventriloquism, or vocal illusion, who, after astonishing the Duke and Duchess of Clarence and the world of fashion, at the Argyle Rooms, has been practising his illusion at the City of London Tavern, before the 'Lord Mayor and several distinguished personages.' This gentleman's ventriloquism, or we would rather call them shiquivocal talents, are, indeed, astonishing. He imitates old men and young maids, cats, dogs, and such 'small deer,' with astonishing precision; and he is able so to change his voice, as to make it appear at a considerable distance, or under circumstances of restraint. His conversation with a chimney-sweep, whose voice becomes weaker as he ascends the chimney, surpassed all the exhibitions of vocal illusion that we ever witnessed.

MISS MACAULEY.—This lady has commenced a course of theatrical entertainments, at the European Museum, King Street, St. James's, which has been recently fitted up as a theatre. The performances consist of recitations, serious and comic, of her own composition, and obtain much applause from fashionable and numerous audiences. Miss Macauley's excellence in tragic scenes has been long known to the public and generally admired,—and her comic talents may also be justly considered of the first class; but we are not disposed to pay the high eulogiums to her merits as a vocal performer so liberally bestowed upon her by the diurnal prints. We conceive it would be a great improvement in the evenings' amusement, were she to substitute for her songs her admirable readings.

We have received an account of a singular occurrence, that has excited considerable interest at Cadiz, and which does not appear to have attracted the attention of our journalists. Towards the end of December last, after a long succession of stormy weather, which had strewed the coast with wrecks, the hull of a large vessel was discovered on shore in Catalina Bay, Port Mary's, without any pre-appearance of the approach of a vessel in that direction, or any indication of one having been recently lost. It was, at first, supposed, that the vessel might have foundered in the vicinity of the Bay, and had been driven in by the violence of the weather; but, on examining her, to the general surprise, she was ascertained to be one of the French ships of war sunk in the memorable battle of Trafalgar, so long back as the year 1805, and must, since the period of her immersion, have drifted beneath the sea, a distance of more than thirty miles.

THE LILIAN BRIDE, and other Poems. By BARTON WILFORD. Sold by Sherwood, Neely, and Jones, Paternoster Row, and all Booksellers.

The following Books are just published, by Sherwin & Co. 24, Paternoster Row.

1. In Monthly Parts, price 1s. each.

A NEW EDITION OF THE DRAMATIC WORKS OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE. The greatest care and attention have been and will be bestowed in correcting the press, and the most approved text, being that of JOHNSON, STEEVENS, and REED, strictly adhered to. In order to prevent the tedious and perplexing practice of referring to a Glossary at the end of the work, where difficult passages or obsolete words occur, their meaning is inserted in a note at the bottom of the page. By way of embellishment, a beautiful Portrait and Frontispiece, in the stroke style of engraving, will be given at the close of the work. The price will not exceed 10s. 6d.

THE POEMS OF SHAKESPEARE will be printed in the same form. Price 1s.

2. HUME and SMOLLETT'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND. The History of England, by DAVID HUME, Esq. with Dr. SMOLLETT'S Continuation to the end of the Reign of George the Second. The work is elegantly printed on the same plan as the Dramatic Works of Shakespeare. It will make about Twenty Parts, at One shilling each, being less than a Third of the cheapest edition now extant.

The great utility of a work like this is too obvious to need recommendation, and the cheap form in which it is now presented to the public, will render it accessible to every reader.

A CONTINUATION, from the end of George II. to the present Period, will be given, from the pen of an eminent Writer.

3. BEAUTIES OF THE POETS. This work is published every Fortnight in Numbers, Price Fourpence each. It will comprise the best productions of the most admired of the British Poets, and particularly those of Milton, Pope, Dryden, Thomson, Addison, Goldsmith, Johnson, Young, Cowper, Blair, Gray, Parnell, Swift, Stone, Keats, Colburn, Parry, Keble, Southey, Chatterton, Beckingham, Duncombe, Arncliffe, strong, Percy, Cotton, Lytton, Watts, Savage, Byron, Rogers, Walter Scott, Moore, &c. &c. It is elegantly printed on superfine wove paper, and each part is embellished with a beautiful engraving on wood, from designs by the first artists.

In the early Numbers are included, Goldsmith's Traveller and Deserted Village, John Gipsin, Blair's Grave, Pope's Essay on Man, Burns' Ode on the Saturday Night, Falconer's Shipwreck, &c. &c.

4. THE POOR WIDOW, a POEM. By the late William Woodward, Esq. of Stanton Hall, Derbyshire. Beautifully printed and embellished with an engraving on wood, price 1s. 6d.

In this simple and affecting little poem, the principles of morality and religion are carefully inculcated, while an interesting picture is drawn of rural life and English hospitality.

5. DON JUAN. THE FIRST and SECOND CANTOS of this celebrated work, reprinted verbatim from the quarto edition of Mr. Davison, published at a Guinea and a Half. 8vo. Price 4s.

6. LORD BYRON versus THE EDINBURGH REVIEWERS. The celebrated CRITIQUE from the Edinburgh Review, on Lord Byron's 'Horn of Idleness,' which occasioned the work entitled 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers,' 8vo. Price 3d.

7. A LETTER from WILLIAM LORD RUSSELL to WILLIAM LORD CAVENTISH, supposed to have been written the Evening before his Execution, July 30, 1683. By the Right Hon. G. Canning, M. P. Price 3s. The historical facts on which this admirable poetical production is founded, and the acknowledged talents of the Right Hon. Author, are such as to render it an mystery to much of those who feel an attachment to the principles of rational liberty, or who derive any gratification from the perusal of a fine piece of classical poetry. It is printed in the best style, upon superfine wove paper, and will form an excellent appendage to the Life of Lord Russell, and Letters of Lady Russell, recently published.

8. SATIRES, SONGS, and ODES. By the Right Hon. GEORGE CANNING, including 'New Morality,' his 'Odes to the Doctor,' the famous 'Oliaster Song,' &c. &c. Price 1s.

9. BUNYAN'S HOLY WAR, with Notes, by the Rev. GEO. BURDEN, and embellished with Eight highly finished Copper-plates, including a Portrait of the Author. This Edition of the Holy War will be published weekly, in Eight Numbers, 12mo. price 6d. each. It is by far the best edition of this celebrated work that has ever appeared.

10. PHILLIPS'S SPEECHES. These Speeches of Charles Phillips, Esq. the Celebrated Irish Orator; delivered,—1. At a Public Dinner given to Mr. Finlay, by the Roman Catholics of the Town and County of Sligo. 2. At an Aggregate Meeting of the Roman Catholics of Cork. 3. At a Public Dinner given to him by the Friends of Civil and Religious Liberty in Liverpool.

To which are added, the address of the Roman Catholics to the Princess of Wales; and the character of Napoleon Buonaparte.

London.—Published by J. Lister, 26, Strand, two doors from the British Museum, where the Editors are resident, and communications for the Editor (post paid) are to be addressed. Sold also by Smith, T. St. Paul's Churchyard; Park; and various Booksellers in London, Glasgow, and Edinburgh. Printed by Davidson, Old Bow Church Lane, Carey Street.

Review of New Books.

Letters to  on the Rev. W. L. Bowles' Strictures on the Life and Writings of Pope. By the Right Hon. Lord Byron. 8vo. pp. 55. London, 1821.

ENTERTAINING a very implicit faith in the truth of the adage, that "those who play at bowls must expect rubbers," and not being so adventurous as the noble Lord Byron, who declares, in the motto he has adopted, that he will "play at bowls with the sun and moon," we have felt very little interest in what is called the Pope and Bowles controversy, on which so much ink has already been spilt. The question in dispute is the morality of Pope, which Mr. Bowles has impeached: Now, as the works of the poet are sufficiently numerous and well known, to enable every reader to judge of their morality, and as his personal character can now be of very little consequence, we think the Bowles' controversy a very uninteresting, if not a silly one. Perhaps the second motto, which Lord Byron has selected from Old Mortality, will sufficiently explain the pertinacity with which the disputants on both sides have adhered to their opinions. "My mistress's aid, and she has rather forgotten herself in speaking to my leddy, that canna weel bide to be contradickit, (as I ken naebodie likes it, if they could help themselves.)"

While the disputants, not liking to be 'contradickit,' have nearly exhausted their own ingenuity and the patience of their readers, a new champion enters the lists in defence of Pope, in the person of Lord Byron. The reason of the noble lord interfering is, that his name has been frequently referred to by all the disputants, in consequence of some very caustic remarks on Mr. Bowles, in that admirable satire, "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers." As these remarks contain much of his lordship's opinion on Pope, and are referred to in the course of the letter, we quote such passages from the satire as relate to Mr. Bowles:—

"Hail Sympathy! thy soft idea brings
A thousand visions of a thousand things,
And shows, dissolved in thine own melting tears,
The maudlin prince of mournful solitaires,
And art not thou their prince, harmonious Bowles!"

Thou first great oracle of tender souls!
Whether in sighing winds thou seek'st relief,
Or consolation in a yellow leaf;
Whether thy muse most lamentably tells
What merry sounds proceed from Oxford bells,
Or still in bells delighting, finds a friend
In every chime that jingled from Ostend?
Ah! how much juster were thy muse's harp,
If to thy bells thou would'st add but a cup!
Delightful BOWLES! still blessing and still blest,

All love thy strain, but children like it best.
"Thine with gentle LITTLE's moral song,
To soothe the mania of the amorous throng!
With thee our nursery damsels shed their tears,
Ere Miss, as yet, completes her infant years;
But in her teens thy whining powers are vain;
She quits poor BOWLES, for LITTLE's purer strain."

Now to soft times thou scornest to confine
The lofty numbers of a harp like thine:
"Awake a louder and a loftier strain!"
Such as none heard before, or will again;
Where all discoveries jumbled from the flood,
Since first the leaky ark repos'd in mud,
By more or less, are sung in every book,
From Captain NOAH down to Captain Cook.
Nor this alone, but pausing on the road,
The bard sighs forth a gentle episode;
And gravely tells—attend, each beauteous Miss!
When first Madeira trembled to a kiss.
BOWLES! in thy memory, let this precept dwell,

Stick to thy sonnets, man! at least they sell.
But if some new-born whim or larger bribe Prompt thy crude brain, and claim thee for a scribe,
"If chance some bard, though once by dunces
feard,
Now, prone in dust, can only be rev'd;

* See Bowles's Sonnets, &c.—"Sonnet to Oxford," and "Stanzas on hearing the Bells of Oxford."

† "Awake a louder, &c. &c. is the first line in Bowles's Spirit of Discovery;" a very spirited and pretty dwarf epic. Among other exquisite lines, we have the following:—

"A kiss
stole on the list'ning silence, never yet Here heard; they trembled even as if the power," &c. &c.

‡ That is, the words of Madeira trembled to a kiss, very much astonished, as well they might be, at such a phenomenon.

§ The episode above alluded to, is the story of "Robert a Machin" and "Anna d'Arlet," a pair of constant lovers who performed the kiss above mentioned, that startled the woids of Madeira.

If Pope, whose fame and genius from the first have foil'd the best of critics, needs the worst, Do thou essay; each fault, each failing scan; The first of poets was, alas! but man! Rake from each ancient dunghill every pearl, Consult Lord Fanny, and confide in Curll; Let all the scandals of a former age Perch on thy pen and flutter o'er thy page; Affect a candour which thou canst not feel, Clothe envy in the garb of honest zeal; Write, as if St. John's soul could still inspire, And do from hate what Mallet did for hire. Oh! had'st thou liv'd in that congenial time, To rave with Dennis, and with Ralph to rhyme, Through'd with the rest around his living head, Not rais'd thy hoof against the lion dead, A meet reward had crown'd thy glorious gains, And limited thee to the Dunciad for thy pains!"

It appears, that at an interview Lord Byron had with Mr. Bowles, three years afterwards, in the house of "the last Argonaut of classic English poetry, and the Nestor of our inferior race of living poets," Mr. Rogers, Mr. Bowles complained of his lordship having said that he had made the woods of Madeira dance to a kiss. His lordship now makes the amiable honorable; and confesses he was wrong; but, after declaring his regret at the publication of English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, he says, "the part which I regret least is that which regards Mr. Bowles, with reference to Pope." His lordship's letter is often too personal, and not sufficiently argumentative; and we cannot but regret, that his fine powers should for a moment be abstracted from the service of the muses, to mix in the literary dispute of Mr. Bowles and Octavius Gilchrist. One rather long extract contains the gist of his lordship's pamphlet. Speaking of his satire, he says,—

"Whilst I was writing that publication, in 1807 and 1808, Mr. Hobhouse was desirous that I should express our mutual opinion of Pope, and of Mr. Bowles's edifications of his works. As I had completed my outline, and felt lazy, I requested that he would do so. He did it. His fourteen lines on Bowles's Pope are in the first edition of "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers;" and are quite as severe and much more poetical than my own in the second. On reprinting the work, as I put my name to it, I omitted Mr. Hobhouse's lines, and replaced them with my own, by which the work gained less than Mr. Bowles. I have stated this in the preface to the second edition. It is many years since I have read that poem; but the Quarterly Review, Mr. Octavius Gilchrist, and Mr. Bowles himself, have been so obliging as to refresh my memory, and that of the public. I am grieved to say, that in reading over those lines, I repent of their having so far fallen short of what I meant to express upon the subject of Bowles's edition of Pope's Works. Mr. Bowles says, that "Lord Byron knows he does not deserve this character." I know no such thing. I have met Mr. Bowles, occasionally, in the best society in London; he appeared to me an amiable, well-informed, and extremely able man. I desire nothing better than to dine in company with such a mannered man every day in the week; but of "his character" I know nothing personally; I can only speak to his manners, and these have my warmest approbation. But I never judge from manners, for I once had my pocket picked by the civilist gentleman I ever met with; and one of the mildest persons I ever saw, was Ali Pacha. Of Mr. Bowles's "character," I will not do him the injustice to judge from the edition of Pope, if he prepared it heedlessly; nor the justice, should it be otherwise, because I would neither become a literary executioner nor a personal one. Mr. Bowles the individual, and Mr. Bowles the editor, appear the two most opposite things imaginable:—

* See Bowles's late edition of Pope's works, for which he received £300; thus Mr. B. has experienced how much easier it is to point by the reputation of another, than to elevate his own."

"And he himself one — antithesis."

I won't say "vile," because it is harsh; nor "mistaken," because it has two syllables too many; but every one must fill up the blank as he pleases.

What I saw of Mr. Bowles, increased my surprise and regret that he should ever have lent his talents to such a task. If he had been a fool, there would have been some excuse for him; if he had been a needy or a bad man, his conduct would have been intelligible; but he is the opposite of all these,—and thinking and feeling as I do of Pope, to me the whole thing is unaccountable. However, I must call things by their right names. I cannot call his edition of Pope a "candid" work; and I still think that there is an affectation of that quality not only in those volumes, but in the pamphlets lately published:—

"Why yet he doth deny his prisoners."

Mr. Bowles says, that "he has seen passages in his letters to Martha Blount, which were never published by me, and I hope never will be by others; which are so gross as to imply the grossest licentiousness." Is this fair play? It may, or it may not be, that such passages exist; and that Pope, who was not a monk, although a catholic, may have occasionally sinned in word and deed with woman in his youth; but is this a sufficient ground for such a sweeping denunciation? Where is the unmarried Englishman of a certain rank of life, who (provided he has not taken orders) has not to reproach himself, between the ages of sixteen and thirty, with far more licentiousness than has ever been traced to Pope? Pope lived in the public eye from his youth upwards; he had all the dunces of his own time for his enemies, and, I am sorry to say, some who have not the apology of dulness for detraction, since his death; and yet to what do all their accumulated hints and charges amount?—to an equivocal liaison with Martha Blount, which might arise as much from his infirmities as from his passions: to a hopeless flirtation with Lady Mary W. Montagu; to a story of Cibber's! and to two or three coarse passages in his works. Who could come forth clearer from an invidious inquest on a life of fifty-six years? Why are we to be officiously reminded of such passages in his letters, provided that they exist. Is Mr. Bowles aware to what such rummaging among "letters" and "stories" might lead? I have myself seen a collection of letters of another eminent, nay, pre-eminent, deceased poet, so abominably gross, and elaborately coarse, that I do not believe that they could be paralleled in our language. What is more strange is, that some of these are couched as postscripts to his serious and sentimental letters, to which are tacked either a piece of prose, or some verses, of the most hyperbolic indecency. He himself says, that if "obscenity, (using a much commoner word) be the sin against the Holy Ghost, he most certainly cannot be saved." These letters are in existence, and have been seen by many besides myself; but would his editor have been "candid" in even alluding to them? Nothing would have even provoked me, an indifferent spectator, to allude to them, but this further attempt at the depreciation of Pope.

What should we say to an editor of Addison, who cited the following passage from Walpole's letters to George Montagu? "Dr. Young has published a new book, &c. Mr. Addison sent for the young Earl of Warwick, as he was dying, to show him in what peace a Christian could die; unluckily, he died of brandy: nothing makes a Christian die in peace like being maudlin! but don't say this in Gath where you are." Suppose the editor introduced it with this preface: "One circumstance is mentioned by Horace Walpole, which, if true, was indeed flagitious. Walpole informs Montagu that Addison sent for the young Earl of Warwick, when dying, to shew him in what peace a Christian could die; but, unluckily, he died drunk, &c. &c." Now, although there might occur on the subsequent, or on the same page, a faint show of disbelief, seasoned with the expression of "the same candour," (the same exactly as throughout the book,) I should say that this editor was either foolish or false to his trust; such a story ought not to have been admitted, except for one brief mark of crushing indignation, unless it were completely proved. Why the words "if true"—that "if" is not a peace-maker. Why talk of "Cibber's testimony" to his licentiousness? To what does this amount? that Pope, when very young, was once decoyed by some nobleman and the player, to a house of carnal recreation. Mr. Bowles was not always a clergyman; and when he was a very young man, he never seduced into as much? If I were in the humour for story-telling, and relating little anecdotes, I could tell a much better story of Mr. Bowles than Cibber's, upon much better authority, viz. that of Mr. Bowles himself. It was not related by him in my presence, but in that of a third person, whom Mr. Bowles names oftener than once in the course of his replies. This gentleman related it to me as a humorous and witty anecdote; and so it was, whatever its other characteristics might be. But should I, for a youthful frolic, brand Mr. Bowles with a "libertine sort of love," or with "licentiousness?" Is he less now a pious or a good man, for not having always been a priest? No such thing; I am willing to believe him a good man, almost as good a man as Pope, but no better.

The truth is, that in these days the grand "primum mobile" of England is cant; cant political, cant poetical, cant religious, cant moral; but always cant, multiplied through all the varieties of life. It is the fashion, and while it lasts, will be too powerful for those who can only exist by taking the tone of the times. I say cant, because it is a thing of words, without the smallest influence upon human actions; the English being no wiser, no better, and much poorer, and more divided amongst themselves, as well as far less moral, than they were before the prevalence of this verbal decorum. This hysterical horror of poor Pope's not very well ascertained, and never fully proved amours, (for even Cibber owns that he prevented the somewhat perilous adventure in which Pope was embarking,) sounds very virtuous in a controversial pamphlet; but all men of the world who know what life is, or at least what it was to them in their youth, must laugh at such a ludicrous foundation of the charge of "a libertine sort of love;" while the more serious will look upon those who bring forward such charges upon an insulated fact, as fanatics or hypocrites, perhaps both. The two are sometimes compounded in a happy mixture.

Mr. Octavius Gilchrist speaks rather irreverently of a "second tumbler of hot white-wine negus." What does he mean? Is there any harm in negus? or is it the worst for being hot? or does Mr. Bowles drink negus? I had a better opinion of him. I hoped that whatever wine he drank was neat; or at least, that like the ordinary in Jonathan Wild, "he preferred punch, the rather as there was nothing against it in Scripture." I should be sorry to believe that Mr. Bowles was fond of negro; it is such a "candid" liquor, so like a winy-washy compromise between the passion for wine and the propriety of water. But different writers have divers tastes. Judge Blackstone composed his "Commentaries," (he was a poet, too, in his youth,) with a bottle of port before him. Addison's conversation was not good for much till he had taken a similar dose. Perhaps the prescription of these two great men was not inferior to the very different one of a soi-disant poet of this day, who, after wandering amongst the hills, returns, goes to bed, and dictates his verses, being fed by a bystander with bread and butter during the operation.

In a defence of Mr. Campbell's 'Ship of the Line,' from an attack of Mr. Bowles, who asserts, that it derives all its poetry, not from 'art,' but from 'nature,' his lordship has the following beautiful passage:—

'I look upon myself as entitled to talk of naval matters, at least to poets;—with the exception of Walter Scott, Moore, and Southey, perhaps, who have been voyagers, I have exam more miles than all the rest of them together now living ever sailed, and have lived for months and months on ship board; and, during the whole period of my life abroad, have scarcely ever passed a month out of sight of the ocean; besides being brought up from two years till ten on the brink of it. I recollect, when anchored off Cape Sigeeum, in 1810, in an English frigate, a violent squall coming on, at sunset, so violent as to make us imagine that the ship would part cable, or drive from her anchorage. Mr. Hobhouse and myself, and some officers, had been up the Dardanelles to Abydos, and were just returned in time. The aspect of a storm in the Archipelago is as poetical as need be, the sea being particularly short, dashing, and dangerous, and the navigation intricate and broken by the isles and currents. Cape Sigeeum, the tumuli of the Troad, Lemnos, Tenedos, all added to the association of the time. But what seemed the most "poetical" of all at the moment, were the numbers, (about two hundred,) of Greek and Turkish craft, which were obliged to "cut and run" before the wind, from their unsafe anchorage, some for Tenedos, some for other isles, some for the main, and some it might be for eternity. The sight of these little scudding vessels, darting over the foam in the twilight, now appearing and now disappearing between the waves in the cloud of night, with their peculiarly white sails, (the Levant sails not being of "coarse canvas," but of white cotton), skimming along so quickly, but less safely than the sea-monsters which hovered over them; their evident distress, their reduction to fluttering specks in the distance, their crowded confusion, their littleness, as contending with the giant element, which made our stout forty-four's teak timbers, (she was built in India,) creak again; their aspect and their motion, all struck me as something far more "poetical" than the mere broad, hawling, shipless sea, and the sullen winds, could possibly have been without them.

'The Euxine is a noble sea to look upon, and the port of Constantinople the most beautiful of harbours, and yet I cannot but think that the twenty sail of the line, some of one hundred and forty guns, rendered it more "poetical" by day in the sun, and by night, perhaps, still more; for the Turks illuminate their vessels of war in a manner the most picturesque, and yet all this is artificial. As for the Euxine, I stood upon the Symplegades—I stood by the broken altar still exposed to the winds, upon one of them—I felt all the "poetry" of the situation, as I repeated the first lines of Medea; but would not that "poetry" have been heightened by the Argo? It was so even by the appearance of any merchant vessel arriving from Odessa.'

Mr. Bowles often compares Pope with Cowper. Lord Byron contrasts them with too much severity on the latter. After saying that 'Cowper is no poet,' and contrasting the translation of Homer by the two authors—poets, we must not call them both, it appears,—although few persons but his lordship will deny the title to Cowper, he proceeds:—

'And now that we have heard the Catholic reproached with envy, duplicity, licentiousness, avarice—what was the Calvinist? He attempted the most atrocious crimes in the Christian code, viz. suicide—and why? Because he was to be examined whether he was fit for an office which he seems to wish to have made a sinecure. His connexion with Mrs. Unwin was pure enough, for the old lady was devout, and he was deranged; but why, then, is the infirm and elderly Pope to be reproved for his connexion with Martha Blount; Cowper was the almoner of Mrs. Throgmorton; but Pope's charities were his own, and they were noble and extensive, far beyond his fortune's warrant. Pope was the tolerant yet steady adherent of the most bigoted of sects; and Cowper the most bigoted and despondent sectary that ever anticipated damnation to himself and others. Is this harsh? I know it is, and I do not assert it as my opinion of Cowper personally, but to show what might be said, with just as great an appearance of truth and candour, as all the odium which has been accumulated upon Pope in similar speculations. Cowper was a good man, and lived at a fortunate time for his works.'

His lordship is a much more enthusiastic admirer of Pope than we should have expected. He says,—

'The attempt of the poetical populace of the present day to obtain an ostracism against Pope, is as easily accounted for as the Athenian's shell against Arisides; they are tired of hearing him always called "the Just." They are also fighting for life? for if he maintains his station, they will reach their own, by falling. They have raised a mosque by the side of a Grecian temple, of the purest architecture; and, more barbarous than the barbarians from whose practice I have borrowed the figure, they are not contented with their own grotesque edifice, unless they destroy the prior and purely beautiful fabric which preceded, and which shames them and theirs for ever and ever. I shall betold, that amongst those I have been (or it may be, still am) conspicuous—true, and I am ashamed of it. I have been amongst the builders of this Babel, attended by a confusion of tongues, but never amongst the envious destroyers of the classic temple of our predecessor. I have loved and honoured the fame and name of that illustrious and unrivalled man, far more than my own paltry renown, and the trashy jingle of the crowd of "schools" and upstarts, who pretend to rival, or even surpass him. Sooner than a single leaf should be torn from his laurel, it were better that all which these men, and that I, as one of their set, have ever written, should—

'Line trunks, clothe spice, or, fluttering in a row, Beside the rails of Bedlam or Soho!"

'There are those who will believe this, and those who will not. You, sir, know how far I am sincere, and whether my opinion, not only in the short work intended for publication, and in private letters which can never be published, has or has not been the same. I look upon this as the declining age of English poetry; no regard for others, no selfish feeling, can prevent me from seeing this, and expressing the truth. There can be no worse sign for the taste of the time than the depreciation of Pope. It would be better to receive for proof Mr. Cobbett's rough but strong attack upon Shakespeare and Milton, than to allow this smooth and "candid" undermining of the reputation of the most perfect of our poets, and the purest of our moralists. Of his power in the passions, in description, in the mock heroic, I leave others to descant. I take him on his strong ground, as an ethical poet: in the former none excel; in the mock heroic and the ethical, none equal him; and, in my mind, the latter is the highest of all poetry, because it does that in verse, which the greatest of men have wished to accomplish in prose. If the essence of poetry must be a lie, throw it to the dogs, or banish it from your republic, as Plato would have done. He who can reconcile poetry with truth and wisdom, is the only true "poet" in its real sense, "the maker," "the creator"—why must this mean the "liar," the "feigner," the "tale teller?" A man may make and create better things than these.

'I shall not presume to say that Pope is as high a poet as Shakespeare and Milton, though his enemy, Warton, places him immediately under them. I would no more say this than I would assert in the mosque (once Saint Sophia's), that Socrates was a greater man than Mahomet. But if I say that he is very near them, it is no more than has been asserted of Burns, who is supposed—"To rival all but Shakespeare's name below."

'I say nothing against this opinion. But of what "order," according to the poetical aristocracy, are Burns's poems? There are his opus magnum, "Tam O'Shanter," a tale, the Cotter's Saturday Night, a descriptive sketch; some others in the same style; the rest are songs. So much for the rank of his productions; the rank of Burns is the very first of his art. Of Pope I have expressed my opinion elsewhere, as also of the effect which the present attempts at poetry have had upon our literature. If any great national or natural convulsion could or should overwhelm your country in such sort, as to sweep Great Britain from the kingdoms of the earth, and leave only that, after all the most living of human things, a dead language, to be studied and read, and imitated by the wise of future and far generations, upon foreign shores; if your literature should become the learning of mankind, divested of party cabals, temporary fashions, and national pride and prejudice; an Englishman, anxious that the posterity of strangers should know that there had been such a thing as a British epic and tragedy, might wish for the preservation of Shakespeare and Milton; but the surviving world would snatch Pope from the wreck, and let the rest sink with the people. He is the moral poet of all civilization; and as such, let us hope that he will one day be the national poet of mankind. He is the only poet that never shocks; the only poet whose faultlessness has been made his reproach. Cast your eye over his productions; consider their extent and contemplate their variety: pastoral, passion, mock heroic, translation, satire, ethics,—all excellent and often perfect. If his great charm be melody, how comes it that foreigners adore him even in their diluted translations?

Such a testimony as that of Lord Byron is not of slight value, but even it will fail in reconciling the disputants respecting Pope, for some of them would not be persuaded, though one arose from the dead. In conclusion, we must observe, that although there is much smartness and much truth in his lordship's letter; yet, that it will not add one iota to his literary reputation, which has been acquired by his poetical genius, and which must, by that alone, be maintained.

A Narrative of Travels in Northern Africa, in the Years 1818, 19, and 20, &c. &c. By Captain G. F. Lyon, R. N.

In our last, we left Captain Lyon and Mr. Ritchie preparing for the journey to Morzouk, which, in company with Mohammed el Mukni, they commenced on the 22nd of March, 1819. Nothing very particular occurred until the party arrived at Mourzouk, the capital of Fezzan, which they reached in thirty-nine days from the time of their departure from Tripoli. On entering the town, the soldiers ran up a very broad street, firing and shouting, whilst the women uttered their shrill cry. On passing a large open space before they reached the castle and walls surrounding it, they were saluted from two six pounders. Nothing could be more fortunate than their travelling with the Sultan, who had hitherto shown them every attention. They always partook of his meals when in the towns; and, on the journey, they appeared to have fared alike. The author, in the account of their progress, says,—

'Our travelling pace was a walk of the horses, which generally got considerably in advance of the camels. At noon, or about that time, if we could find a tree, we stopped under it? if not, we sat under the shadow of our horses. The Sultan was grand victualler, and generally produced a bag of bread or dates, or the remains of his dinner of the day before. Each one then had a portion, not sufficient to be called a dinner, but to break his fast; and after eating, and drinking a few mouthfuls of water, stretched himself out, and slept until the camels came up; the party then mounted and rode on. These rests were very refreshing to the men and horses; but the loaded camels never made any stop, neither did the poor Negroes, who, with their wives and even little children, plodded on the whole day, over a burning soil, sometimes for twenty, and often for sixteen hours, whenever want of water made a forced march necessary. Several of the smallest of the black children, though probably not more than four or five years of age, walked for many hours with great strength in the early part of the day, having but a few rags to cover them, and when unable to proceed further were put on the camels for the remainder of the day. One of our party, a poor old man, totally blind, arrived safe at Morzouk, from Tripoli. He had walked all the way over the rocks and plains, led by his wife, and was kept alive by the hope of once more hearing the voices of his countrymen.

'When we stopped for the night, it was generally so contrived that we should lie in some spot where bushes might be found for the camels to browse upon; but even though there might be no wood or herbage, a wadey was always preferred, as more sheltered. Our tents were pitched, if the ground was sufficiently soft to admit the pegs, and our bulwarks and chests so placed, as to form a shelter for those who had no tents; affording a bulwark against the wind and sand. The little resistance offered by any intervening objects to the winds of the desert, renders them very powerful, and the stillness of the night, in blowing weather, is particularly awful. The tents are no sooner pitched, than the camels are turned out to feed on the thin and scattered bushes, and parties go to collect wood; the horses are hobbled, watered from the skins, and then fed. Should there be no wood, camels' dung is an excellent substitute, as it burns like peat, and forms a very glowing fire. A hole is dug in the ground, and three stones so placed, as to support the little copper pot. Cuscusou, or Bazeen, is then prepared. The Sultaneses are no contemptible cooks, and they made, every evening, an excellent supper for their master. When no fire is to be had, zumeeta is prepared with water and oil, and so eaten. We usually managed, in an evening, to make a little coffee, of which Mukni always came and partook; and, as soon as he left the tent, his slaves and people generally succeeded him, wishing also to taste some.'

While at Morzouk, Mr. Ritchie and our author went to the Mosque, where they went through the religious ceremonies very well:—

'Morzouk is a walled town, containing about two thousand five hundred inhabitants, who are blacks, and who do not, like the Arabs, change their residence. The walls are of mud, having round buttresses, with loopholes for musketry, rudely built, but sufficiently strong to guard against attack: they are about fifteen feet in height, and at the bottom eight feet in thickness, tapering, as all walls in this country do, towards the top. The town has seven gates, four of which are built up in order to prevent the people escaping when they are required to pay their duties. A man is appointed by the Sultan to attend each of these gates, day and night, lest any slaves or merchandise should be smuggled into the town. The people, in building the walls and houses, fabricate a good substitute for stones, (which are not to be found in these parts), by forming clay into balls, which they dry in the sun, and use with mud as mortar; the walls are thus made very strong; and, as rain is unknown, durable also. The houses, with very few exceptions, are of one story, and those of the poorer sort receive all their light from the doors: these are so low, as to require stooping nearly double to enter them; but the large houses have a capacious outer door, which is sufficiently well contrived, considering the bad quality of the wood that composes them. Thick palm planks, of four or five inches in breadth, (for the size and manner of cutting a tree will not afford more,) have a square hole punched through them at the top and bottom, by which they are firmly wedged together, with thick palm sticks; wet thongs of camels' hide are then tied tightly over them, which, on drying, draw the planks more strongly and securely together. There are no hinges to the doors; but they turn on a pivot, formed on the last plank near the wall, which is always the largest on that account. The locks and keys are very large and heavy, and of curious construction. The houses are generally built in little narrow streets; but there are many open spaces, entirely void of buildings, and covered with sand, on which the camels of the traders remain.

There are several pools of stagnant salt water in Morzouk, which contribute to the summer fevers and agues, which are so prevalent. Mr. Ritchie and Captain Lyon were taken ill, their stock of money was all expended, and the Sultan's treacherous plans now began to be apparent. For six weeks they were without animal food, subsisting on a very scanty portion of corn and dates. All their professed friends forsook them when they discovered their poverty; for—

'Who to th' unfortunate will kind appear—
The wretched are unwelcome every where.'

Many parties of the Tuaurick tribes came with their slaves and goods to Morzouk, while our travellers were there. Captain Lyon says,—

'They are the finest race of men I ever saw; tall, straight, and hand-some, with a certain air of independence and pride, which is very imposing. They are generally white, that is to say, comparatively so; the dark brown of their complexions only being occasioned by the heat of the climate. Their arms or bodies, (where constantly covered), are as white as those of many Europeans. Their costume is very remarkable, and they cover their faces as high as the eyes, in the manner of women on the sea-coast. Their original motive for so doing is now forgotten; but they say it must be right, as it was the fashion of their forefathers. This covering extends as high as half way up the bridge of the nose, from whence it hangs down below the chin on the breast, much in the same way (but longer) as crape or lace is hung to a lady's half mask. This cloth is generally of blue glazed cotton; but yellow, red, white, and many other colours are worn according to taste, or the ability of the wearer to purchase them. The beard is kept close clipped, so as not to interfere with the covering which is tied behind; their red caps are generally very high, but some wear yellow or green ones, fitted close to the head: others have no caps at all, but leave their hair to grow, and plait it in long tresses. All wear turbans, which are never of any fixed colour: blue is the most common and cheap; but gaudy hues are preferred. A large loose shirt (having the sleeves the same size as the body), called Tobe, is the common dress; it is of cotton, generally blue or blue and white, and is of their own manufacture, although some wear those of Souidan, which are considered the best that are made. The merchants generally dress very gaudily while in the towns, wearing kaftans of bright red cloth, or very gay silk and cotton striped, which they procure from the Tripoline traders. A leather kaftan is also much worn, of their own manufacture, as are leather shirts of the skins of antelopes, very neatly sewed, and well prepared. Their trowsers are not made so full as those of the Moors, as they would in that case be much encumbered in riding their maherries: they rather resemble those called Cossack trowsers, and are made of cotton stuff, dark blue being the most common. Their sandals are the most elegant part of their dress, being made of black leather, with scarlet thongs to brace them to the feet. The ornamental needle-work on the inside of the sole is really admirable. They all wear a whip, hanging from the belt passed over the left shoulder by the right side. Their swords are straight and of great length, and they wield them with much ease and dexterity. From the left wrist is suspended a dagger, with the hilt towards the hand; it has a broad leather ring attached to the scabbard, and through this the hand is passed. No Tuaurick is ever seen without this appendage, and a light elegant spear, sometimes entirely of iron, inlaid with brass: others are of wood, but are also highly ornamented. These weapons are about six feet in length, and are thrown to a great distance. In making war, they have three longer and heavier spears, and a strong lance, which are fastened behind the saddle. A long gun is also generally carried; and these people are considered sure marksmen. They are, if possible, more superstitious than the natives of Fezzan; some of them being literally covered with charms against disorders and accidents, which they wear round their arms, legs, necks, across the breast, and, in fact, wherever they can find a place for them. Their spears and guns have also their due allowance, and in the folds of the turbans are always hidden a number of holy writings. Some wear large silver cases tied round the head, containing charms against the devil. Their language is the Berber, or original African tongue, still spoken in the mountains behind Tunis, in some parts of Morocco, and at Socka, where it is called Ertana. On a future occasion, I shall give a small vocabulary of it. They are very proud of the antiquity of their language, which some have told me was spoken by Noah, in preference to any other. They never kiss the hand as other Mohammedans do, not even that of the Sultan himself, but advance, and, taking the hand, shake it, and then retire, standing erect, and looking him full in the face—a striking contrast of manners to that of the natives of Fezzan. No people have more aversion to washing than the Tuaurick generally have; some, after having equipped themselves in a new suit of blue, become so stained for a time as to appear of the same complexion as their garments. Even in performing their necessary purifications, which require that a man should wash in a particular way before his prayers, they avoid water, and make use of sand. Many attempts were made by us to discover the reason why they kept themselves in such a dirty state; but, to all our inquiries, we obtained nearly the same answers: "God never intended that man should injure his health, if he could avoid it: water having been given to man to drink, and cook with, it does not agree with the skin of a Tuaurick, who always falls sick after much washing." There are some, however, who do wash, and ridicule the dirty ones; but these are comparatively few.'

Our travellers gained great reputation and skill in medicine, and they were consulted by the halt, the lame, and the blind. The Sultan's own women wore continually little bottles, for something to cause them to bear children, and their emissaries sometimes whispered, whether it was a boy or a girl that was desired:—

'Purgatives were always despised in comparison with emetics. The allowance, which would suffice for a strong European, took no effect with them; but when a double dose was given, it pleased so much, that many requests were made for "just such another dose as was given to such a one, which made him so sick that he almost died." The prevalent disorder, when a man wanted medicine for novelty's sake, was being "ill all over."'

The Arabs were not singular in this, for we suspect that there are many excellent patients in England, who can give no better an explanation of their complaints than that of being 'ill all over,' and devour medicine also with as much avidity.

The Arabs have a most contemptible opinion of the Negroes, and believe, most religiously, that they were only created for their service. When at Hoon, a boy asked our travellers, if they were not going to collect slaves, and was answered, that they looked on slavery with horror. At this he expressed great contempt, exclaiming, 'd—n their fathers, the asses,' a common oath among the people, what are they made for but to serve us? go then and take them, for they are Kafirs, and we cannot do without them.' When at Morzouk, a large kafflé of Arabs, Tripolines, and Tibboos, arrived from Bornou, with fourteen hundred slaves, mostly women, who were worn to skeletons by fatigue and hardships:—

'All the traders speak of slaves as farmers do of cattle. Those recently brought from the interior were fattening, in order that they might be able to go on to Tripoli, Benghazi, or Egypt: thus a distance of sixteen hundred or eighteen hundred miles is to be traversed, from the time these poor creatures are taken from their homes, before they can be settled; whilst in the interior they may, perhaps, be doomed to pass through the hands of eight or ten masters, who treat them well or ill, according to their pleasure. These devoted victims fondly hoping that each new purchaser may be the last, find, perhaps, that they have again to commence a journey equally long and dreary with the one they have just finished, under a burning sun, with new companions, but with the same miseries.

'The females are always considered as bearing fatigue much better than the males; perhaps, because their small allowance of food and water more easily suffices them. I have always observed that the men were more miserable in their appearance, and walked with more difficulty than the women.'

We pass over our author's conjectures as to the Niger, as they are not sufficiently explicit to entitle them to much reliance; nor are his opinions as to Mungo Park more satisfactory. We have, however, an interesting notice relating to Tombuctoo*, which is about ninety days' journey from Morzouk. These particulars were gathered by the author from the slaves and the slave merchants:—

'From the account given by mer-

* Robert Adams, the shipwrecked sailor, gives a more minute description of Tombuctoo; which Captain Lyon's account does not go far to confirm. Adams says,—'Tombuctoo is situated on a level plain, having a river about two hundred yards from the town, on the south-east side, named Le Mar Zerek. The town appeared to Adams to cover as much ground as Lisbon. He is unable to give any idea of the number of its inhabitants; but, as the houses are not built in streets, or with any regularity, its population, compared with that of European towns, is by no means in proportion to its size. It has no walls, nor any thing resembling fortification. The houses are square, built of sticks, clay, and grass, with flat roofs of the same materials. The rooms are all on the same ground, and are without any articles of furniture, except earthen jars, wooden bowls, and mats made of grass, upon which the people sleep. He did not observe any houses, or any other buildings, constructed of stone.'—REV.

chants, it appears that it is not so large a town as has been imagined; and, indeed, some agree in saying, that it is not more extensive than Morzouk. It is walled; the houses are very low, and, with the exception of one or two small streets, are built irregularly. Huts of mats seem to be in greater numbers than the houses.

'The merchants to whom I suggested the idea, generally agreed with me, that the immense population which is said to exist there, may be thus accounted for. Many of the kaffles from Morocco, Ghadams, Tripoli, and the Negro States along the banks of the Nil, are obliged to remain there during the rainy season, or until their goods are sold. During their stay, they find it necessary to build huts or houses, to shelter themselves and their merchandise. These buildings are got up in a few days; and thus, perhaps, ten or fifteen thousand inhabitants may, in the course of a month, be added to the population, which occasions Tombuctoo to be thought an immense town by those who are only there at the same time as other strangers; but when the causes which detain the travellers cease, the place appears (what in reality it is said to be) insignificant. Thus it is that the accounts of it differ so much.

'Kabra, which is its port, is situated south of it about twelve miles, and a person on foot may easily walk to and return from it in a day. It is, more properly, a collection of store-houses than a town; the few people residing there being employed to take care of the cargoes of vessels. Large boats from Jenne come and unload at this place. The river, called Goulbi, or Nil (the former name is Soudan, merely a generic term for all waters, and by no means applicable to the Niger alone), is here very broad, and flows slowly past from the westward. Many people agree in saying, that in the dry season, a camel may pass over it without swimming; but after the rains, it becomes very deep, rapid, and dangerous.

'Tombuctoo is governed by a King, or Sultan, who has but little power. The people are all blacks, and dress like the natives of many parts of Soudan; the better class in shirts and trousers, while the poorer order are nearly naked. Gold, cotton clothes, leather, and arms, are the principal manufactures of Tombuctoo and the surrounding villages.'

'The King of Tombuctoo is an old man, named Kaoo, which, I believe, means governor or master; his wife is an old woman, and he has many concubines. The Sultanship is hereditary.—Tombuctoo is distant from Downa, a large town or district on the banks of the Nil, one day and a half east. Arowan is north of the city seven days, and is a place of consequence. Ezawen is east twenty days, and is also a large town. Taudenny, from whence the large kaffles, who bring rock salt, come annually, is twenty-four days north of Tombuctoo. Telemsei, which is twelve days north of the latter, or indeed half-way to Taudenny, is remarkable for a desert, having no water for ten days; thence, called Asheria, Mahrook is three days north of this place, ten days south of Taudenny, seven days east of Arowan, and eighteen days south of Awief, in Tuat.

'Sala is a place three days from Tombuctoo, on the Nil to the eastward.

'The Nil, Goulbi, Joliba, or Kattagum, runs from Tombuctoo, through Melli, in the country of the Fellata; thence to Kebbi, which is three days north of Noody; past this place or country, it runs to Yaowri, which is seven days east; from thence to Fendah, a Fellata country, S. W. of Kashna, which latter kingdom it passes at thirteen days south of the capital. It again makes its appearance at Kattagum, four days W. S. W. of the capital of Bornou, where it runs into a lake, called the Tsadi. Beyond this lake, a large river runs through Baghermee, and is called the Gambarro and Kamalakoo; the word Nil being also used for the same stream.—Thus far are we able to trace the Nil, and all other accounts are merely conjectural. All agree, however, that by one route or other, these waters join the great Nile of Egypt, to the southward of Dongola.'

Of the females of Soudan and Bornou, our author gives the following account:—

'The women of Soudan are much famed for their singing. They accompany themselves on a little instrument made of a gourd, with a skin stretched over it like a drum, having a handle and one string, which is played by a bow made with horse-hair. This instrument is called erbab. Their other instruments are drums, bagpipes, rattle cymbals, and a long gourd called Zantoo, which has a hole at each end, and is beaten against the calf of the leg, and stopped quickly by the hand.

'The women of Bornou have not so many attractions as those of Soudan. They are neither so handsome, well formed, clean, nor good-tempered; and, in consequence, the slaves from the latter country bring much higher prices. The costume of the women of both these places is very remarkable, particularly in the manner of dressing their hair: those of Soudan stretching it over a high pad raised like a helmet, and the Bornou girls plaiting it in some instances close to the head, and in others, letting it hang down like little bobbins. They wear a large shirt of cotton, or striped silk, and a wrapper in the form of a petticoat, called zench. Their silver ear-rings, bracelets, and anklets, form a very pretty contrast with their jetty skins. In their own countries they wear no shirts, but a long wrapper tied over the breasts and under the arms.'

The soirées of the natives of Morzouk (we beg our fashionable readers parlour for applying this favourite phrase to an assembly of Arabs) afforded our author some little recreation :—

‘The people who formed these parties were generally of the lower class, although I once detected amongst them the religious old Kadi himself, in a state very far from sober, and listening to a woman playing the erbab : but I found, by occasionally mixing with them, that I became better acquainted with their language and customs, which I knew would be of essential advantage as I proceeded southward. I also acquired many friends who, as far as their power extended, were of much assistance to me. Mohammed descended to join in the dances, becoming always very much intoxicated, and I frequently remained the only sober person amongst them ; so that I was able to make observations, and to be much amused by my companions. As on all these occasions we were with closed doors, in an open court, the women placed to us on the erbab, and really produced a very pleasing, though a wild melody : their songs were pretty and plaintive, and generally in the Soudan language, which is very musical.

‘At some of our parties, a woman sang a song, which she said was much admired by the brother of the last Sultan, whose name was Sidi Montezor ; and from certain expressions in it, I discovered that it was the same mentioned by Horneiman ; and, what was singular enough, it was sung by the same woman : she recollected Wat-traveler, as having often been at the castle when she performed there. Some of these songs abound with poetical images ;—for example, a lover will compare his mistress to a young date just ripened ; the jetty hue of her skin, to the wing of a raven ; her teeth to pearls ; her eyes to the sun ; and her breath to the atar of roses ; her words to musk ; her voice to the erbab ; and her kisses to honey, or the sugar brought from Egypt. The Arab songs are also very pretty, and generally in the same style. A young man once took much pains to teach me one ; composed, as he said, by a relation of his own. He sang it, as is the Arab custom, in a voice low and monotonous, though far from disagreeable. The hero of the piece is one of the Waled Suliman ; he is riding to see a girl whom he admires, but who belongs to another tribe.—As nearly as I can recollect, the words ran thus :—

‘Here I am, well mounted, on a horse whose ears are like pens, who runs like an antelope, and knows none but his master. My new red cap becomes me well ; my sword is sharp, my pistols well cleaned, and my belt shines in the sun. As the heat of a pigeon beats when she finds she is robbed of her young, so will my love’s heart beat when she sees me. She will not allow the dog to bark, and she will leave the tent as if in search of wood. Should her kinsmen see her with me, she shall not fall under their displeasure. I will lift her on my horse, and fly with her ; for my steed has ears like pens, he runs like an antelope, and knows none but his master. My new tagia becomes me well ; my sword is sharp, my pistols clean, and my belt shines in the sun.”

‘The natives have a variety of dances, of which two or three are peculiar to the country. The parties assemble on the sands, in the dusk of the evening, when a number of young men and women range themselves side by side, and dance to the sound of drums, to which they keep very good time. The men have a rude kind of iron cymbal in each hand, which opens and shuts : this they beat in the manner of castanets ; both sexes singing at the same time in chorus. The movements consist in stepping forward, the whole line at once, at a particular turn of the tune, as if to catch something with their two hands, which they hold out ; they balance themselves a short time on the advanced foot, and then step back, turning half round, first to one side and then the other. The whole line then moves slowly, in a circle, round the musicians who form the centre, and who all join in the dance.

‘There is nothing improper or immodest in this exhibition ; but, on the contrary, from its slowness and the regularity of its movements, it is extremely pleasing and elegant. Another dance is performed by women only, who form a circle round the drummers, and occasionally sing a lively chorus ; one advances, and with her arms extended, foots it to and from the drummers, two or three times, until a change of tune, when she runs quickly backwards, and falls flat down. The women behind are ready to receive her, and by a jerk of their arms, throw her again upright ; on which, she once more turns round, and resumes her place, leaving the one next in succession to her to go through the same movements, all of which are performed in the most just time ; the whole party occasionally enlivening the music, by their shrill and extraordinary cry of joy. The dancing in the houses is not quite so pleasing as that in public, and as for decency it is quite out of the question ; no man or woman standing up, unless to throw themselves into a variety of indelicate postures. The male slaves have many dances, in which great activity and exertion are requisite. One consists in dancing in a circle, each man armed with a stick ; they all move, first half and then quite round, striking, as they turn, the sticks of those on each side of them, and then jumping off the ground as high as they can. Another is performed by boys, and they have no drum, but keep chorus, by singing in a particular manner, La ilah il’Alla. “There is no God but God.”

Mr. Ritchie, who had scarcely enjoyed a day’s good health during the journey, died on the 20th of November :—

‘Belford, as well as he was able, hastened to form a rough coffin out of our chests ; and a sad and painful task it was. The washers of the dead came to us to perform their melancholy office, and Mr. Ritchie’s body was washed, perfumed, and rubbed with camphor ; and I procured some white linen, with which the grave-clothes were made. During our preparations for the burial, the women, who are always hired to cry at the death of persons whose friends are able to pay them, proposed to perform that disgusting office in our house ; but I would not allow it, and very unceremoniously shut the door against them. While I was out of sight, either our servant or some of our officious visitors stole several of our effects, and I clearly saw that we were now considered as lawful plunder. The coffin being completed, I hired men to carry it with ropes, but one of them having suddenly gone away, poor Belford was obliged to take his place ; and then, attended by our small party of Mamalukes, we proceeded at a quick pace to the grave, at about ten o’clock. The clay below the sand was white, which was considered as a good omen ; and Belford and myself threw the first earth into the grave. During the night we had, unknown to the people, read our Protestant burial service over the body ; and now publicly recited the first chapter of the Koran, which the most serious Christian would consider as a beautiful and applicable prayer on such an occasion.

‘Having thus performed the last sad duties to our unfortunate friend, we returned home to pass a day of misery. It was necessary to distribute food to the poor who surrounded our door in great numbers, and we had no money even to purchase a morsel for ourselves ; Yusuf’s kindness again having supplied our wants, and I succeeded in getting the house a little more quiet. Within an hour after the funeral had taken place, a courier arrived from Tripoli, bringing a truly welcome letter, announcing that a further allowance of £1000 had been made by our government towards the expense of the mission. Had this letter reached us a little sooner, many of our troubles and distresses would have been prevented.’

(To be concluded in our next.)

The Fall of the Crescent ; the Buccanier ; and other Poems. By S. R. Jackson. 12mo. pp. 123. London, 1821.

We have, on a former occasion, spoken very favourably of Mr. Jackson’s talents, and the little volume before us confirms us in the good opinion we then expressed. ‘The Fall of the Crescent,’ which is the principal poem, celebrates a gallant naval achievement during the late war, when his majesty's ship, the Sea-horse, encountered a Turkish frigate, of a superior force, and a corvette: after a severe engagement, in which the frigate lost upwards of three hundred men, she struck to the British flag, and the corvette was sunk. The progress of the action is very distinctly narrated in the poem, and due praise is given to the enemy, who appears to have fought with great gallantry. The feelings of the parties, on the eve of the engagement, are very naturally portrayed:

'All ready! all prepar'd they stand,
A crew, collected, dauntless band.
It was in truth a noble sight,
To view the fire advance to fight:
In silent splendour on they glide,
Their bows the yielding surge divide.
On their white sails the moon-beams fell,
As soft they rose in easy swell
To court the welcome wind,
And, sparkling with her silver light,
In many a merry circle bright,
The waters roll behind.
Say, Muse, what daring chieftain led
These vessels o'er the wat'ry bed,
With England's sons to fight?
All the Arab 'tis, I ween,
Whose form on yonder deck is seen,
Whose sabre gleams so bright:
But brighter than his gleaming blade,
From beneath his bow's appalling shade,
His eye-balls glare, in wrath array'd,
Terrific to the sight.
But, see! on yonder deck that group,
With bosoms shivering fear,
Their souls indignant scorn to stop,
Though Death, grim Death appear.
Mark, how their leader's eyes flash fire!
What glee's around, what desire,
Is pictur'd in his face!
Above his fam'd compeers in war
He stands, the hope, the guiding star,
The first in danger's place.
A silence awful as the tomb,
A stillness dread, a painful gloom,
Reign'd round the scene; through every breath
A chilling sadness ran:
Each seaman felt his heart oppress'd,
Ere yet the fight began.
View yonder youth, of British race;
What animation glows thy face!
In those blue eyes, that, glancing bright,
Gleam through the dark'ning cloud of night!
Glorious his bosom's thoughts employ:
For that delusive charm,
He sacrificed his youthful joys,
His home and kindred warm.
Yet blame him not, ye fearful few,
Who with alarm the ocean view;
For noble was his choice:
And base must be the frigid heart,
That trembling dares not take a part.
When call'd by Honour's voice.
But ye, who with the truly brave
Have war'd upon the briny wave,
Ye, whose proud souls have often known
The thro', which those can feel alone,
Whose bosoms, fir'd by valour's flame,
Unceasing glow with rage for fame—
'Tis you can tell how sad the mind,
Perchance when, on a sun-cor'd bed,
In painful wild suspension held,
And wist fond wish the heart has swell'd;

And well ye know, how soon 'tis o'er,
When first begins the cannon's roar:
Scarcely does the thick'ning smoke ascend,
Ere home, love, kindred, bosom-friend,
All vanish, scatter'd in the air,
And mingle with the breezes there.'

The description of the battle is written with great spirit, and we suspect the author to be a son of Neptune as well as a child of the muses. We quote the concluding passages of the poem:—

'Ne'er did the page of horror trace
Such slaughter in so short a space:
The Moslem's deck was cover'd o'er
With shatter'd limbs, and floods of gore;
And 'mid their guns the wounded lay,
Breathing in pain their souls away,
The wreck, that o'er her broadside hung,
Stall to the wounded rigging clung;
All, all, was in confusion thrown—
The stern chase guns were left alone.
Thus lay they, till the morning's glow
Ting'd with its red the wave below:
It rose not, as it late arose,
E'er met in fight these gallant foes,
In cheerfulness array'd.
Far different prospect now appears,
Far different aspect now wears:
Where gentle Peace sat smiling round,
Stern Desolation now is found,
Casting o'er all her shade;
While ruthless Death, with heart of steel,
Laughs at the ill he cannot feel;
Roll'd in the smoky clouds, he rides,
And umpire o'er the scene presides;
Immature yet, unclad with gore,
His fleshless lips still thirst for more;
Down from his car he rolls his eyes,
Again the shouts of battle rise.
Down on the foe the Britons bear,
And all for fight again prepare.
The Turkish chief, with fury stung,
Forth from the deck in madness sprung,—
As through the gloom his piercing eye
Mark'd the proud foe advancing nigh,
The action to renew.
The remnant of his war-worn band
No more in dull inaction stand;
At once with dagger, pike, and brand,
All to their quarters flew.
Frowning in deadly state, he strode
O'er heaps of seamen steep'd in blood,
Smiting each laggard in his rage—
Nought could his spirit's wrath assuage.
Again the busy clang of war
O'er the white surge resounds afar.
He seem'd to view, the prince of air,
When sternly rallying in despair,
His rebel angel host:
Hard struggling 'gainst his wayward fate,
Buoy'd up by rage, revenge, and hate,
E'er yet the field was lost—
Ere yet, unknowing how to fear,
He felt the force of Michael's spear.
And when he found his hopes were vain
To animate his flagging train—
When every firm attempt had fail'd,
And valour's arm no more avail'd,
By unrelenting foes assail'd—
He he by the prophet swore,
No hand should haul the crescent down,
Till victory his efforts crown,
Or life should be no more.
But who the chance of war can tell?
Or who the will of heav'n can compel?
Awhile, in confidence array'd,
Man wields on high the conqu'ring blade;

Awhile, in softer scenes, he proves
The hour of bliss with her he loves;
Till, borne on Exultation's tide,
He gains the pinnacle of pride;
Then far away the vision flies,
And, 'midst his air-built schemes, he dies.
Like a mere log upon the wave,
His late trim vessel lay;
Vain were the efforts of the brave,
Upon that fatal day.

Hark, to that crash, that dying groan,—
That bitter sigh, that painful moan,
From many a Turkish breast,
As 'twas heard her stern the Briton less,
And from her bosom the death-globe flies,
With steady aim address'd!
They could no more—their hopes were vain;
In deep despair the Moslem train
Haul'd their fam'd crescent down.
Where now, proud chief, 't' thy haughty boat,
Thy vaunted conquest—all is lost.
Where now is thy renown?
Then cease'd the fight—and o'er the sea
The smoky columns lay;
In silence, 'neath the vessel's lee,
They wing their length'ning way,
Till, wafing by the breezes light,
They vanish slowly from the sight.
The cannon's sound, the carnage o'er,
Their ready boats the victors lower,
And joyful board the well-earn'd prize,
And safe at anchor lie,
Till Luna from the wave arise,
And evening gilds the sky.'

'The Buccanier' is written to portray the feelings of a proud spirit under many and severe afflictions, and the author has succeeded in the task. The 'Stanzas on the Fate of the Poets,' describe, with much feeling, the miseries that are too often the concomitant of true genius. The following epitaph on Burns, records the poet's fame and his country's reproach:—

'And thou, too, Caledonia's pride,
What crime was thine, that those Who o'er thy gentle number's sigh'd,
Deem'd lightly of thy woes;
Nor lent a fast'ning hand to save
Her brightest minstrel from the grave,
But let thine eye-lids close
In pangs of long-enduring pain,
Where the soul pineth, but in vain.'

The tribute to Falconer we think extremely happy:—

'Yet, ere this mournful theme we leave,
To ocean's fearless son
A moment give. 'Twas his to weave
The song that glory won:
While o'er the deep, with falcon wing,
And sides so gay and glist'ning,
Her course his vessel run,
He little thought the tale he drew
Would ask his blood to stamp it true.'

The minor pieces, consisting of Sacred Melodies, Elegiac Stanzas, &c. are some of them very pretty; they are, however, more distinguished by a chasteness of style than a vigour of sentiment. The author will do well to continue to court the muses, with whom he appears already to be a favourite.

The Favourite of Nature. A Tale.
3 vols. 12mo. London, 1821

THE heroine of this tale is Eliza Rivers, an orphan, a young lady of great beauty and accomplishments, and possessed of many excellent virtues; but impatient of restraint and a victim to very ardent feelings and affections. When about the age of nineteen, the period at which the tale commences, chance introduced to her acquaintance two young men of very different habits and passions, each of whom became enamoured of her. One of them, Mr. Waldegrave, was a man of fashion, in the most refined meaning of the phrase,—an elegant scholar and an accomplished gentleman, moving in the best society, and enjoying an enviable reputation for his gallantry and politeness; in short, he was the man of all others most likely to prove a successful suitor to Miss Rivers. His rival, Mr. Durand, was a young clergyman of great piety and considerable talents, fully equal in learning and taste to Mr. Waldegrave, but deficient in those little peculiarities which distinguish the man of fashion, and are so eminently calculated to steal on the female heart. Circumstances, however, happened to call Waldegrave from the country, and our heroine, though recollecting with the liveliest emotions, the delight she had felt in his society, was so sensible to the pure and superior attachment of his rival, and was so strongly influenced by the fervency of his intreaties and her own admiration of his virtues, that she became engaged to him. But scarcely had she pledged her faith before she regretted it. Waldegrave returned, and Eliza still felt the force of the passion she had conceived for him: she allowed herself to be led into his company, and the events of a few months induced her to break off her engagement with Durand. After this, the narrative assumes a very melancholy cast: Durand, who had always been sickly, was broken-hearted at hearing of Eliza's apostasy, and, after a short illness, dies. Waldegrave, though at first much attached to Eliza on account of her talent and vivacity, becomes tired of her on more intimate acquaintance, and, in the sequel, marries another, a friend of her's, and a subordinate personage in the tale. Our heroine sinks under this accumulation of unhappiness, and the work closes with a long and pathetic description of her death.

This, though a rapid sketch of the main incidents, embraces but a very limited number of the characters introduced in the work, the whole of which are sketched with much spirit and accuracy. We think, however, that the story, although certainly highly interesting and very well told, does not possess variety of incident sufficient for a work of three volumes; the plot moves on heavily, and there is too great a sameness in the minor incidents to reconcile us to the defect. The whole work is highly moral, and the nature of some of the characters has enabled the author to introduce a series of excellent reflections, which distinguish it very favourably from our ordinary stock of novels, and will introduce it into many circles where such productions are not generally read. As we wish to give a specimen of the author's style, we extract a description of a family groupe, with whom Eliza Rivers was on terms of acquaintance:—

‘Mr. Bartley was a man of independent fortune, acquired, like the independent fortunes of most of the gentry resident in provincial towns, either by the trading efforts of themselves, or their immediate predecessors. He was now, however, decidedly the first person in Belton; oftentimes serving the office of mayor, and always being a portly alderman. Few words may suffice to give a sketch of this worthy personage. At this period he had passed his seventieth year. As he did not marry till he was considerably turned of forty, he had the pleasant satisfaction of seeing himself in his old days surrounded by a family of young people, who, like the rest of their species, wanted to be merry when he wished to be grave; to make a noise when he liked to be quiet; to fill his house with company when he would have preferred going to bed; and dragged him to parties, and made him a beau in his dress, when he would have been more comfortable by his own fireside, in a flannel gown and night-cap.

‘But as he was a very good-humoured man, and of all things liked talking, or what is commonly called a praise, he endured his disquietudes with great composure; at all times satisfied if he could catch hold of any charitably disposed Christian, who would endure the martyrdom of being held by the button of his coat, whilst he recounted, and animated upon, the contents of the newspaper.

‘Mrs. Bartley was altogether a different sort of person. She was not to be made happy by talking, or by silence, or by any thing short of being, upon all occasions, of the greatest possible consequence to every body about her. If she could have made choice of any particular endowment for this purpose, she would have preferred the gift of beauty; both because it occasioned the least trouble, and also that, in her young days, it was considered, jointly with money, as the only possible recommendation a woman could possess. But she was, unluckily, extremely plain in her person, and had no more money than she wanted for her own use: hence she anticipated the forlorn prospect of passing her days in solitude and single blessedness, unless she had the good fortune to strike out for herself some kind of attraction. Neither beauty nor wealth being propitious, there yet remained a chance—she might be a bel esprit.

‘She was deficient, sure enough, in taste and talent, and wit and judgment, but she was not aware of those deficiencies; and, mistaking a shrewd sort of cunning for profound discernment, a great share of envy for a noble emulation, and a pert flippancy of remark for a spirit of brilliant wit, she fancied that she really was a very superior person.

‘After having literally scared half the country with her ill-natured sarcasms, and gained the reputation of being vastly clever, but vastly satirical, fate decided that she should pass a summer in the society of Mr. Bartley, at the house of a mutual relation.

‘It has often been remarked, that the little god of love is a very perverse deity, and, in driving people to their destiny, commonly makes it, either first or last, very different from what they had expected; and this was the case with poor Mr. Bartley. Forty years had he lived ungoverned, uncontradicted, contented, and happy. A bachelor he was, and a bachelor he would have continued, with all the pleasure in the world, had not the little god—but no, the little god had nothing to do with it; it was all Miss Hobson's doing, and nobody's else. She dropt insinuations of tenderness which approached very nearly to assurances, before they penetrated the guileless unsuspecting heart of Mr. Bartley; and, by dint of talking to him, and at him, and representing, in lively colours, the “forlorn estate of a poor old man in his last days, without either clerk or child to care for him, a prey to some greedy rapacious housekeeper, or some wild, worthless, thankless, graceless nephew, who would very likely dance upon his grave the night he was buried,” she worked upon his feelings to such an excess, that, partly believing her statement, and supposing that the surest means of allaying her apprehensions on his account was to marry, and to marry her—he brought himself to propose the fatal question. He had not long to wait for an answer; indeed, that had been prepared some weeks before he had any idea of calling for it at all. The offspring of this illustrious pair consisted of four daughters and a son. The young gentleman was at this time twenty-one, and the elder of the young ladies twenty years of age; or, in her mother's reading, eighteen. This little error in calculation was never corrected; for, as Mrs. Bartley had three more damsels to dispose of, she wisely considered that it would better facilitate their prospects to bring them out one at a time; and, like a good financier, always keep a stock in hand of an odd year or two, which plan would be sure to turn to account if they came to the doubtful era of five-and-twenty, without any establishment, either in possession or reversion.

"Though the three younger ladies, (the youngest turned sixteen,) would very often steal out to take a walk without her protection; and, with the assistance of an occasional present, slyly made by "pa," dress much snarlier than was at all agreeable to "ma;" yet, upon the whole, she manoeuvred vastly well; and, as no body cared any thing about their age, her complaints of the difficulty of "knowing what to do with girls who were too tall and womanly for the nursery, and much too young to be introduced into company," &c. &c. generally commiserated with great politeness, and heard with due indifference.

"The son was a little gentleman in his person, but not of the less consequence on that account. In the eyes of his family, he was considered as a sort of phenomenon; and having had the advantage of a three years' run at one of the universities, he was now returned home with the usual stock of intelligence which is generally brought away from those "seminaries of sound learning and religious improvement." In the interim of waiting for a living, which his father intended purchasing for him, he passed his time in making puns and making love; astonishing the ladies with the quickness and diversity of his wit, and provoking the gentlemen with the matchless extent of his impudence. And, but that he was really very good-natured, it being the fortunate fate of Mrs. Bartley's children to inherit that golden gift from their father, it is possible that his jests, however divested, as they certainly were, of all malice, and springing merely from the necessity he felt of pushing himself into notice, would not always have been fortunate enough to pass off with mere contempt.

"For the character of the daughter but few words will be necessary. "Harriet is eighteen," Mrs. Bartley would frequently observe; "it is high time, therefore, to pater on the back," she would say, and "give her a shove, and send her in the world, to see whether she finds any more shining than herself. But that diffidence, that silly want of dependence on herself, will, I fear, be her stumbling-block through life."

"With the consciousness of mediocrity, which frustrated her mother's intentions that she should be striking and impressive, poor Harriet felt the conviction that she never should fulfil the expectations of superiority which were continually excited on her account.

"But the faintest refusal to be called into notice, roused her mother's well-known irritable temper to such violence, that, yielding through fear, she gradually endeavoured to assert her own dignity, and to make herself somebody in the eyes of the world.

"The great Lord Bacon, in one of his essays, has these words,—"Wonderful is the case of boldness in civil business: What first?—Boldness.—What second and third?—Boldness."

"Without having read, or, perhaps, heard of Lord Bacon, Mrs. Bartley instinctively made his maxim the rule and guide of her life; possessing, in an eminent degree, that decided confidence in her own powers, which Lord Bacon, in more simple language, denominates boldness; and, as it is the peculiar property of the quality his lordship alludes to, to occasion the proprietor of it no inconvenience, however it may stand in the way of other people, she had reaped such substantial benefit from the possession of it, that she was authorised with some justice to recommend it fervently to the use of her daughter. The young lady herself, finding that, in the ordinary run of society in a provincial town, it is not very difficult to raise a name for acquirements, particularly with the assistance of Lord Bacon's specific, did not eventually shrink from doing what she could to confirm to the multitude that she was, as her mother assured them, in spite of her excessive timidity, a girl of first-rate talents and endowments.

This extract is made without any selection, except as to its being more easily detached from the tale, and complete in itself. The work is dedicated to Mrs. Joanna Baillie, by her permission, and this, with most of our readers, will be a strong recommendation.

(Concluded from p. 167.)

WE continue our extracts from this highly curious and interesting work. The two first are letters from Pergami

To the Marquis Ghisilieri.

Naples, 25th Dec.

"It is from the bed of sickness I write to you, to relate to you a horrid event, which will, no doubt, influence the rest of my life.

"A fortnight since, having received the Princess of Wales's orders, I was met in the hall of attendance by King Joachim: to stop, recognize, and interrogate, was for him one and the same act. "You are a brave fellow," said he, "I have seen you do more than your duty, I will recommend you to the Princess." I bowed and retired.

"I was invited to a hunting party, and returning home dreadfully fatigued, I asked for a glass of wine; the butler was absent,—the cloth was laid for the Princess, and the wine served; one of the servants poured me out a glass, and I drank it hastily to quench my thirst, and another, instantly after: I had introduced death into my stomach,—I soon felt the effects of a strong poison,—my face turned pale,—my knees sunk under me, and I was carried senseless to my room.

"The Princess learning the cause, sent Dr. Holland, who declared I was poisoned; the Princess bestowed on me the most generous cares; counter-poisons were administered, and, after forty-eight hours of horrible suffering, black blood, mixed with fetid matter, issued from every aperture of my body; I fell into a cold sweat, my eyes opened, and I breathed again.

"King Joachim had, according to his kind promise, related to the Princess some actions of my life, which, doubtless, awoke a greater interest in my favour; and he ordered his physician, Dr. Paibold, to attend me.

"The Princess felt aware that the poison was intended for her; she had seen, at Naples, Lieut B., who she knew was connected with the D*s, and she did not hesitate to express her conviction that the poisoning sprang from that source.

Letter to the Marquis de Ghisilieri, at Milan.

Athens, 17 May, 1815.

"Marquis,—I know your taste for Grecian antiquities, and your profound knowledge in numismatics; thus, travelling over the country of Pericles, Alcibiades, and Themistocles, I collected a few rare objects, which I have taken the liberty of sending you. I have formed two collections: the first is destined for you, my generous protector; the second is for my family.

"You will, therefore, receive with this a cassette, inclosing some objects which are regarded as curious by the learned, at the head of whom I place the French consul at Athens, M. Fauvel; deign to accept this too feeble homage as a tribute of my gratitude, and be persuaded that I never can feel sufficiently able to testify it. Amongst those objects, you will find the faithful imprint of a medal, representing a great city, called Pergamo, on the reverse of which is found, with all their attributes and character, the arms of my family; nothing, certainly, is more extraordinary, how many men in my place, proud of a similar discovery, would fancy themselves descended from another Dardanus, and thus attribute to themselves a royal origin; I, more modest, or perhaps more reasonable, doubt and examine; I should like to tear the veil that covers past ages, not from personal pride, but the love of science and truth, remount to the foundation of a city of which there scarcely exists a trace of ruins, and whose power is passed like the glory of conquerors.

"However it may be, Marquis, the medal I possess bears the stamp of the most remote antiquity, and its authenticity is acknowledged by the Greek antiquaries; taking these data as bases, it would seem that we may safely conclude, 1. That there existed a Greek city called Pergamo; 2. That it was founded, according to ancient custom, by a chief or prince, called Pergami; 3. That I descended from this chief or prince, because the arms that have been from time immemorial in my family, are the same as those on the reverse of the medal. Yet I do not pretend to decide this grand question.

Deign to make some researches, and give me your opinion. I fear nothing so much as the ridicule that attaches to foolish pretensions, but why should I disavow such a noble origin, if it can be proved that it is really that of my family,

B. PERGAMI.

To the Advocate Codazzi, at Milan.

'May I intreat you, my dear friend, to dispose of the little draft inclosed in favour of a virtuous family, living at Bufalara; I can do without the trifle, and I know that the worthy commandant C., his wife, and three children, are in want. My heart bleeds at this cruel idea; you cannot tell the consolation I received in the bosom of this interesting family in a moment of difficulty, and it is delightful to me to be able to acquit a part of the debt I owe it.

'The Commandant C. is very proud, and I should wish my offering to be made him by a friendly hand,—the respectable Curate of M. possesses his esteem, and seems to me the most proper person to induce him to accept, as a restitution, the trifle I send him.'

In various parts of these letters, constant allusion is made to repeated attempts on the life of the Princess; these, we confess, make us incline to fancy, that, though this work be original, yet that the whole of it has been written since the Queen's trial; for the letters appear entirely adapted to the evidence given in the affairs of Baron Ompteda; this is more manifest than in any other part, and though we are fully aware that his Majesty kept a sharp look out after the actions of his cara sposa, yet we repel with indignation, as we are sure every Englishman will, the insinuation that he wished her assassination. We are unable to examine the facts to be able to refute them, but we profess ourselves firmly to believe in their non-existence.

SOMEBODY.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—I am that unfortunate being named 'Somebody,' upon whom the world consider they are entitled to lay the blame of their misconduct or misfortunes; it is a very common circumstance for me to hear persons exclaim,—'I have been robbed of my watch! Somebody must have stolen it.'—'Somebody's dead!'—'Somebody has been buried.'—'Somebody has been hung!' If any thing be lost or mislaid—'Oh! Somebody must have taken it, that's certain.' A few days since, two gentlemen met upon an affair of honour, which was occasioned by one of the party having been told, that the other had spoken disrespectfully of a certain female friend, at a fashionable watering-place; the seconds, as is usual, interfering, by way of making some arrangement, came to the following conclusion:—'That it was very evident, upon investigation, that no such words had been spoken by the gentleman present, but that "Somebody" had set the rumour afloat, to create mischief.' In short, Mr. Editor, I am suspected of saying things I never thought of, charged with committing crimes at places I never heard of,—and why? I know not. My family is most ancient, my connexions respectable and numerous, being related to 'Every-body' by my father's side; indeed, I may say on both sides, for my mother was a Somebody.

I appeal to you, Mr. Editor, for protection, hoping (should you favour me by inserting this memorial in the Literary Chronicle), that some portion of your readers, who hitherto have been my persecutors, will consider my case worthy of commiseration, and refrain transferring the blame from the real offenders to me; I hope this the rather, as I often solace the adventurer in the lottery, with the idea, that 'Somebody' must gain the prize of 20,000l. and why may his not be the lucky number. Again, at the commencement of a war or the falling of the stocks, it is a consideration that 'Somebody' must be a gainer; thus I do a great many actions for the benefit of mankind, who are unmindful of my endeavours to serve them. Under these circumstances, I have been induced to submit my sufferings to your perusal, and remain,

Sir, your most respectfully,

POPISH MIRACLES.

AMONG the studies to which my father was most hobbyhorisically inclined, (if I may use a Shandean expression,) the pretended miracles of the Romish church held a distinguished place. He had collected all the histories and treatises of all the learned fathers and others upon this most important topic, and had, in process of time, made a voluminous arrangement of all that was most curious and edifying on the subject, under various heads and classifications, including a methodical list of the popish relics, known to exist in different parts of the world. I am far from inferring from all this, however, that my father had become an apo-the to popish abominations, or even that he was an implicit believer in all the mummeries he had thus compiled; Gal forbid I should charge his memory with so gross a slander. But, as it was said by a celebrated Roman, 'Amicus Plato, amicus Socrates, sed magis amica veritas,' so must I in conscience declare, that, however I may revere the fame of my father, Cadwalader Von Mucklewit, and, however I may admire the profundity of his erudition, I must still have a more holy regard to that veracity which belongs to the dignified character of an historian. Therefore it is that I confess, not without some feelings of regret, that my lamented progenitor was more credulous than I could wish on this point, and had actually resolved to publish a serious historical dissertation on the aforesaid miracles, for which purpose he had made the collection already described.

Death, however, which put an end to so many of my poor father's projects, defeated this also; and, accordingly, his 'Dissertation on Miracles' was found among the opera interrupta of his laborious life. For some years after his decease, I had indulged the hope of being able to complete what he had thus left unfinished; but the gradual increase of philosophical knowledge through this enlightened country, made it, at length, extremely problematical, whether the work would ever become popular. Accordingly, I never thought it worth my while to make an offer of the MS. to any of those accoucheurs in literature, vulgarly called publishers, who so humanely assist in relieving a labouring author of his progeny, and take it afterwards under their own fostering care,—though a friend, who is rather knowing in these matters, has assured me, that I might have some chance in Dublin of making a good bargain. But, as I have no wish at this moment to take a trip over the channel for the mere chance of squeezing a few pounds out of an Irish bookseller, I have come to the determination of publishing my work in my own way,—that is, by offering some occasional extracts from the immense body of lore which my father had heaped together on this subject. To a few of these, therefore, my present paper shall be devoted; and my kind and courteous reader will, I am sure, pardon me, if I should not, on this occasion, pay that strict attention to the lucidus ordo, which Horace holds to be indispensable to an epic poem, but which, I do not think, he would ever have dreamt of prescribing to a treatise on Popish Miracles, even if it had been his good fortune to be born a monk instead of a poet.

Of all the saints in the Romish Calendar, none, it seems, stood in higher repute, as an enactor of miracles, than St. Martin, who flourished at the beginning of the fifth century. His life has been written by Sulpicius Severus and Gregory of Tours, both of whom ascribe divers wonderful exploits to the holy father, and in which they place implicit belief. Sulpicius, at least, who was his contemporary and disciple, seems to have had a full persuasion of his master's preternatural and divine qualities; for he declares, that he saw him ascend to heaven some time before he had heard of his death. Having no desire, however, to break a lance with Sulpicius, as to his veracity on this point, I shall now select two or three of St. Martin's miracles, as he has recorded them.

There was a place, it appears, near Tours, where some martyrs were traditionally reported to have been buried, in consequence of which, one of the Bishops of Tours had caused an altar to be erected on the spot, though neither the names of the martyrs, nor the time of their martyrdom, were known. St. Martin, who, on this account, had some doubts of the fact, and was desirous of discountenancing what he considered religious imposture, with respect to these martyrs, repaired, with a few attendants, to the altar, and made a solemn appeal to Heaven, beseeching that it might be disclosed to him whose remains were there buried. 'Immediately on turning aside,' quoth his biographer, whose words I shall now translate literally, 'he saw, on his left hand, an ill-clad ghost, of a wild aspect; he bids him tell his name, and what he had done. The ghost tells his name, confesses his crime, and says he is the ghost of a robber, who had been beheaded for his offences, and that the people, being deluded, honoured him as a martyr, though he had nothing common with the martyrs, who enjoyed the glory of heaven, whilst he was in sufferings. What is surprising is, that those who were present, heard a voice, but saw nobody. St. Martin having reported what he had seen, caused the altar to be removed, and thus delivered the people from their superstition.' Notwithstanding the grave importance of this instance here recorded, the saint appears to have been, on some occasions, of a very jocular turn, and to have exercised his supernatural faculty for the diversion of the spectators. Several anecdotes of his good-humoured condescension in this respect, are narrated by Sulpicius, from which I shall extract the two following. On one occasion, he accidentally met some countrymen, bearing a corpse to the grave, and thinking it, no doubt, a seasonable opportunity to make a little mirth, he suddenly caused the party to stop. Upon their attempt, however, to pursue their journey, they were unable to move one step forward, but all turned round like so many statues, dancing upon a pivot. How St. Martin acted after this entertaining specimen of his wonder-working talents, we are not informed; but it cannot be doubted that he left the mourners and the corpse to shift for themselves, enjoying the pleasant joke he had played on them. At another time, he was solicited to free an unfortunate demoniac from his inward tormentor. The Devil, on St. Martin's arrival, earnestly intreated to be allowed to depart through the demoniac's mouth; the jest-loving saint, however, would listen to no terms, but obliged his unfortunate suppliant to make a hasty exit au-dérrière, to the no small amusement and gratification of the spectators.

In addition to the particular miracles recorded by Sulpicius, he observes, generally, that this 'great saint' held frequent converse with angels, whom he also heard discourse amongst themselves on many occasions. He does not appear, however, to have been on the same intimate footing with his infernal majesty, who was, on the contrary, wont to torment St. Martin, under various disguises, though, as Sulpicius affirms, (if such partial testimony may be credited,) the holy man always came victorious out of the contest.

It may be collected from various authorities, that miracles abounded most during the fourth and fifth centuries, though it must not be concealed, on the other hand, that St. Chrysostom, who flourished within that period, flatly denies this, and says, in plain terms, that nobody wrought miracles in his time; nay, he even goes so far as to assert, that no one was sufficiently versed in the art, to understand the common juggle of casting out devils. And, in his 'treatise concerning the Christian priesthood,' he observes, that 'St. Paul had a faculty much more excellent than that of speaking; his presence was enough to frighten away devils. But, if all the Christians of our time should meet together, they could not do so much with all their prayers and tears as St. Paul's handkerchief did.' Now, with all due deference to St. Chrysostom, I cannot help thinking, (especially when we have the example of St. Martin, his contemporary, before our eyes,) that he was actuated by some jealousy in making this observation, because he was not, like his brother saint, gifted with this enviable faculty.

After the period of which I have been speaking, miracles appear to have grown somewhat out of vogue, save that the practice of exorcising by means of holy water was common through many centuries. Even so late as the reign of Edward VI. Bishop Gardiner wrote a treatise in defence of it, wherein he cites many instances of its miraculous virtues. Other miracles were also occasionally wrought; and those of St. Anthony, who lived in the thirteenth century, and whom his epitaph entitles the 'most powerful worker of miracles,' are well known, particularly his celebrated sermon to a congregation of fish, at Padua, of which Addison, in his travels, has given a translation. The sermon itself, to be sure, was no miracle; but the most sceptical in these matters must admit, that the pious behaviour of the finny audience at its conclusion, partook of a preternatural character. And the history, which every one at Padua reads with most religious devotion, adds, that several heretics were converted on the spot, as well they might be, by this signal instance of St. Anthony's power.

It is now time that I should bring my paper to a close; but I design, on some future occasion, to return to the subject, with respect to which many interesting and edifying particulars remain to be extracted from among the treasures of my FAMILY TRUNK.

*The Principal Performers of the Theatres
Royal Drury Lane & Covent Garden.*

No. XVI.—MR. COOPER.

'Tis not enough the voice be sound and clear,—
'Tis modulation that must charm the ear;
For none emphatic can that actor call,
Who lays an equal emphasis on all.'—LLOYD.

LIVERPOOL has been extremely liberal to us this season, in surrendering its two best and most favourite tragic actors to our winter theatres. Of Mr. Cooper, it is our wish to think highly, as we feel well persuaded that he possesses no ordinary share of genius; but one glaring error we must take the liberty of noticing; we allude to his unnatural mode of recitation, and the frequent impropriety of his emphasis. Had not his Romeo been disfigured by two or three of these blemishes, and a few other badly contracted provincial habits, we should really prefer it to the admirable representation of Mr. C. Kemble. It was chaste, vigorous, feeling, tender, and abounding in fervent expression. The meeting with Juliet in the garden was replete with excellence; the memorable scene with the friar, in which he learns his doom, was admirably acted; and the contest with Paris was good; indeed, the whole of the last act is entitled to the warmest possible eulogy.

We should imagine that Mr. Cooper has spent much of his time in the study of declamation. He has, confessedly, formed himself on the models of the Kembles and Mr. Young; of this, his Othello will bear sufficiently strong testifications. The address to the senate was given with fine declamatory skill; his performance in the scene where Iago first excites his suspicion, was greatly applauded; it certainly was a fine exhibition of the gradual progress of jealousy, developing itself by internal writhing agony and marked variety of countenance. He gave 'O! now for ever farewell the tranquil mind,' &c., with considerable force and feeling, and the beautiful speech 'Had it pleased Heaven to try me with affliction, in a subdued tone, in which energy and pathos were exquisitely blended. But his best effort was the last; indeed we have never heard the concluding passage of the play delivered with more deep and intense feeling, or more striking effect.

He made a good deal of the feminine hero Alonzo, and conceived the character of Marc Antony extremely well; but his badly-modulated, and strangely untractable voice frequently destroyed the effect of some of the scenes, and rendered the emphasis miserably incorrect. For instance, he metamorphosed the celebrated panegyric on Brutus, 'This was a man,' into 'this was a man,' thus making it a mere matter of fact; we likewise remarked two or three other gross improprieties of the same nature, which lessened, in a great degree, the merit of the performance.—He makes as much as possible of Richmond, though the character requires no very great share of genius, and is certainly unworthy of him.

We confess we are not enamoured of his performance of Arsenio, in the tragedy of 'Conscience'; there is, however, this excuse to be made, that old characters are not his forte;—still he was sometimes effective. He is easy and gentlemanly in Joseph Surface, but he has not the elegant air, or the smooth tongue and insidious demeanour of the courtly hypocrite.

We were about to compare his Edgar with that of the late Mr. Rae, but we desist;—'de mortuis, nil nisi bonum.' 'He is gone, and our idolatrous fancy must sanctify his relics.'

It is impossible to conceive, that the character of Carwin, in Thérèse, could be played more finely than it is by Mr. Cooper: he looks it to the life, and performs it imitatively; his short and pithy replies to Picard have great effect; his attitude, when Thérèse first meets his view, is very fine, and the scowl of contemptuous defiance which he darts on the Count de Morville is perfectly demoniacal. His interview with Thérèse in the cottage is excellently played; his agitation and his vain attempts to check the 'inward monitor,' conscience, are admirably described; his soliloquy, previous to the commencement of the judicial process, his dread of public exposure, and gradual self-composure, in recollecting that no person could by any chance be acquainted with his guilt, and the whole of the trial scene, merit the warmest eulogy. His reply to Fontaine, on being urged to touch the corpse of his supposed victim, the convulsive agony which shakes his whole frame, on beholding what he imagines the spectre of Theresé, and the death, are all as fine as it is possible to imagine; indeed they are beyond all praise.

We could wish to see this gentleman more frequently, as he is certainly an actor of much promise; but 'the great lessee' takes care to keep all performers, excepting those of the operatic department, completely in the back ground. Mr. Cooper, however, has cause to be thankful for this, as it gives him time to amend his articulation, and to bring his inharmonious voice into better condition. We would, however, wish to address a word or two to the proprietor of Drury Lane: if his tragic company is so miserably bad (though, for our own parts, we are not inclined to think so very meanly of it) that he is ashamed to bring it forward, why throw his inimitable company of comedians into shade; the public, it is true, have given strong proofs how highly they esteem the musical talent of the theatre by nightly flocking in crowds to it, but the ardour is already abating, and we really do not see why we are to have operas crammed down our throats night after night without any intermission; let Mr. Elliston take this hint as it is meant, and profit by it; for he may rest assured, that if he proceed in his present course, the public will soon be satiated 'usque ad nauseam.'

VERSES

TO THE MEMORY OF

JOHN KEATS, THE POET.

Who died at Rome, 23 Feb. 1821. Æt. 25.

'O drop the briny tear with me!'—CHATTERTON.

If many kings and senators had died,
My heart could not have given mine eyes a tide
So strong and deep as that which drowns my breath,

Departed spirit of Keats! to bathe thy death!
Like an ethereal mistle, born for love—

To give a forest of the joys above,

O! thou wert wondrous in thy gentle youth,
Giving delicious songs in lovely truth!

Nature thy guide—Simplicity thy aim,
Thou sang'st thy passage to the heaven of fame.

Like White, thy hollow'd ecstasies were zoned,
Celestial for the beauty which they toned;

Terrestrial ears were charm'd to hear thee sing,
And drank thy music from thy bells and spring.

Erewhile the fleeting pageantries of earth
Inspire Laureates to give Vision birth,

Thou, on the blossoms of thine own sweet leaves,
'Born with the very sign that silence heaves,'

Hast soon ascended to receive thy crown
Of fadeless joys eternal and renew.

Not like the mermaid that enchants the sea,
Then leaves the tar in hopeless destiny;

Not like the lark that goes to heavenly skies
And comes to earth again and songless dies;
Nor like the bird of night in thorns, that sings
To silent moonlight, form'd by shadow's wings;
Nor yet the cuckoo heralding the air
To love's companionship the lives that bear—

—Though in the worm's own mansion for mankind, Though risen to rest, thy works are left behind,—

These transcripts of thy fancy and thy heart,
With life will live, immortal as thou art!
The flatting and the vain will drop unwept,
And millions sleep with those who've centuries asleep;

Ages will roll and empires sink to dust—
Ruins be traceless, though by victory nurs'd,—
But thy descriptive and pathetic page
Shall yield delight to each succeeding age,
Like thy lov'd Chaucer and thy Spenser, be Time's choice memorial to eternity!
Islington Green, March 26, 1821. P.

LINES TO TYRO.

Has Rosa's eye, of heavenly blue,
Lost then so soon its magic power;—
Or has she ceas'd to smile on you,
That now you own dark Lelia's power.

Can Lelia's eye, tho' black as jet,
And sparkling with electric wildness,
Charm like young Rosa's blue eye,—wet
With tears of sympathy and mildness?

But Rosa's eye, of liquid blue,
Like ether thro' a summer shower,
No tender glance bestow'd on you,
And now you bend to Lelia's power.

The eye of jet may strike with awe,
But blue the truest passions move;
And Nature's never erring law,
Says black is hatred,—blue is love!

ABRANTANZA.

LE GASCON EN RUSSIE.

CORTE.

CERTAIN gascon réduit à vivre d'industrie
Sans posséder un sol se trouvait en Russie.
Que faire, disait-il? en cette occasion?

Il ne me reste plus que mon accent gascon.
Pour en tirer parti, voici comme il raisonne:
La Neva de tout temps fut loin de la Garonne,
Et les docteurs fourrés dont le russe fait cas
Ne distingueraient point l'accent de Pézénas;
Nul ne connaît ici notre langue gasconne;
Je puis donc hardiment plutôt qu'être un varien

Donner en ce pays leçon d'italien.
Il dit: et son accent plut assez dans la ville,
Il eut des écoliers d'humeur assez docile,
Et qui dans quelque temps, ils étaient au moins dix.

Prononçant assez bien Cadibènes et Sandis.
Le gascon triomphait, mais un revers baigna
Comportant un moment un succès assez rare.
Un avocat Toscan, un érudit fameux,
Vint chercher à son tour la fortune en Russie.
Tout rempli des trésors de l'antique Ausonie,
Il répétait partout des vers mélodieux,
Et portait avec lui la fleur de l'Italie.

Le Tasse, l'Arioste, à ses accords touchans,
Du tendre Métastase on retrouvait les chants;
Et la langue Toscane, en sa bouche Romaine, Avait ce charme heureux dont la douceur entraîne.

Grand Dieu! s'écria-t-il en voyant son rival:
O Russes! réprimez ce désordre fatal!
Cet homme vous égare et n'a que de l'audace.
Il traduit en gascon tous les vers du Tasse.

Ecoutez un Romain, et par lui vous saurez
Les poèmes fameux qui nous ont illustrés.
Laisant à son rival le poids de sa science,
Le gascon plus adroit fit mainte révérence.
On s'assemble, on écrit, un jury disputa,
Et sur l'italien le gascon l'emporta.

PARODY.

On! slumber, my darling, beside thy warm bed,
Thy mother is watching, she pillows thy head;
Didst thou know in her breast what anxiety has,

Thou'st dost close, in a moment, those innocent
eyes.

Oh! rest thee babe, rest thee babe, sleep on till
day.

Thy mother is mournful, thy father away.
Oh close those soft eyelids in slumber, my dear,
That sleep will be wanting thou spurnest at here—

The light hours of youth, soon, too soon, will be gone,

And the dark years of sorrow too quickly come on.

Then, rest thee babe, rest thee babe, sleep while you may—

Your mother is mournful, your father away.

SAM SPYRAL.

STANZAS TO —.

A LAY to thee—lay to thee,—
For earthly care, wild revelry,
And worthless joys which should not be,
Have weaned my thoughts a while from thee.

And yet I never knew such care—
Though many pangs 'tis mine to bear,—
I never felt such misery
As when bereft, dear one! of thee!

Nor in the gay and gallant crowd
Where fears are few, and joy is loud,
May there be sought so dear to me
As loved and lonely thoughts of thee.

And as for joys—the weak and vain
May prize what boundless riches gain—
Let me, to cheer my poverty,
Have treasured thoughts of thine and thee!

I love, at night's unroll'd hour,
To seek our melancholy bower,
And in each little floweret see
Something that only speaks of thee.

Nor love I less to view the scene
Which oft in happier hours has been
A spot of pure and heartfelt glee,
When love and pleasure dwelt with thee!

From thee the true and tender-hearted,
Dark and drear the hour which parted
Him, who whatever else he be,
Is fond and faithful still to thee.

O, in that hour the pangs I knew,
Were neither trifling ones nor few,
But yet it was a bliss to me,
To feel that they were shared with thee.

Thy tears fell fast—the accents faltered,
Which said thy love should be unaltered,
And whoso'er thy wanderings be,
I cannot choose, but think on thee!

In spite of all that I have borne
From hollow friendship—open scorn—
In spite of fate's unkind decree,
I still am blest with thoughts of thee!

Of the few joys with which I'm blest—
That I prize most and love the best,
Is the unfading memory
Of hours which I have spent with thee.

Amid the thoughts to ruin shaken—
Amid the wreck of hopes forsaken—
'Mid grief and gloom, 'tis sweet to see
A cheering, changeless light in there!

I would not give, for warrior's glory—
I would not give, to live in story,
'Mid pomp and pride and blazonry,
My last and lightest thought of thee!

For I am sad and lonely—thou Art all that Fate has left me now!

And I can rise 'bove misery
While I am left the thought of thee!

The Drama.

THE managers of the winter theatres are likely soon to render the office of a dramatic critic a sinecure, by the monotony of the performances. The most ardent admirer of music must now, we think get satiated; for tragedy and comedy are holding a 'Lenten fast,' and opera alone predominates. 'If music be the public wish,' as the poet says it is the 'food of love,' we beg the managers to 'play on'; but if there is any truth in the assertion, that 'Est natura hominum novitatis avida,' then we think the managers will not only consult the public taste, but, ultimately, their own interest, in diversifying their entertainments. Our friend, Mr. Pary, has already alluded to this subject in another part of this journal, and we fully agree with him in the opinions he has expressed. The manager of Drury Lane always goes to extremes. When he had Mr. Kean, he gave us nothing but tragedy, except the comedy of Wild Oats, which, out of the eighteen or twenty nights that it was played in one season, did not draw above two or three tolerable houses. Now tragedy is abandoned, for very good reasons;—his excellent company of comedians are shelved, except that we sometimes get a glance at one or two of them in a farce, or, perhaps, in some characters not well suited to them; and all this to force operas perpetually upon us, and that, too, in Lent, when two nights of the week are always devoted to oratorios.

All that we have to say of the theatres this week, may be comprised in a very few words: Miss Dance has repeated the character of Mrs. Haller, at Covent Garden, and with increased success. The Duenna has been also successfully repeated at Drury Lane; and the Oratorios at both houses have been very well attended. Some of the Royal Dukes have visited the theatres during the week. We are glad to see royalty thus dispensing its patronage to the drama.

Literature and Science.

Mr. Dufief's system of teaching languages, continues to make rapid progress. In Dublin, where it has been lately introduced, the young gentlemen taught on the plan, have given proofs of its value in acting some French plays at a public exhibition. Some scenes from Voltaire's La Mort de César, and Moliere's Le Bourgeois gentilhomme, were selected for the occasion, 'and these,' says the editor of the Freeman's Journal, 'were delivered in a pure accent, and delighted every body. It would seem, indeed, as if nothing but a powerful method of teaching, such as that of Mr. Dufief could have produced similar effects.'

The fine ostrich, at the Royal Menagerie of Paris, killed itself the other day, in attempting to swallow a piece of glass; it weighed upwards of 220 lbs. a part of it was dressed, which was delicious, and afforded a great treat to the epicures; it tasted very much like black venison and had upwards of 20 lbs. of fat surrounding the intestines.

The Bee.

'Floriferis at apex in salubris omnia limant;
Omnia nos itidem depascimur aures dicta.'

LUCRETIVS.

The Duke of Orleans, when regent, asked a stranger the characteristics of different nations, through which he had travelled. The best method of acquainting your R. H. with their character, (said the stranger) is to tell you the first question generally asked in each country.—At the first sight of a traveller, in Spain, they say, 'is that a grandee of the first order?' In Holland, 'is that a rich man?' In France, 'is he a courtier?' In England, 'who is that man?'

In an old poem on the Lord Mayor's Day, the writer, describing the gentlemen who walked in procession, says, they were—

'Like snails on a cabbage leaf crawling along;
Admird by their wives, and huzz'd by the throng.'

Abuse of the English Language.—A blacksmith, in the vicinity of Maidstone, lately made out a bill against one of his customers, in which a charge was intended to be made for steeling two mattocks; that is, putting steel to the iron points of the implements. But the son of Vulcan, who had been more accustomed to wielding a sledge hammer than studying Dr. Johnson, actually wrote the following item.—
'To stealing two mad ducks,'—2s.

*Advertisement stuck up at Charleston, Carolina, by a German, who had lost his horse:—*He is run away agen, mine little black horse, I rite him two tags en midle de nite, and ven he not will see shumting, he shumps as if te tivel vas int, an he trows me down. I have had sich fall since pefore I vast porrit. I buy him top on Jacob Shintel Clymer: he hav five vite feet pefore, mit von plack snip on his nose, von eye will look pluck, like glass. He is pranded mit John Keister, on his behind side, py his tail.—Whoever will take up de said horse, an bring him to me, top on mine house, near Congarce, shall pay me two tollars reward, an if dey will not bring me mine horse agen, I will put de law in force ginst all de peoples.

In the advertisement announcing the appearance of Kemble and Lewis at Dublin, in Leon and the Copper Captain, some years ago, there was the following passage:—'They never before performed together in the same piece, and in all human probability they never will again: this evening is the summit of the manager's climax. He has constantly gone higher and higher in his endeavours to delight the public; beyond this it is not in nature to go.'

The corporation of London, it is said, once wrote to a former Duke of Marlborough, to know the name of the doctor who prescribed to his grace to eat often in the day; for the purpose of appointing him physician to the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council.

A Hoax.—The inhabitants of a French town (Villers Cotterets), were finely tricked lately. A serjeant-major of a disbanded regiment was brought to the hospital of the place, afflicted with a palpitation of the heart. He then pretended to be overcome with grief at having been born a Protestant, and expressed an ardent desire to be made a Catholic. The good people of the town ran in crowds to see the convert. The priests prayed for him, and after his recovery he was publicly baptised. On the following day (Sunday), he went to church and formally abjured the Protestant religion. The pious Catholics were delighted; dinners were given on the occasion; and, on the 17th, a grand fête was appointed. The convert, however, turned; the company went in haste to fetch him, but he had decamped, taking with him a considerable sum, which he had borrowed from the credulous fools who had fallen dupes to his pretended conversion.

Reviews of New Books.

2 vols. 8vo. pp. 806. London, 1821.

WHILE we view with pleasure the collected works of Mr. Sheridan, whose splendid talents were the ornament of his age and country, we regret very much that circumstances have prevented the editor, Mr. Thomas Moore, whose name need only be mentioned to give great value to his labours, from publishing, at the same time, the life of this great man, as had been announced. The very reasons for this delay increase our regret, as they have their origin in the half-voluntary, half-constrained absence of the bard of Erin from this country. The works now published, are limited to the dramatic productions of Mr. Sheridan, and they are unaccompanied by a single critical remark or observation; nothing further from the editor appearing, than an advertisement, apologizing to the public for sending forth the works without the life of the author, by which they were to have been accompanied. After noticing his absence from this country as the chief cause of delay, as it prevents him from an intercourse with the witnesses of Mr. Sheridan's career, and excludes him from those facilities of information which his most eminent contemporaries would have afforded, Mr. Moore hints at the difficulty in writing a political biography, where 'events yet recent, and persons yet alive, must be discussed and characterized with a degree of freedom, which investigation and reflection alone can justify.' The editor then has the following just remarks on Mr. Sheridan's character, and on biography generally:—

'In attempting, indeed, such a memorial of one who has but just disappeared from among us,—of whom all is remembered, both the evil and the good, and whose fame has not yet undergone that purifying process by which time removes such light and casual spots as may have fallen upon the shining names selected to adorn its annals—the biographer has a task of no common difficulty to perform.

Whatever advantages he may possess in the freshness and authenticity of his materials, derived either from personal knowledge or the many living sources to which he can refer, are heavily counterbalanced by that multitude of opinions and prejudices—still actively surviving the object of their variance—which he has to encounter and consult both in seeking and in speaking the truth. In many instances, too, he finds the memory, which he could wish to honour, (as Cicero found the tomb of Archimedes, "septem republiæ et dumetis,") beset with imputations which, however trifling, disfigure its grandeur, and which the hand of oblivion alone can gently and effectually clear away.

'There are also, perhaps, some further reasons why, in sketching the portraits of distinguished men, a biographer should not be too near his subjects. What he gains in minuteness and precision of detail, he may lose in the general effect of the whole; and, instead of that comprehensive delineation of character which entitles biography, even more than history, to be called "philosophy teaching by examples," his views may be limited, partial, and microscopic; he may dwell upon foibles till he becomes blind to virtues; and, in recording only the little-nesses of the great, he may resemble one who would give us a map of the narrow lanes and passages of Constantinople, instead of a splendid panorama of its seas, its temples, and its palaces.

'On the other hand, however, it is equally to be apprehended, that in endeavouring to generalize the features of character, or represent them in that softened light through which they will be seen at distance by posterity, too many of those small but precious lines, which mark the peculiarity of the individual, may be lost; and the picture want that air of reality, by which alone our sympathies can be awakened, or the love of fact, so natural to the human mind, be satisfied. This vagueness becomes, perhaps, still more objectionable, when it is assumed as the means of evading disagreeable truths; and when, like those painters who conceal their want of anatomical knowledge under fine superficial finish and abstract smoothness of form, the biographer timidly escapes from an analysis of conduct and of motives, into wide generalities of praise and misleading palliations of wrong. This charity to the dead, if carried too far, becomes injustice to the living; a sort of haze is thrown over the boundaries of error, and the world is defrauded of one half of that lesson—as useful at least in warning as encouraging—which the history of genius and its frailties bequeaths to mankind.'

In speaking of the dramatic works of Mr. Sheridan in these volumes, Mr. Moore pays the following well-merited tribute to his splendid talents:—

'After all, however, let the biographer do his duty as he may, it is in the volumes which are here presented to the world, and in the record, however imperfect, of his parliamentary exertions, that the most durable memorials of Mr. Sheridan's name exist. By these he will be known in after-times, when all of him, but his genius and his patriotism, are forgotten; when alike the partiality, which would throw a veil over faults, and that depreciating spirit which judges of eminent men only by their defects, shall have yielded to the calm unerring estimate of posterity; and, as an orator, eloquent in the noblest of causes, as a statesman, steady in the most trying times, and as a dramatist, successful in every walk of his art, he will rank, perhaps, among the greatest that ever embellished any age or nation.'

It is impossible to advert to Mr. Sheridan as a dramatic writer, without being struck with the genius which he displayed, and the perfection which he attained at so early an age. The whole of his comic pieces were written before he reached his eight-and-twentieth year, and his excellent comedy of 'The Rivals,' when he was not more than three-and-twenty. His rapid career will be seen from the following list of his pieces, and the dates when they were produced. We must premise that Mr. Sheridan was born in October, 1651:—

'The Rivals': a Comedy, first performed at Covent Garden Theatre, 17th January, 1775.

'St. Patrick's Day': a Farce, ditto, ditto, November, 1775.

'The Duenna': a 'Comic Opera,' ditto, ditto, November 21, 1775.

'A Trip to Scarborough': a Comedy, first performed at Drury Lane Theatre, February 24, 1777.

'The School for Scandal': a Comedy, ditto, ditto, May 8, 1777.

'The Camp': a Musical Entertainment, October, 15, 1778.

'The Critic, October 30, 1779.
Pizarro, May 24, 1769.

Thus it will be seen, that in the short period of four years, Mr. Sheridan wrote three comedies, a comic opera, and three afterpieces. Of the merits of these works, it would now be almost idle to speak; they are among the most popular pieces on the stage even at the present day, and they will be read and admired as long as legitimate comedy is known in this country. That Mr. Sheridan was one of the first comic authors that ever adorned the English theatre, will, we think, be readily admitted. He possessed the comic humour and imitation of real character which distinguished Dryden and Wycherly, without their ribaldry; in brilliant similitudes and allusions, in action, in incident, and in all the great constituents of comic writing, he was equal to Congreve, but he never, like him, shocks by indelicacy. He had Farquhar's sprightliness, without his flippancy. To come to later times, Sheridan combined the correct and elegant taste of Murphy, with the skill of Cumberland in inculcating the connection between virtue and happiness, and the tendency of vice to misery. If there is any one dramatic writer in the English language, who combines the strongest and most brilliant wit with the chastest propriety; who displays the justest and most characterizing humour, without descending into grossness of idea or expression; who gives the comic force of the English character, and steers clear of its incidental improprieties—it is Richard Brinsley Sheridan.

Sheridan's maiden production, 'The Rivals,' experienced some slight disapprobation when first produced, which was attributed to Mr. Lee Lewin's imperfect conception of the character of Sir Lucius O'Trigger. Mr. Sheridan acknowledged his ignorance of the drama, in many respects, at this time, and says that, when he first submitted his play to Mr. Harris, it was double the length of a regular comedy. On the first night, however, he accurately observed the sentiments of the audience, and the parts which appeared objectionable, when he withdrew the piece for a time, and made such judicious alterations and corrections that it was soon after brought forward, and became, as it has since continued, a great favourite on the stage.

The greatest triumph of Mr. Sheridan was, however, the School for Scandal, a play, the appearance of which may be considered as an epoch in the history of English comedy. In point of plot, character, incident, dialogue, wit, and humour, it very far surpasses any production of modern times. The author faithfully copies nature and existing manners. None of his personages are artificial, but in every character and in every scene, we feel ourselves among our fellow men. The incidents rise out of the story; they advance in a most probable manner; and the catastrophe is such as must have arisen from such characters and circumstances in real life. Scandal, in its various sources and modes, is portrayed with the nicest discrimination and exactness; and its various shapes of sneer, lampoon, affected apology, and direct calumny, are admirably presented in the Members of the Scandal Club.

The comedy of A Trip to Scarborough is not original; it is altered from The Relapse of Sir John Vanburgh, by Mr. Sheridan, who has preserved and improved the humour, but left out the indelicacy. The performers being very imperfect in their parts, it was not well received the first night, but was afterwards played with much applause to crowded houses. Of the Duenna, we have already recorded our opinion in a notice of its performance at Drury Lane Theatre. The farce of St. Patrick's Day was written expressly for the purpose of serving an actor, at his benefit—a Mr. Clinch, who had acted the part of Sir Lucius O'Trigger, very much to the satisfaction of Mr. Sheridan and the public. We have been informed that this farce was written in forty-eight hours; nor is the assertion in the smallest degree improbable; the powers of such a man, if closely exerted, could, in a shorter time, produce a much more valuable performance. It, however, shows the versatility of the author's talents, by his success in broad farce as well as the most elegant comedy. The musical entertainment of The Camp was the first work in which Mr. Sheridan called in the aid of fine scenery. It contained a most perfect representation of the encampment at Coxheath; yet the drama itself possessed a still higher degree of merit: all the tricks, impositions, distresses, intrigues, manœuvres, &c. peculiar to a camp, were described in the dialogue, or exhibited in the dumbshow of Mr. Sheridan's performance, which, for two seasons, was a great favourite with the public. Of the Critic and Pizarro, we need not to speak, as they have been the most popular pieces of the kind ever produced on the stage.

We must really apologize to our readers, for, although we set out with declaring how unnecessary it was to criticise Mr. Sheridan's works, yet we have been betrayed into an eulogy on productions which all the world admires, and which, therefore, cannot require our feeble tribute of praise.

Mr. Moore's edition of Mr. Sheridan's works, contains all the pieces we have enumerated, with their prologues, epilogues, &c.; to which are added, the 'Verses to the Memory of Garrick, spoken as a Monody, at Drury Lane Theatre.' This edition is strictly confined to his dramatic productions; and neither his celebrated Verses to Miss Linley, nor any of his other poetic gems, of which many are in circulation, are here collected. For these, and for that justice to the transcendent genius of Sheridan, which Mr. Moore is so well able to do, we must wait for the Memoirs, which, we trust, will not be long delayed. In the mean time, these volumes must be read with interest, by every admirer of true genius, and must be regarded as an imperishable monument of the splendid talents of the first orator and the first dramatic writer of modern times.

Annals of the Coinage of Britain and its Dependencies, from the earliest Period of Authentic History to the End of the Fiftieth Year of the Reign of His Majesty King George III. By the Rev. Rogers Ruding, B.D. Vicar of Malden, in Surrey, F.S.A., &c. The Second Edition, corrected, enlarged, and continued to the close of the Year 1818. 5 vols. 8vo. With a 4to. vol. of Plates. London, 1819.

It is not a little remarkable that a work of such sterling value as the Annals of the Coinage, (we speak seriously, and do not intend a pun,) should have passed through two editions without being noticed by any reviewer, which we believe to be the case. It is not, however, from an anxiety to be the first in the field of criticism, on the present occasion, that we in some degree depart from our regular plan, and become retrospective reviewers; but the subject is one of so much interest, and is treated with so much ability by the author, that we flatter ourselves we shall be rendering an acceptable service to our readers by introducing it to their notice.

This work, which displays considerable erudition and indefatigable research, traces the progress of the coinage of Britain from the earliest period— from the shapeless brass and the iron rings or plates of the ancient Britons, to the beautiful coins of that very eminent artist Simon, when it reached the highest degree of excellence, and from that time to the present, when the art has declined with a rapidity for which it is not easy to account. The work also contains an historical detail of the changes which have obtained, not only in the denominations, forms, weights, and fineness of the money, with the best accounts which could be gathered from very scanty materials, of the origin and continuance of the various places of coinage and exchange which once existed in these dominions.

The collecting of these materials has not merely been an object of antiquarian curiosity; the author has had a higher and more important view, that of shewing, from the experience of ages, the inadequacy of punishment, however severe, to prevent the commission of the crime of counterfeiting the money, whilst the temptation to it remains so powerful and the execution of it so easy. His words on this subject we quote, as not only applying to counterfeiting money, but also to a much more frequent crime, that of forgery; and we recommend them seriously to the attention not only of legislators, but of that Moloch at whose shrine so many victims are annually sacrificed,—the Bank of England. Mr. Ruding says, 'The long succession of penal statutes, and the innumerable lives which have been forfeited to them, seem to prove that the system is radically defective, and that the crime can be prevented only by counteracting and weakening the force of the temptation. If it be the duty of every legislature to attend to the prevention rather than the punishment of offences, the acts referred to are a reproach to our statute book.'

We shall now, without further exordium, proceed to notice such parts of this work as appear to us to possess the most interest. We shall not detain our readers with a long disquisition on the origin of money*. In the most early stage of society, when the wants of man were confined to the absolute necessities of life, barter was sufficient for every purpose of exchange. Civilization, however, introduced so many wants, that a more perfect medium of commerce became necessary,—something which, by general consent, should be received at a fixed value, in exchange for all other things. At first, this medium was formed of some of the necessities of life. Cattle were sometimes used, whence the term pecunia is derived; for, in Domestick-Book, the word is used almost universally for cattle, and in a few instances for possession generally, but very rarely as denoting money. The inconvenience arising from this simple barter, suggested other means, and the precious metals were selected, and at a very remote period were given and received by weight. In more recent times, the wampum of America, the cowries of Africa, and the red feathers of the islands in the South Seas, have been used. None of these, however, can be considered as perfect money. Even the circulation of gold and silver by weight, which approaches the nearest to the convenience of coins, was soon found to be insufficient for the purposes of internal commerce, and a method was devised to ascertain the weight and gravity of the metal on bare inspection, by a stamp impressed upon it. The date of this invention cannot be accurately ascertained, but its high antiquity may be fairly inferred, and its origin placed anterior to all authentic prophane history.

Sir Edward Coke lays it down, that the money of England must be either gold or silver, and, at the time he wrote, no other metals had been coined by authority of the monarch; but copper coins were issued by Charles II. in 1672, under certain limitations. The materials of which the ancient Britons formed that medium of exchange which circulated amongst them when Cæsar first landed upon their shores, were brass and iron; but at a later period, during the reign of Cænobeline, they appear to have strack gold, silver, and copper. During the reigns of the Saxons and the Danes in England, silver and brass were only coined in their mints. The Norman kings rejected the latter, and silver became the sole material of coinage until the reign of Henry III., when gold was introduced into the Mint:—

From this metal, together with silver, were formed all the coins which, during several centuries, the monarchs of England permitted to be issued from their mints; to the great inconvenience of their inferior subjects, who required for their purchases money of smaller value than the penny, which seems to have been the lowest coin until the reign of Edward I. as no half-pennies nor farthings are known of any of the Anglo-Norman monarchs before his time. It has been supposed, by various authors, that in early times this inconvenience was in a great measure obviated by the coinage of pennies with a cross deeply indented on the reverse, in order to facilitate their division into half-pennies and farthings; but such coins have never yet been found, nor is it credible that any prince would strike his money in such a manner as to insure the destruction of a great proportion of it.

The smallest pieces of silver, i. e. the farthings, were coined as long as the increased value of that metal would permit; but, at length, their size was of necessity so much diminished, that the making them totally ceased in the reign of Edward VI.

To supply their place, James the First caused farthing tokens of brass and copper to be struck, but at a value so much inferior to the rate at which they were issued, that it was not thought fit to recognise them as legitimate coins, and to enforce their currency, and, therefore, they soon sunk into contempt and disuse.

The first real copper money was coined by Charles II. in 1665; but it does not appear that it was ever made current, and therefore the commencement of a regular coinage of that metal must be dated in the year 1672.

Tin was likewise coined by him in 1684.

The necessities of James II. gave rise to the coinage of substances still more intrinsically worthless than even copper and tin; namely, gun-metal and pewter. Such coinages, however, are scarcely worthy of enumeration here, as they never were imitated, the practice ceasing with the ruin of the inventor.

Thus it appears that the more precious metals have been for ages, and still continue to be, used in this kingdom as the chief materials of coins.

From the account of the constitution of the Mint, which is amply detailed, we quote a short extract on the wages of the officers at an early period:—

In the 33th year of Henry III. the warden's salary was two shillings a-day.

In the 33d year of Edward I. the porter of the Mint and Exchange received nine pence a-day; and the same in the 9th of Edward II. and the 23d of Edward III.

The warden's salary in the 23d year was as before, two shillings a-day; at which time his clerk received nine pence, and the keeper of the dies six pence a-day.

In the 25th and 31st years of Henry VI. it was two shillings and sixpence; but I have not discovered when the rate took place.

In his 32d year, the engraver had twenty pounds per annum.

The person who held the offices of comptroller, exchanger, and assayer, in the first year of Edward IV. was to take the usual daily wages, amounting to 20l. 13s. 4d. per annum.

* For an interesting article on the origin and value of money, we refer our readers to No. 2 of the Literary Chronicle.—Ed.

'In the second year of the same King, the engraver's wages were, as before, twenty pounds per annum.

'And, in his sixth year, the salary of the warden's clerk was nine pence a-day.'

The salary of the warden of the Mint, is now 434l. 2s. and that of the engraver 500l.

The supply of the Mint with bullion was in early times considered to be a circumstance of too much importance to be trusted to natural means alone; and the aid of alchemy was, therefore, resorted to for that purpose. Thus the gold of which the nobles of Edward III. were formed, is said to have been produced by Raymond Lully:—

'Ashmole, in his notes upon Norton's Ordinal, and Hermes Bird, has given a very circumstantial account of the bringing of Lully into England, by Cremer, Abbot of Westminster; of his agreeing to make the King rich by his art, in consequence of that monarch's promise to enter into a war against the Turks; of his refusal to work any longer, when he found that Edward would not keep that promise; and of his being clapt up in the Tower in consequence.

'The gold,' he says, 'is affirmed (by an unprinted verity) to have been made by Raymond Lully, in the Tower of London; and besides the tradition, the inscription is some proof; for, upon the reverse is a cross fleury, with Lioneux inscribed, "Jesus autem transiens per medium eorum ibat;" that is, "as Jesus passed invisible, and in most secret manner, by the midst of the Pharisees, so that gold was made by invisible and secret art amidst the ignorant."

'That Edward was, in some degree, a believer in the powers of alchemy, and, therefore, not improbably the dupe of Lully, will, I think, appear from the following record. The patent roll of his third year states, that the King had been given to understand, that John le Rous, and Master William de Dalby, could make silver by art of alchemy; that they had heretofore made it, and still did make it; and that by such making of that metal, they could greatly profit the realm; he, therefore, commanded Thomas Cary to find them out, and to bring them before the King, with all the instruments, &c. belonging to the said art. If they would come willingly, they were to be brought safely and honourably; but, if not, they were to be seized, and brought before the King wherever he might be. All sheriffs, &c. were commanded to assist the said Thomas Cary. This belief in the creation, or, at least, transmutation of metals, was, in the reign of Henry IV. so firmly established, that we find, in his fifth year, a statute which solemnly "ordained and established that none from henceforth shall use to multiply gold or silver, nor use the craft of multiplication; and if any the same do, that he incur the pain of felony in this case.'

Notwithstanding the disappointments which must have been perpetually experienced from the professions of these alchemists, it is certain that a reliance on the powers of their art, continued so late as the 17th of Edward IV. as appears by a warrant of that monarch, to John Frenah, affording him protection 'to practise a true and a profitable conclusion in the cunning or transmutation of metals.'

We conclude, for the present, with some judicious observations on the depreciation of money:—

'From the variations in the price of bullion, has arisen the necessity of reducing, from time to time, the actual weight and value of the coins; but their further depreciation, as to their effect in exchange for other commodities, has been influenced in a great measure by the increased quantity in circulation, which has reduced their value, in like manner as the same circumstance will reduce the value of any other article of exchange. That this is really the case, is amply to be proved from the progressive reduction of the interest of money. From the 5th chapter of the statute 3 Henry VII. it should seem, that, by an evasive process, twenty per cent. was sometimes paid. But it was not until the 27th year of Henry VIII. that the legal rate of interest was determined by statute, when it was ordained that not more than ten per cent. should be taken; and, after several reductions, at various times, it was brought down to five per cent. in the 12th year of Queen Anne; at which its legal rate has remained stationary until this present time.

'Its actual rate, however, has been perpetually, and necessarily, varying, through every period, since it first received a legal sanction.

'During a war, when the necessities of government create a powerful competition in the money market, it cannot be procured at the interest which the law has prescribed; and even government itself is obliged to exceed the established rate, either by an actual increase, or by a profit which the lender expects to make from the transfer of part of the securities given to him.

'When a few years of peace have brought back a portion of that wealth which the war had carried out of the kingdom, then the value of money begins to decrease, and it may be borrowed at less interest than five per cent., because the competition in the market is then on the contrary side to what it was before, and there exists a greater eagerness to dispose of money than to borrow it.

'From this, which is the natural course of things, we may learn how ineffectual, and consequently how impolitic, it is to attempt to fix, by legal restraints, that which will ever be a matter of bargain, and consequently ever in a state of fluctuation.'

A Narrative of Travels in Northern Africa, in the Years 1818, 19, and 20, &c. &c. By Captain G. F. Lyon, R. N.

(Concluded from p. 199.)

AFTER the death of Mr. Ritchie, of which we gave an account in our last number, Captain Lyon determined to penetrate to the southward of Morocco. Having secured such of their effects as they intended to leave, our author, accompanied by Belford, set forward on the 13th of December. The itinerary presents many details of general interest, but we shall notice only some of the most prominent. At Zueia, where the inhabitants are nearly all white, very hospitable, and peaceable, our author was told of a remarkable fowl, which would greatly excite his surprise. The shrief had brought a cock and hen of the breed from Egypt, and what was most singular, they both crowed. These rare animals proved to be nothing more than geese. Arriving at Gatrone, on Mohammed's birth-day, every thing promised a gay meeting, and the young Tibboo girls were full dressed on the occasion. They are light and elegant in form, have aquiline noses, fine teeth, and lips formed like those of Europeans. Their costume is graceful; the hair is plaited on each side in such a manner as to hang down the cheeks like a fan. A piece of leather is fastened from the front to the back of the head, in the centre, and through this are passed twenty or thirty silver rings:—

'On each side of the head, they wear an ornament of gold and rough cut agate. And round it, above the ears, a bandeau of coral, cowrie shells, or agates; several light chains of silver, having round bells at the end of them, are attached to the hair, and, when dancing, produce a pleasing sound. Their necks are loaded with gaudy necklaces, and one-half of their well-formed bosoms is shown by the arrangement of their drapery; their arms are bare to the shoulders, having above the elbow neat silver rings of the thickness of a goose-quill, and on the wrists one or two broader and flatter. In the ear they wear three or four silver rings of various sizes, the largest in circumference hanging the lowest. Their most singular ornament is a piece of red coral, through a hole in the right nostril, which really does not look unbecoming. The dress is a large shawl of blue, or blue and white cotton, of which they have a variety of patterns, fastened over the shoulders and across the bosom, and hanging in graceful folds, so as to show the back, right breast, and right arm bare. These dresses are very short, and exhibit the leg to the calf; but with all this display, their general appearance offered nothing offensive or immodest.

They tripped out all the evening to exhibit their finery, and were proudly pointed out by their mothers, who were visiting in our neighbourhood. As our hostess had a very pretty daughter, all the young people came to call on her, which afforded them a pretence for looking at the two new Mamlukes, who had just arrived. I sat on the sand, at the door, and was much gazed at, not in the Arab way, but by stealth, from behind their little shawls, and peeping through the palm bushes.

As it was the custom on this night, for the girls to dance through the town in every direction, I heard drums, bagpipes, and the usual accompaniment of tin-pots. At midnight I was called up to see them perform at our door. They were directed by an old woman, with a torch in one hand, and a long palm branch in the other, and sung, in chorus, verses which she recited to them. Three men sung and played on drums with their hands; and by their motions regulated the dancers, who were to advance or retreat accordingly. The tallest girls were placed in the centre, while the younger ones formed the wings, and they then danced in a circle, round their governess. The lookers-on had torches of palm leaves, and sung occasionally in chorus.

The chief object in the dance, seemed to be the waving, gracefully, from right to left, and in time with the music, a light shawl, which was passed over the shoulders, the ends being in the hands. They employed their feet, only to advance or retreat occasionally; but accompanied the change of time by movements of the head from side to side. At a given signal they all knelt, still going through the same motions of the head, and chanting their verse. They danced so exactly in time, and were dressed so much in uniform, that it appeared like witchcraft; when, on a sudden, every torch was extinguished, and the fairies vanished, to exhibit in some other part of the town.

We would gladly here finish the account of the Tibboo women, when it is so much in their favour; but justice requires us to add a terrible drawback on their charms—they are immoderately fond of tobacco, 'with a great portion of which every mouth is crammed.' On the 2nd of January, our traveller arrived at Tegerry, the southern limit of Fezzan. The castle walls, which formerly commanded the town, are about thirty feet thick at the bottom, and ten at the top; they are composed of mud, but are now in a ruinous state. The date trees are in and close to the houses, and there are several stagnant pools of water near the castle. Of the natives of these parts we learn, that—

The Tibboo of Borgoo are all Kaffirs, but are quiet inoffensive people, living in houses made of palm-leaf mats, called booshi, which are so closely woven, that the rain cannot penetrate them. I have seen huts of this description at Gatrone and Tegerry, and consider them superior to the Fezzan houses in general. Very little corn is cultivated in Borgoo, the inhabitants subsisting chiefly on dates, which grow there in immense quantities, of an inferior kind, and on the flesh of their sheep, goats, and camels: they have also a small breed of black cattle, but these are chiefly used for milking. The arms of these people I have spoken of in a former page. Their dress has very little variety; and, except the skins of animals, they have only such coarse cloth as they sometimes obtain from their trading neighbours, which they wear, having a piece before and another behind, hanging down as low as the knees. Boys and girls are entirely naked, and few of the men have any other covering than a leather wrapper round the loins; all have the head bare. Marriage, according to the accounts of the Arabs, who vilify them in order to excuse their own cruelties, is unknown among them, and the women are in common; brothers and sisters live together, and confess it when asked. They have no knowledge of a God; they are, nevertheless, peaceable and neighbourly towards each other. One or two whom I questioned, admitted that there was a great Spirit, who made them; but laughed when I asked where he was to be found? They imagine thunder and lightning to be produced by their deceased friends, and are, therefore, very fearful during a storm. They eat the blood of camels when baked over a fire; and they also will eat animals which die a natural death. Lizari came and lodged with us; we provided him with clothes, and made him as comfortable as we could. Neither he, nor any of the Ghrazie, had for the last forty-two days, tasted any other food than dates; he was fat, however, and so were they all, which is a strong proof of the nutritious quality of that fruit.

On the 16th of January, Captain Lyon returned to Morzouk, and his seventh chapter contains such information respecting the country of Fezzan, as he has been able to collect. The soil is generally a sandy desert; little grain is produced, and the people derive their chief subsistence from the dates. Sheep and goats are too expensive for the poorer classes, and even among the opulent, there is no man who can afford to eat meat more than three times a week:—

Landed property is generally in the possession of the better classes, and is cultivated for them by the free servants and slaves, who work alike, and experience exactly the same treatment. Lands generally descend to the nearest relations at the decease of the owner; but if he dies without heirs, or is put to death for an alleged crime, the sultan claims them as his right; the owner, notwithstanding, can, if he pleases, buy or sell, without being bound by any sort of entail or clause, against parting with family property. Houses are held in the same way as the lands. When grounds are leased, or sold, the price is generally proportioned to the number of wells and date trees on the premises; it happens, however, not unfrequently, that the palms are the property of one man, while the land on which they grow belongs to another. The gardens are entirely cultivated by the paddle or hoe, and parcelled out into squares of about three feet, having little channels to them, for the purpose of irrigation. Much dung is used, and the sandy soil of old gardens almost assumes the appearance of earth. From the great labour requisite to keep these spots in order, it would not repay any non-resident to have lands in Fezzan; though I am confident that such possessions would be respected, as there are many absentees who have large groves of palms, which their relatives, or those employed by them, keep, and render up an exact account of. The difficulty of finding willing, honest, faithful, or contented workmen, is very great; and each master or agent is obliged to attend constantly to his own immediate property or charge; some gardens, however, are, and have been, attended for generations by the same family of labourers.

The government of Fezzan was once hereditary; and the office of kadi still continues so. Mukni's military force, if he presses the Arabs into his service, sometimes amounts to five thousand men. In Morzouk, the punishment of crimes is the same as at Tripoli, already noticed. The men drink freely, and are very good humoured drunkards, but hospitality, the Arab virtue, is unknown in Fezzan. Of slavery and the slave-trade, our author says,—

In Morzouk, about a tenth part of the population are slaves, though many have been brought away from their country so young, as hardly to be considered in that light. With respect to the household slaves, little or no difference is to be perceived between them and freemen, and they are often entrusted with the affairs of their master. These domestic slaves are rarely sold, and on the death of any of the family to which they belong, one or more of them receive their liberty, when, being accustomed to the country, and not having any recollection of their own, they marry, settle, and are consequently considered as naturalized. All slavery is for an unlimited time, unless when a religious feeling of the master induces him to set a bondsman free on any great festival, on the occasion of a death, or, which not unfrequently happens, from a wish to show his approval of the slave's services.

"It was, when the people were more opulent, the custom to liberate a male or female on the feast of Bairam, after the fast of Rhamadan. This practice is not entirely obsolete, but nearly so. The slaves are procured from the inland traders, or on those lawless expeditions I have already mentioned.

"Respecting the offspring of slaves, it may not be uninteresting to observe the regulations existing in Fezzan, which are, as far as I can collect, the same as in all Moslem countries.

"A Khaled, or negress, bearing a child by her master, cannot afterwards be sold, but must be maintained for the remainder of her life by him, or any person to whom he may marry her; and her child is free, and equally entitled to support.

"A negress having a child by any man but her master, (even though the parties should be married,) is the mother of a slave, she herself not being free.

"Should the female slave of one man be with child by the male slave of another, the infant so born becomes the property of the master of the female, and can, as well as its mother, be sold.

"A child, the offspring of a free woman by a slave, partakes of its mother's state, and is free.

"It not unfrequently happens that masters allow family slaves to marry without liberating them; but their children are slaves, and can be sold, although it is not considered honourable so to dispose of them. These children, and, indeed, all those born in the country, are called Shushan.

On the 9th of February, Captain Lyon left Morzouk, to return to Tripoli. As this is ground on which we have already accompanied him, our further extracts will be very few, and rather desultory than otherwise. Our author was at Sockna on the 28th of February, and he says,—

"This morning being the first of their spring, and a day of general rejoicing, it is the custom to dress out little tents or bowers on the tops of the houses, decorating them with carpets, jereeds, shawls, and sashes. A gaudy handkerchief on a pole, as a standard, completes the work, which is loudly cheered by the little children, who eat, drink, and play during the day in these covered places, welcoming the spring by songs, and crying continually, "O welcome spring! with pleasure bring us plenty." The women give entertainments in their houses, and the day is quite a holiday. From the top of our house these little bowers had a very pretty effect, every roof in the town being ornamented with one. They are called goobba."

Among the few notices of natural history which this work contains, we find the following:—

"A little blackish rat was brought to me, which was really very curious; it had a head resembling that of a badger, with the same peculiar marks by the side of the face; its tail was long, black, and rather bushy. Belford and myself contrived to make a cage for it, out of a tin canister, and I discovered that it had the power of clinging to the bars, and climbing with its back downwards; it was very fierce, but I had great hopes of being able to bring it home, as well as three other animals, called by the Arabs dthub, which resembled lizards in many respects, but were much more clumsily formed, and slower in their motions; their tails were broad, and covered with scaly spikes, and they could hang by their fore paws, which they had the power of closing on any object; their head and nose much resembling those of the hawk's-bill turtle, and, to a certain degree, they changed their colour as camels do."

Our author being unwell, was rubbed with an Arabic compound for the fever, by a white woman of Tripoli, of whom we learn, that—

"About eighteen months before this period, the bashaw, one evening, surprised his black wives and a party of their female friends, making merry, or, in other words, very drunk and noisy, and playing all sorts of extraordinary pranks; on sight of him they fled in all directions, leaving in his presence, his wife or wives, with this Tripoline woman and a negress slave. The latter had her throat cut immediately, in the presence of her mistress,—the wives were threatened with death, and the white woman, named Sleenia, the doctress above-mentioned, received five hundred bastinadoes; she was then allowed to depart, but the bashaw afterwards thought proper to send after her, with an order that she should be strangled. She was fortunate enough to escape, and after wandering about for some time, attached herself to Lilla Fatma, who was also exiled and given to Sheikh Barood, with whom she arrived safely at Fezzan. The poor woman, owing to severe illness, was on the brink of the grave during her stay at Morzouk, which made her determine on leaving the place, and braving every danger by a return to Tripoli. On my coming away, she put herself under my protection, and I promised to intercede with the bashaw for her pardon. As she was emaciated and very weak, I allowed her to mount my camels, and I fed her during the journey. She certainly was not a very interesting figure, being much marked with the small-pox, and resembling, in form and person, a little fat man; and I was well aware that I should not make a very beautiful or virtuous addition to the Tripoli ladies: feeling, however, great pity for her, I consented to take her under my charge. Lilla Fatma, whom this unfortunate female had served for a whole year, allowed her to come away without giving her even a shirt, or money to help her on her journey."

At Zleutem, our author says,—

"I was much amused by the songs of the Negresses while pounding wheat; they sang all their country airs in chorus, and there was in their wildness much beauty. Their Boori, or songs used in sorcery, were particularly striking, and they kept time to the music with their wooden pestles and glass armlets, which sounded like cymbals. One of the songs was thus explained to me: the three girls who sung it were pounding in the same mortar, and regulated their beating according to the circumstances of which they sung. At first she pounded slowly, one telling the other two that they must keep up their spirits, as the warrior would soon be at home, and their lovers would bring more trophies than any one else; they then increased their time, and sang a song of triumph, the warriors being supposed to have returned; when, suddenly, they beat without measure, singing in a very shrill and rapid manner as for one who was dead. They then ceased beating altogether, and sang a trio, in which two endeavoured to comfort the girl who had lost her lover, she appearing inconsolable. At length they agreed to have recourse to sorcery, to ascertain if he died nobly. A goat was supposed to be killed, each of them examining its entrails, and singing several incantations, until a happy sign was discovered, when they resumed their pestles, winding up with a very beautiful chorus. The master of the girls forbade their singing any more, even though I earnestly requested that they might be suffered to continue; he said it was unholy, and that they were as great Kaffirs now, as before they acknowledged our Lord Mohammed to be the Prophet of God."

We now take our leave of Captain Lyon, and, although he has not added much to our stock of information respecting Africa, yet we think he has furnished many useful hints and notices, which may be of considerable service to future travellers. One value this work certainly possesses—faithfulness; the author modestly narrates what he saw and what appeared to him of interest, without attempting to astonish his readers by marvellous adventures; and when we consider, that he may have trusted much to the notes of Mr. Ritchie, and did not, in the outset of the journey, expect to be called on to furnish a narrative, it is not surprising that it is in some parts less complete than could have been wished.

A number of lithographic plates, drawn by Captain Lyon, illustrate and ornament the work.

A Practical View of an Invention for the better protecting Bank Notes against Forgery. Illustrated by various Specimens. By John Holt Ibbetson, Esq. 8vo. pp. 68. London, 1821.

So much has already been written on the prevention of forgery in a moral point of view, that it is scarcely necessary to notice it. It is, however, a subject on which the legislator, the merchant, and the moralist, must feel a deep interest. The numerous victims to a crime of recent date, declare either the inefficiency of capital punishments, or the wanton negligence of those who permit the crime to be so easily committed. The facility of forging Bank of England notes is the great temptation; and while they continue to be so wretchedly executed as to be imitated by any engraver's apprentice of one year's standing, that temptation will continue, even though the sacrifice of human life should increase a hundred fold. Of that sacrifice of late years, we have a melancholy proof in a return made to the House of Commons on the 15th of last month. It is a 'Statement of the Number of Persons convicted of any crime connected with the Forgery of the Notes of the Bank of England, in each of the years, from the year 1790 to the year 1820, both inclusive.' From this list, it appears that there were no convictions until the year 1797, the period when cash payments were suspended, and, we believe, one pound notes first issued. In that year there was only one capital conviction. In the year 1820, there were not less than 352 convictions! 77 capital, and 275 for what is termed the minor offence, that of having forged Bank notes in their possession. The total number of convictions, from 1797 to 1820 inclusive, have been 1581, of which 461 were capital. The Bank of England does not possess the means of stating or distinguishing the punishments inflicted for the said crimes; but, as forgery is the unpardonable sin, it would not, we believe, be exceeding the number, if we suppose, that not less than four hundred of our fellow-creatures have been executed in the last twenty-four years for forgery on the Bank of England.

This is a serious charge against some persons, and 'woe to that man by whom the offence cometh.' We shall, no doubt, be told that no persons are more anxious to prevent forgery than the Bank Directors,—that commissioners have been appointed to investigate the subject,—and that immense sums have been expended to procure a note that cannot be imitated. To a certain extent we will admit all this; but, as perfection is not a plant of earthly growth, we must scarcely expect to attain it; and although there may not yet have been discovered a plan perfectly secure from imitation, yet several have been invented, which would render the imitation so difficult on the one hand, and so easy of detection on the other, that forgery would be nearly annihilated. In justice, however, to the Bank Directors, we copy the following article, which has appeared in some of the newspapers, containing an account of their latest labours:—

'We understand that the plan adopted by the Bank of England for the formation of a new bank-note, and which has for some time past been pursued with the greatest activity, has completely failed in its object, notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary.

'In the first instance, a variety of specimens were exhibited to the Bank by some of the most eminent and ingenious gentlemen of the profession, none of which were deemed eligible. It is said that a plan was afterwards submitted by Sir Wm. Congreve, and was nothing more than a compound or a consolidation of the best features in the rejected specimens. 'This was accepted,' and immediately put into execution, under the management, we are told, of Mr. Applegath, on whom an annuity of a large amount had been previously settled for life, as a remuneration for his services, and his undertaking the sole management of this arduous and extensive concern. After notes to an enormous amount had been finished, the expense of which, together with the cost of machinery, including the sums paid to different artists, amounted in the whole to upwards of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds, an artist, in a few hours, made a fac-simile of the new Bank-note, which was so well executed, that the difference between the two notes could scarcely be discovered. It is supposed that each note that was manufactured, cost, on an average, three pence sterling. We have this account from a gentleman who had full opportunity of ascertaining the fact. We understand that the fac-simile was produced upon the lithographic system. To this statement, for the perfect accuracy of which we are not of course responsible, we may add the following fact from our own personal knowledge:—When the Bank Directors first determined to adopt the plan proposed by Sir W. Congreve, and which was a mere pilfer from the American mode of invention, specimens of various notes manufactured by machinery in America were submitted to the celebrated wood-engraver, Mr. Branstion, in order to have his opinion as to the possibility of forgery. The machinery for one of these specimens was so bulky and complex, that two waggons would not contain it, and it required six weeks for the fixing. The other specimens were from a less complex, but still difficult and expensive progress. Mr. Branstion, in order to convince the Bank Directors of the folly of their undertaking, made perfect fac-similes (which we have seen) of every specimen, so as they could not possibly be distinguished from the originals. Some of the fac-similes did not occupy more than three or four hours each of the time of this able artist, and the two wagon-load specimen was equalled in less than twenty-four hours!

So much for the plans adopted or tried by the Bank of England: we now come to notice one which has been neglected by them—the plan submitted by Mr. Ibbetson, the author of the work before us. Those who have seen this gentleman's work on 'Eccentric Circular Turning,' need not to bemoan his ingenuity. It appears, that among the various plans submitted to the Bank Directors, Mr. Ibbetson sent one. Convinced that 'whatever is executed by the hand may be imitated by the hand,' Mr. Ibbetson's is confined to machinery engravings for letter-press work, and he says, he always considered that 'engravings of that description offered a protective power, and many advantages beyond engravings of any other sort.' In this opinion, he is confirmed by the Report of the Society of Arts. The machinery used by Mr. Ibbetson has been invented by himself, and his work contains abundance of specimens, which combine the utmost elegance and precision. Of these no description will afford any idea; they need only, however, to be seen to be admired. A few extracts from the work will convey a tolerable idea of the author's plan. He says,—

'The machinery which I have constructed, combines the principle of the geometric pen, with others of a still more fortuitous nature.

'I have before mentioned that the inventor of this pen enumerates no less than one thousand two hundred and seventy-three different curves, which, in its simple form, it is capable of producing; and every additional contrivance which is made to such simple form, necessarily multiplies that number. A different figure is the inevitable consequence, not only of every different combination of the whole number of curves, but also of every different adjustment of the machinery. I will not attempt to calculate the number of figures that may be thus produced:—it may be considered to be endless; for it would take no less a period than 117,000,000,000,000 years to effect all the figures which might be produced from only twenty-four curves, supposing that ten figures were produced every minute.

The accompanying plate furnishes a specimen of the kind of figures this machinery produces; and I have no hesitation in saying, that if I was ever so desirous of executing a fac-simile engraving, I should despair, even with the same machine, of accomplishing it. Not having taken any memorandum of the adjustment of the machinery, by which the figures were produced, I consider that there is as little probability of my obtaining them again, as that I should produce corresponding curves by dropping a thread on the table. It may still be argued that the engraving might be copied by hand. To this part of the subject I have not been inattentive. I have submitted similar engravings to the opinion of the most ingenious and expert artists, some of whom were inclined, at first, to think they might be copied, but, subsequently, admitted the impossibility of effecting it by hand. I have, however, heard of one engraver who persisted in the possibility of their being copied, and that he himself would do it. I trust I shall be pardoned the digression, but I really cannot help saying, that I think the carver might as well be expected to imitate, with his chisel, an engine-turned snuff-box, as that the engraver should be expected to imitate machinery engravings without the aid of machinery. But, to proceed; if, contrary to the opinion of other artists, and to my expectation, that engraver were able to copy my machinery engravings, it would operate, I conceive, as a very trifling deterioration of my plan, when it became known that he was no other than the ingenious and exquisite artist, Mr. Branstion. I have no object for concealment, and will, therefore, relate the fact as it occurred.

In the course of last summer, Sir Wm. Congreve, (one of the commissioners for preventing forgery,) accompanied by Mr. Branstion, repaired to the shop of Mr. Stewart, ivory-turner, in Oxford Street, and purchased my book on Eccentric Circular Turning, with some of my machinery engravings, which Mr. Stewart had to dispose of. Mr. Branstion seemed to consider the figures were formed by circles. Mr. Stewart informed him that they were not. Mr. Branstion then observed, that, whether they consisted of circles or not, he was confident he could copy them. How far he may have been successful I do not know, but it is natural to conclude that he did not succeed; for, after what passed, I think, if he had, he would have sent Mr. Stewart an impression of his engraving. From the concurring opinion of other artists, I am, however, as confident that Mr. Branstion cannot copy them, as he may have been to the contrary.

The four uppermost of the engraving, in the plate against fol. 28, formed a part of those which Sir Wm. Congreve purchased at Mr. Stewart's, and which Mr. Branstion said he could copy.

It may, however, be said, that although a perfect fac-simile may not be produced, either by machinery or by hand, yet the imitation may be sufficiently good to impose on the public. To prevent this, I introduce a test which will enable every one to detect any imitation that is any thing less than a perfect copy.

The engravings are so executed as to be imprinted in detached parts; and, in applying the test, the sides of the engravings which are opposite, when brought into juxtaposition, will perfectly coincide, line for line, and form perfect figures. This test, independently of its affording facility to the public at large of examining into and determining upon the genuineness of a note, constitutes an extraordinary degree of difficulty against imitation. It is not only necessary that the figure should be correctly copied, but also that the line of division should intersect the various curves, precisely in the same manner as in the original. The engraving here inserted affords an illustration of this test. If the edge of one part be folded down, and brought into contact with the edge of the other part, it will be instantly perceived that every line coincides, and that the two parts form a whole and perfect figure. This separation of the engraving I consider to be altogether fortuitous. I have never found it practicable to effect it twice in the same place; and supposing it otherwise possible to copy such a machinery engraving, the introduction of this line of separation would oppose an insurmountable difficulty.

Another modification of this test is, to imprint one part in black and the other part in red, in the manner represented in the accompanying plate; in which case the black and the red lines must every way coincide.

The rose engine has been named as affording the necessary protection in the execution of engravings. Mr. Ibbetson, however, rejects it. On the comparison of the rose engine with his own, he says,—

'Twenty years' experience in the contrivance, construction, and employment of machinery, taught me that the principle of the rose-engine was not sufficiently fortuitous for the object I had in view; and I was, therefore, led to the contrivance of the machine I have constructed. The result of the rose-engine depends on the will and skill of man, and is, consequently, within his control. The result of the engine I have constructed, depends on causes which are beyond the control of man, and which, consequently, place his will and skill at defiance. The relative protective power which different productions may possess, is, I therefore consider, beyond the influence of individual opinion, and can only be decided by actual experiment—by substituting them for imitation to some artist of superior talents.

Mr. Silvester, an eminent engraver, residing in the Strand, when questioned by the Society of Arts, (as appears by their Report,) gave it as his decided opinion, that nothing could be engraved that might not be successfully imitated. Having, since he delivered this opinion, submitted to his inspection some of my specimens, he said, that the principle of them was new to him; that it was, clearly, impossible to imitate them by copy or plate engraving; nor, as he thought, could they, by any other mode of engraving, be successfully imitated by hand.

It is not a little singular that every engraver admits the total impossibility of copying Mr. Ibbetson's specimens by hand, but some think that they might be copied by machinery; and all the first rate mechanicians in London express their opinion as decidedly, that they cannot be copied by machinery, whilst some of them imagine they may be copied by hand. The conclusion which Mr. Ibbetson draws from these circumstances is, 'that a form of note may be contrived that cannot be successfully imitated.'

Whether this desideratum is attainable or not, we cannot determine, but Mr. Ibbetson appears to us to have made a very near approach to it; and, although the Bank of England has not adopted his plan, yet, as they appear to have failed with all the others, we hope they will give it a trial. At all events, it must be of great advantage to country bankers; and to them we recommend it, as we do the work to the ingenious, and to all who feel in the least interested in the prevention of forgery and in the progress of the arts.

The Lyre of Crispin, containing the Sorrows of Memory, and other Poems. By Two of the Craft. 12mo. pp. 120. London, 1821.

WHEN the names of Holcroft, Bloomfield, and Gifford, occur to our recollection, we cannot but feel some respect for the 'craft and mystery' of shoe making. We rejoice at every effort which tends to exercise the genius, and to better the condition of the adventurer, and we can even make great excuses for those who, mistaking the bent of their talents, often misdirect their studies. With these feelings, we took up the Lyre of Crispin. We did more, we read it—a task not easily accomplished, we confess, and now that we are called on to pass judgment, we are sorry we can say nothing in its praise. Rhyme and reason, order and orthography, grammar and good sense, are all sadly outraged, and we feel that we have no chance of a single extract that will do the authors any credit. The 'Sorrows of Memory' is by far the best piece in the volume, and is intended as a contrast to the 'Pleasures of Memory,' by Rogers; the contrast of the subject is not, however, the only one, and we are sure we need not to point out the others. The 'Eulogie to the Memory of the Princess Charlotte;' the 'Epitaph on Mr. John Tindal, late Stockholder to the Western Division of Cordwainers;' and the 'Dream addressed to Mr. O'Shaughnessy, sen. bootmaker,' are among the minor productions. The two last may, perhaps, be interesting to some persons, but it will not be on account of their poetical merit certainly. In conclusion, we cannot but wish that the authors of this volume had attended to a maxim, with which they avow themselves acquainted, ne auctor ultra crepidam.

CAPITULATION

GRANTED BY THE CALIPH OMAR TO THE

CHRISTIANS OF JERUSALEM.

[We are indebted for the following important document to our illustrious countryman, Sir Sydney Smith, who has translated it from the original Arabic into French.—Ed.]

Translation of the original Arabic text of the Capitulation granted by the Caliph OMAR, the immediate successor of MAHOMET, to the Christians of Jerusalem and its dependencies, at the time of its conquest, in the 15th year of the Hegira.

IN THE NAME OF THE MOST GOOD AND MOST MERCIFUL GOD.

Let us praise the Lord who has educated us in Islamism, and who honours us with the true Creed, who has had pity on us, in sending us his Prophet Mahomet. May the peace and benediction of God be with him who purified our hearts, who granted us victory over our enemies, and dwellings in the country, and who inspired us with love for our brethren. Let God be praised by his servants for this grace and infinite mercy.

Behold the writing of Omar, the son of Catabb, which was given as a pact and a convention to the patriarch Zephryanus, revered by all his people, patriarch of the royal orthodox sect of Jerusalem, on the Mountain of Olives.

This convention comprehends the subjects, the clergy, the monks, and nuns, and grants them surety in whatever place they may be.

'We, true believers, and our successors bind ourselves to guarantee surety to the Christian subject, if he fulfil his duties as subject.

'This convention shall only be broken by their fault, in case they try to throw off their obedience and submission.

'Let surety be equally accorded to their churches, their residence and property in the country, the places of their pilgrimage, as well within as without, that is to say, to the church Ramane (the holy Sepulchre), the place of the birth of Jesus, at BETHLEHEM, to the great church of the Caverni, with the three gates to the south, north, and west, as well as to the other Christians who may be in those places, to the Georgians and Abyssinians, Nestorians, Jacobites, and to those who belong to this prophet.

'They all merit kindness, because they were already formerly honoured by the prophet, with a document, sealed with his seal, by which he exhorts us to act kindly towards them, and accord them surety, on account of which we true believers are benevolently disposed towards them, to honour him who was benevolent towards them.

'They are hereby freed from all capitation tax, and from all duties in all the countries, and on all the seas of the Moslems. At their entrance of Ramane (the holy Sepulchre), and during the rest of their pilgrimage, nothing shall be exacted of them.

'The Christians who visit the holy Sepulchre, must deposit, for the patriarch, a drachma and an half of silver.

'The true believers of the two sexes must follow this law, (the sultans and chiefs not excepted) and submit to it, whether they be rich or poor.

'Given in presence of all the disciples of the prophet,—

'ABDALLAH, OSMAN, B. AFFAN, SAAD,
'ABDOR-RAHMAN, BEN-AUF.

'Let faith be given to this writing, which ought to rest in their hands, and may the benediction of God be accorded to the prophet and his disciples.

'Let us praise God, the king of worlds, on whom we repose, as on the prophet our advocate, the 20 Ribuel, Enel of the 15th year of the Hegira.

'He who reads this writing, and who acts in a manner contrary to it, from this day to the day of judgment, breaks the convention of God and his well-beloved Prophet.'

Besides the above document, we are indebted to Count Italsinski for another, in the Turkish language, by which the authenticity of the Arabic Convention mentioned in it, made between Mahomet and the Christians, is placed beyond all doubt. It is not pretended that this document is the original itself, but one of the three authentic copies of the original, which, by the orders of the prophet, were written by Ali (the second year of the Hegira) on the skin of a gazelle, and was signed by the most distinguished of the disciples and companions, and afterwards delivered to all the Christians in Arabia, as a letter of surety and safeguard.

SOME OBSERVATIONS ON THE

PLAGIARISMS OF LORD BYRON.

By W. B. L., Gent.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLER.)

It has now, I think, been proved most incontestably, that Lord Byron is no poet; and I am exceedingly rejoiced, that through the erudite exertions of contemporaneous writers, his lordship has been placed before the view of the too credulous world, in his proper characters.

I am not sufficiently versed in legal knowledge to determine with precision the exact degree and nature of the punishment which, by the law of England, is affixed to literary larceny. It was my intention, therefore, to have suggested to his Majesty's Attorney-General, the propriety of instituting proceedings against his lordship, but, recollecting that he (Lord Byron, and not the Attorney-general,) had very wisely removed himself out of the jurisdiction of our courts, I have, for the present, dropped all idea of it. For my own satisfaction, however, and for that of the curious, I have been engaged in collecting the law of the land thereon, and, for greater safety, I propose going into a proper course of reading, beginning with the Statutes at Large.

But this is a digression from my purpose.

I had long lamented that no competent mind had undertaken to remove the veil which had hitherto concealed the truth from the public, (easy souls!) and to wrest from the unblushing brows of a mere plagiarist and poetaster, those laurels which are alone due to unimpeached originality.

Marvellously well pleased, therefore, was I, when, by the sapience and research of indefatigable commentators, this desirable result has been at length effected. And, although myself had been for some months engaged in a lengthy and voluminous writing upon his lordship's (literary) robberies, I felt an intensity of delight in being thus anticipated by authorities, (modestly speaking) so much more worthy of good credit!

In assistance to this laudatory consummation, I proceed to lay before the world a portion of my exertions; and if, in the course of my lucubrations, I, peradventure and by accident, adopt an obsolescence of language, I hope I may be forgiven by those whose labours have been less musty and moth-eaten than mine.

I opine, then, that his lordship has drawn more largely from antique sources than coteremporaries have admitted, and I am strongly borne out in this assumption, by the corroborative evidence (from the rare and remarkable books and manuscripts—illuminated and otherwise—presently in my possession) which followeth.

The volumes to which I propose, principally, to confine myself in the present article, are intitled:—1. The Life and deite of Cocke Robbyn, (whence, doubtless, that pathetic balled still extant in our nurseries. 2. AUNTIENT LEGIENDES, (black letter, very scarce.) 3. The Historie of the Goode Kinge Pepin, 1535. Imprinted by Iohanne Foneyrogue. 4. A Tale of the Olden Time, (a private manuscript of my own), from which copious pilferings have been committed by his lordship, albeit, that he hath never yet seen it. And 5. The Parous Adventures of Master Quhatta, telling howe thatte he wolde bee a grate critick, and howe thatte he was laught at veray moche for a foole, &c. &c.

I have been, now, for some hours, engaged in ascertaining to whom his lordship is originally indebted for the interjection 'Ah!' which is to be found so frequently in his productions, but am not yet able to make any positive asseveration on the point. I, therefore, find it impossible (inasmuch as it interfereth with my present research) to transcribe that quantity of quotation with which I had proposed to illustrate the proposition of my learned coadjutors; and to forward to you, for the edification of the world. I must, consequently, bid an abrupt 'farewell' (a word of his lordship's frequent use, of which more hereafter) to yourself and to your readers, with the promise of supporting our hypothesis with an overwhelming quantum of lore by the ensuing week.

THE LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF 'NOBODY.'

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—It was with much concern, and not without some fellow-feeling, that I read the letter of 'Somebody' in your last number; for, although, in point of consanguinity, no two persons can be less allied than 'Somebody' and myself, there still is, as I think you will presently allow, some degree of similarity in the fates, to which we are respectively exposed. Thus, to adduce only one instance, en passant, 'if any thing be lost or mislaid,' to borrow 'Somebody's' own words, who so likely to have all the blame as myself? That 'Somebody' may often be charged with it, I do not mean to deny; but, let 'Somebody' or 'Anybody' be accused to their faces, and you will quickly find, how unceremoniously these worthies will shift the whole opprobrium upon poor Nobody, who is thus made the scape-goat, when there can be no doubt, that 'Somebody' must have been the real offender. But, in order to set this matter in a clearer light, as well as to give your readers some idea of my chequered fortunes, I purpose, with your permission, to lay before them a brief sketch of my life and adventures:—and, if they do not find them equally marvellous with those of the Guys, Arthurs, and Palmerins of romantic story, or even with those of the Seren Champions of Christendom themselves, I consent to be set down for the arrantest dunce, that ever drew the long bow at the target of fame.

In the first place, Mr. Editor, there is no doubt, that I may date my birth far higher than Adam, before whom both Jews and Christians, however they may have differed on other points, have always agreed, that Nobody was in existence. Nay, more than this I may even add, that the ancient 'gentlemen of Wales,' who are of such high authority in these matters, inasmuch as they invariably place the creation of the world in the middle of their Genealogical Tree, have nevertheless agreed, and vote, in allowing, that Nobody could produce a higher pedigree than themselves. If the time of my birth be thus marvellous, the manner of it will be considered at least equally so; for, with all due deference to that Greek epigrammatist, who asserts, in round terms, that every one must have had a grandfather, I can boldly declare, that I had not even a father and mother, much less a grandfather and grandmother, or any other progenitor. And, should you doubt this, Mr. Editor, I beg of you to consult any philosopher or mathematician you choose, and he will prove to a demonstration, that Nobody has ever existed without parents. As I have thus lived from time immemorial, and have been born, if I may use the expression, out of the common order of nature, you will not be surprised to hear, that I am, like another St. Leon, or the wandering Jew himself, doomed to be immortal. So, whatever things may have an end, my joys and my miseries, my hopes and my fears, are destined to be interminable.

From what I have here premised, you may readily conceive, how far it would exceed the limits of your paper to enter into a minute detail of my 'life and adventures.' Your readers must, therefore, be satisfied with such of the most prominent features, as I can manage to compress into this brief portrait.

To the immortality and other strange peculiarities of my nature I have already alluded; to these I may now add my ubiquity. For, true it is, that, as I have lived in all times, so I have also lived in all countries, though under various names; and, to mention only the two most noted nations of antiquity, the Greeks called me Oudeis or Outis, and the Romans Nemo or Nullus. And, if you will but consult their most renowned authors, to say nothing of the writers of other countries, you will find with what wonderful and miraculous qualities I am endowed, and these, too, to make the matter more remarkable, often of the most opposite and contradictory nature. Thus, at one time, I am complimented with writing finer epics than Homer, and, at another, vilified with scribbling worse doggerel than even Bavius or Mævius. One author describes me as a paragon of virtue, and proclaims me without a single fault.—Take, for example, Horace, who says,

— Vixit Nemo sine macula? — Google

while, on the other hand, I am accused by some of his countrymen as being a greater monster of iniquity than a Caligula or a Nero. In a word, if my character were to be taken from the numberless writers, who have done me the honour to notice it, I might well say of it, in the words of the poet,—

— Nil fuit, unquam
Sic impar sibi!—

However, as every auto-biographer is justified in looking at the brightest side of the picture he represents, I will undertake to assert, that, in this country at least, I have invariably been placed above Shakespeare as a poet, above Newton as a philosopher, and above Wellington as a general; for every Englishman is ready to maintain, that Nobody has mused, philosophized, and fought better than these three. For the rest, I may refer to the current opinion of the world respecting my wisdom, which has, for the last two thousand years, passed into a proverb, as all know, who remember the Latin line,— which, for the benefit of the readers of the Country Literary Chronicle, I translate—'Nobody is at all times a sage.' I could add largely to these few particulars, concerning the supernatural excellence of my qualities, both mental and corporeal, did I not fear to incur the imputation of egotism. I will, therefore, merely state, that I have been regarded as surpassing the Admirable Crichton himself in the various and wonderful endowments which his biographers have ascribed to him, in which they have uniformly declared, that he was excelled by Nobody. What could I desire more?

— NEMO omnibus horis sapit!—

Of my adventures, I could, as you may imagine, furnish you with such a list, as would more than satisfy the greatest gourmand in romance, and such as no former adventurer, from Hercules downwards, ever equalled. And, indeed, to go farther, even the most astonishing and marvellous feats, imputed to these very champions, were achieved by myself, as all the world agree. It is I only, that have descended into the infernal regions, that have climbed up to the moon, that have been swallowed by lions and come out alive,—that have conversed with whales at the bottom of the ocean, and that have been on a familiar footing with the whole tribe of—— Gorgones, and Hydras, and Chimeras dire.—

Nor is it of ancient romancers alone that I have to complain for thus despoiling me of my legitimate fame: I have the same charge to make against many modern writers, especially travellers, who have ascribed to various persons, and sometimes to themselves, such wonderful acts, as it is well known to every unprejudiced reader, were performed by Nobody. This, Mr. Editor, I make bold to say, is something more than bare plagiarism: it is, absolutely, picking my pocket of my character (if I may borrow an Hibernian phrase)—it is, in plain words, to 'Rob me of that, which naught enriches them, And makes me poor indeed.'

Before I quit the subject of adventures, I cannot help noticing, what a scurry trick was played upon me of yore, by the renowned Ulysses, when in the cave of Polyphemus. Every one knows, that it was Ulysses himself, who, upon that occasion, put out the giant's eye (which, by the way, as being his only one, he could but ill spare); yet, had he the assurance to declare to Polyphemus, that it was I, calling me by my Greek name, Outis, who committed this piece of barbarity. As Ulysses, however, has been dead and buried some time, I have no wish to dwell on this old quarrel; but I hope, Mr. Editor, you will excuse me, if I mention a hardship, to which I am daily exposed in this country, and which might possibly be redressed, if made public through your means. It is well known, at least to philosophers who investigate such abstruse subjects, that there exists, in this kingdom, a certain race of people, who are denominated in Latin Bastardi, a name, for the etymology of which I must refer your readers to the learned Spelman, in his 'Glossarium Archæologicum.' It is, moreover, equally well known to the aforesaid philosophers, that these same Bastardi are a very numerous and increasing tribe, and that they are to be found in every nook and corner in the united kingdom. Now, the subject of my complaint (I am sure you will call it no trifle) is, that the law of England has, from time immemorial, styled these Bastardi 'filii Nullius,' or, in other words, 'Nobody's children,' although it is as notorious as the sun at noon day, or the moon at midnight (when at the full), that 'Somebody' is, in all cases, the father of this tribe. I appeal to you, therefore, Mr. Editor, and, through you, to an enlightened public, whether it be not a monstrous imposition, that this miscellaneous progeny, the unquestionable property of 'Somebody,' should be laid to my account. Though it were even true, as some have asserted, that I had more wealth than Solomon, and more patience than Job, I could not submit much longer to this injustice, and which I feel the more keenly, as it is inflicted under the sanction of laws, which make, on all occasions, so much boast of their equity and humanity.

Having noticed this act of oppression, I will detain you no longer than to enumerate two or three minor grievances, to which I am subject in this and other countries, and from which I should sincerely rejoice to be liberated. I have already stated, at the commencement of this letter, that whatever mischief is done, is, in nine cases out of ten, laid on my shoulders, while I have seldom, if ever, the credit of doing any good, which 'Somebody' or 'Anybody' is always ready enough to claim. It is on a principle similar to this, that, whenever a maiden assize happens,—I am sure to suffer:—Nobody is imprisoned—Nobody is whipped—Nobody is transported—and, in fine, Nobody is executed, which, but for my fortunate faculty of living for ever, would be by no means agreeable.

And again, even when I can escape such an untoward fate, by procuring 'Somebody' to be incarcerated, flagellated, transported, or hanged, in my stead, I am sure to have a world of employment thrown on my hands, that never belonged to me since, according to the well-known proverb, I am obliged to take up 'Everybody's business,' though I never get as much as a 'thank you, sir,' for my trouble. I will only mention two other petty oppressions, which, as they owe their birth to authors and painters, you may have some influence in relieving. One is, that an immense number of books is almost daily published in this metropolis, the reading of which falls exclusively to my lot, though, as you may well suppose from what I have just said, I have but little time to spare for such matters. Thus, to mention only one instance, it is I only, that have to analyze the beauties and unravel the mysteries of Mr. Southey's new poem, (if you will allow the term) which 'Everybody' refuses to open, and which would be quite unintelligible to 'Anybody.' Consequently, the learned author may well exclaim, as it is said he has done, with the Roman poet,—

— Mea NEMO

Scripta legi!—

I have mentioned this instance only as being one of the most recent; for, to particularize all the 'Peter Bellas,' 'Christabells,' and other bells of the same metal, which fall to my share and to mine alone, would weary, as Horace says, the 'loquacious Fabius' himself. I shall now pass, therefore, from poets to painters, and particularly to portrait painters, who do me the honour, on so many occasions, though quite unintentionally I will admit, of painting my likeness. For, who has not often heard it said of a portrait, that was designed, perhaps, to typify some celebrated general or cabinet minister,—'why, that is like Nobody.'—Now, with a due sense of the honour thus conferred on me, I must still protest against such common liberties being taken with my person, and the more so, as it sometimes happens, that the portrait is not very flattering. Most earnestly, therefore, do I conjure the whole tribe of portrait painters, that may enrich the approaching exhibition with the works of their pencil, to present the public with a likeness of 'Somebody,' or of 'Anybody,' rather than of

No. XXVII.

ON THE ORIGIN

THE INNS OF COURT, &c. &c.

INNS OF COURT, (Hospitia Curie.)—were considered as colleges for municipal or common law professors and students; and, anciently, the word inn signified a nobleman's or bishop's, or, indeed, any other eminent man's dwelling; and was synonymous to the French word hostel; as we find, that Walter Stapleton, Bishop of Exeter, built himself an inn, or town-house, near Temple Bar, called Exeter Inn, afterwards Paget House, since that Leicester House, and, lastly, Essex House, (the site of the present Essex Buildings.) As to the origin of these inns, the common suggestion is, that after King Henry III. had the courts of law removed from his own palace into Westminster Hall, which then used to follow his household from one end of the kingdom to the other, and was held before the King's Capital Justiciary of England, in the 'Aula Regie,' or such of his palaces wherein his royal person resided; and passed the act called Magna Charta, which contained an article*, that the Common Pleas should no longer follow the King's Court, but be held in some certain places; in consequence of which, the students of the municipal law, who were before dispersed about the kingdom, became at a better certainty where to exercise their functions, and began to form themselves into a kind of collegiate order. Being excluded from Oxford and Cambridge, they found it necessary to establish a new university of their own, where, as Spelman observes, they addicted themselves wholly to the study of the law, and settled in certain places, which they judged most convenient for their health and business, now called the Inns of Court and Chancery; here exercises were performed, lectures read, and degrees were at length conferred in the common law, as at other universities in the canon and civil; (the degrees were those of barristers, of which something further will be said hereafter.) And, for this purpose, the said King, in the 19th year of his reign, issued an order, directed to the Mayor and Sheriffs of London, commanding that no regent of any law schools within that city, should for the future teach law therein; and, likewise, King Edward I. appointed Meringham Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the other judges of that court, that they should provide from every county in England, certain attorneys to serve his court and people, and that they, and no other, should transact the business therein; he supposing about one hundred and forty to be sufficient for that purpose; but the judges had a discretionary power reserved to them, to add to or diminish the number, at their pleasure; from which time, it is reasonable to suppose, the first settlements in the inns took place. In the reign of Henry VI. they so flourished, that there were, in each of the above inns, about two hundred students, and a student then expended, annually, 30*l.*, which would have been a considerable sum in the present day, as a Mr. Chamberlayne, who wrote on this subject in the middle of the sixteenth century, says, it amounted to the yearly sum of 200*l.* at his time,—for they usually kept servants, besides tutors to instruct them; and, therefore, says Sir John Fortescue, 'Ultra studium legum, sunt quasi gymnasia omnium morum;' and the students were only, saith he, 'nobilium filii;' that is, gentlemen at least; for that was the common acceptation of the word nobilis, then. And, therefore, by command of King James, none were to be admitted into these colleges but gentlemen, by descent; as our ancestors thought those of an inferior rank would be rather derogatory than an ornament to the law.

There are, besides, two inns of sergeants, and eight inns of chancery. The two sergeants' inns are those where the common law student, when he had arrived to the highest degree of his profession, had his lodging and diet. These were called, 'sergentius ad legem,' sergeants at law. They were also named narratores, in Latin, and in the French, countours, i. e. pleaders. The first mention made of sergeants, or countours, is in the Stat. of West. 1, 3d of Edw. I. c. 29, and in Horn's Mirror of Justices, c. 1. s. 10; c. 2. s. 5. c. 3. s. 1. in the same reign. But Mr. Paris, in his life of John II. Abbot of St. Albans, which he wrote in 1253, 39th Henry III. speaks of advocates of the common law, or countours, (quos banci narratores vulgariter appellamus;) as an order of men well known; and we have an example of the antiquity of the coif in the same author's History of England, A. D. 1259, in the case of one Wm. De Bussy, who, being called to account for his great knavery and malpractices, claimed the benefit of his orders or clergy, which till then remained an entire secret. And Sir H. Spelman conjectures, that coifs were introduced to hide the tawdry of such renegade clerks as were tempted to remain in the secular courts, in the quality of advocates or judges, notwithstanding their prohibition by canon. Sergeants may be compared to doctors in the civil law, only these have heretofore had precedence, doctoris enim appellatio est magistris sergentis vero ministerii; and, therefore, doctors of law were allowed to sit within the bar, in chairs, and covered, whilst sergeants stood without, bare-headed, only with coifs or caps on.

Out of the sergeants are chosen, by letters patent, under the seal of the chancery, all the judges of the King's Bench and Common Pleas; this accounts for the custom of their wearing the white linen coif, which is emblematical of a sergeant; and which they had liberty so to do, even in the King's presence. Although the sergeants at present are numerous, yet it happened in the reign of Edward VI. that Serjeant Benlowes was the only one in England; and when he had occasion to describe himself, he did it in the following manner. 'Solus Serviens ad Legem,'

To these inns of sergeants belong the twelve judges, and all the sergeants; and Mr. Stowe, in his Survey of London, says they were built expressly for them.

The following are called inns of chancery:—Clifford's Inn, Clement's Inn, and Lyon's Inn, belong to the Inner Temple; New Inn, to the Middle Temple; Staple's Inn and Barnard's Inn, to Gray's Inn; Furnival's Inn and Thavies' Inn, to Lincoln's Inn. Mr. Stowe mentions* two other inns of chancery, viz. Scroope's Inn, near St. Andrew's Church, and Chester's, or Strand Inn, where Somerset House now stands; so called, says he, on account of its belonging to the bishop of Chester. These inns of chancery were inhabited chiefly by young students, to learn the elements of the law, who, as they became proficient, were admitted into the greater inns, called the inns of court; in these inns of chancery, the knights and barons, with other grandees and noblemen of the realm, used to place their children to be instructed in the law; and, in the reign of Henry VI. there were about two thousand students of this description in them. They were so called, says Fortescue, 'Quia studentes in illis, pro eorum parte majores, juvenes sunt.' Mr. Chamberlayne is of opinion, they were so named (chancery) because they were inhabited by clerks chiefly, that studied the preparing of writs, which regularly appertain to the cursitors, that are officers of the Court of Chancery. Christmas was a scene of great festivity and merriment, anciently, in the inns; they had feasting every day, singing, dancing, and music in their halls; and from All Saints' Day to Candlemas, each society usually had revels on holidays, (that is, music and dancing,) and one of the students was chosen to be master thereof.

The above societies are no corporations, nor have they any judicial power over their members, but have certain orders among themselves, which, by consent, have the force of laws. The expense of the house is chiefly defrayed by what is paid on admittances, and quit rents for their chambers.

Having noticed the origin of the inns of court generally, we shall, in our next, proceed to give a separate account of each inn of court and chancery.

Original Poetry.

TO SIR H— D—.

Occasioned by certain Hexameters.

Sir H—, give me leave to say,
You've done a thing you should be sorry
at;

Your heavenly witout acid gas
Has had such strange effects, alas!
That in a vision gone astray,
Our S—'s judgment's lost its way;—
And while I own with grief I feel it,
And the mouse blazes to reveal it,
Yet to avoid this sad suspense,
Which almost mad makes common sense,
You, dear Sir H—, and I'm sorry
To tell you such a painful story,—
You have deranged our poet laureate.

O. F.

STANZAS.

If we possess'd the richest vast
With which these isles abound,—
Would they atone for sorrows past,
Or heal a careless wound?

If we could claim these as our own,
Of what avail are they,—
Could they recall that spirit flown,
Or longer make its stay?

Could they retain her fleeting breath?
Could they prolong her hours?—
Ah! no—the insatiate hand of death
Defies all earthly powers.

Wealth cannot happiness redeem,
Or mitigate our woes;
But there's a fount, from whose soft stream,
Sweet soothing gently flow.

That fount—where sympathy and love
So tenderly combine—
In Harriet's breast is seen to move,
With purity divine.

FRAGMENT FROM OSSIAN*,

VERIFIED.

Oh! Aido, chieftain with the heart of pride,
The rising King of Morven stern replied,
Shall I defend thee I shall my people stand Against the injur'd King of Sora's land,
Who now, alas, will take them to their halls,
Or fast the strangers when the banquet calls;
Since Aido, of the little soul, has wrong'd
The King to whom his gratitude belong'd.
Hence, to thy native hills, and quit my sight,
For mournful is the battle we must fight.
Shade of the noble Trenmor, oh! declare,
When, when shall hapless Fingal cease to war;
In battle I was born, in battles bred,
Doom'd to behold my offspring round me dead;
E'en now the hostile spear I must resume,
And my steps move in slaughter to the tomb;
Yet this some consolation may bespeak,—
My hand hath done no injury to the weak,—
My bulchion never, 'mid the war's alarms,
Struck terror to the feeble race in arms.
Oh, Morven! all the tempests I discern,
Which shall thy stately mansions overturn,
When all my race in honour's field shall fall,
And none remain to dwell in helms of mail,—
Then shall the children of the feeble come
And search in vain;—they will not find my tomb.

My fame within the minstrel's bosom lies,
And, as a dream, to future times 't will rise.

SAR SPIRITALL.

* Battle of Sora.

SONNET.

The dark cloud is bow'ring o'er me,
The cold chill has seiz'd on my heart,—
The world, too, is sitting before me,
And a vision has bade me depart;
Has whisper'd, to quit a world like this,
For a region of pleasure—a realm of bliss.
Lov'd shade of my parent, why vanish,
To think that thou hast becom'd to me,
And all on this earth couldst thou banish,
To dwell but a moment with thee;
Yes, all on this earth—save one heavenly form,
Whose smile alone charms me thro' life's dark storm.
Thou smil'st, purest tenant of heaven,—
Thou smil'st, but it is in woe,
To think a loss there is given
By sorrow and anguish below;
To think the lov'd child of thy tender care,
Should now be the desolate son of despair.
And yet there is one, whose soft spirit
Is so like to thy virtues divine,
I can think her form the most beautiful
That purity harbour'd in thine—
Can think the Great Parent, to whom thou art
gone,
Has sent her to comfort thy heart-broken son.
There is that in thy radiance beaming,
Which holds me in region of bliss;
But the earthly one's soft lip is teasing
A sigh, as it covets the kiss:
And such is thy magical power o'er me,
It keeps me from heaven, from bliss, and thee.

BRITISH GALLERY.—No. IV.

'The child of fancy oft in silence bends
O'er these mixt treasures of his pregnant breast,
With conscious pride.'—AKENSIDE.

It is with pleasure that we turn from the abortion of talent, upon which, in our last essay, we felt it our painful duty to advert, in order to take another view of those splendid efforts of national genius, which decorate the Gallery of the British Institution. Many of these are such as do credit, as well to the artist whose name they bear, as to the country in which they were executed, and to the judgment of those who have assigned them a place on the walls of this magnificent establishment. From these we shall select a few as the subject of our present remarks, confining ourselves, however, in this paper, to the consideration of those exhibited in the Middle Room. The 'View of the Church of Notre Dame, at Poitiers' (90), by G. Jones, is a beautiful piece, of that order, however, in which delicacy of execution predominates over daring sublimity of effect, though not destitute of a portion of that management which is requisite to combine the minutiae of the portraiture into a pleasing and attractive whole.—Two small finished studies, by W. Payne, Nos. 96 and 104, are spirited and effective, though in the latter, 'A View of the Thames, looking towards Richmond Hill,' an inordinate and offensive degree of blue has been suffered to creep in, and chill the whole of the colouring.—An 'Evening Wood Scene,' by G. Barret, No. 91, is highly creditable to that artist, both with respect to the composition and the execution, more particularly as concerns the former. The waving character of the trees, agitated by the breeze, is remarkably well preserved; we cannot, however, but confess, that the general effect of colouring in this painting, a rawness, and disgusting crudity is but too observable among the generality of our younger artists. No. 105, 'Preparing for a masked Ball,' by J. Green, having been already exhibited at Somerset House, we shall content ourselves with merely mentioning it, observing, at the same time, that in spite of the general excellence of the picture, it might not unjustly be said to verge rather too much to the French school.—

* Where broad cloth breathes, to speak were satius strive,
And all, but Sir or Madam, are alive.'

A blueish deadness pervades the flesh tints, which produces this effect, and which is carried to a still more excessive degree in the shadows.—Two 'Views near Twickenham,' by C. Deane, Nos. 109 and 136, are extremely beautiful; they are well chosen, and the former, an evening effect, is particularly correct in point of likeness, and the gleaming of the western sun behind the trees, is represented with extraordinary force and elegance; the latter, a moonlight scene, is, perhaps, rather deficient in that silvery light which characterizes effects of this nature, as well as in that indistinctness of hue, which does not give way to the borrowed beams 'of the pale arbitress of night,' obedient only to the great alchemist of colour, the beam of the eye of day.—No. 92, Grapes; by J. Platt, Jun., is a very beautiful specimen of art, possessing, in a high degree, that brilliant transparency, in which a similar subject, No. 116, by J. Barney, Jun., is miserably deficient.—No. 112, The 'Tournament of Ashby de la Zouche and the Crowning of Il Diadichado,' by Stephanoff. In this animated and faithful, though spirited sketch, we instantly recognized the hand of the artist whose name it bears. It is a piece replete with energy and descriptive genius; and we hope, and trust that this will not be the last, the most extended, or the most finished form in which we shall have the pleasure of admiring this masterly though small production.—No. 114, 'A Composition,' from the Electra of Sophocles, though possessing great merit as an heroic landscape, is, nevertheless, lamentably imperfect as an historical scene; the figures are badly drawn, the composition slovenly, and the narrative void of pathos. We may add to this a fault which we have already commented upon as one of frequent occurrence, namely, a crudity and a want of finish discernible in the clouds, and the accidents of the picture.—No. 143, 'Conway Castle,' is one of the most interesting and picturesque views of this noble pile; it is by J. O. Tudor; the castle, seen as it is through a beautiful foreground, consisting of overarching trees, is, in a very great degree, superior in point of colouring and effect; though the foliage, &c. is, perhaps, rather too much inclined to a crude green, a colour to which the fashion of painting, a department certainly upon which the variable goddess has no right to intrude, seems, at present, rather too favourable, as that of the last age was a too great admixture of glowing and rich brown tints. A warm and vivid conception of Mr. Gandy's, being a landscape composition from Collins' Alva, almost tempts us to encroach still further on the patience of our readers, as well as a 'View of Lyons,' by Eliza Mastcall, No. 158; but our limits already admonish us to put the curb upon our inclinations, and we must pass to the 'View of Naples,' in a thunder storm, by T. Barker, No. 157, a piece equally remarkable for strength of composition and beauty of execution; for sublimity of subjects and pathos of description, in which the diligent observer of nature and the powerful embodiment of her most striking phenomena are equally discernible.—We would observe, on No. 152, 'A Bridge at Beckenham,' that it should rather have been entitled 'a bridge';—we do not mean to insinuate by this, that we required such a title to perceive that it was intended for such a structure, as we have no particular fault to find with it as a work of art, but merely that the dissimilarity between the copy and the original scene might be less glaring to those who, like ourselves, are acquainted with the identical object; indeed, we scarcely ever saw a stronger specimen of the abuse of the liberty which a painter may possess of making his subject picturesque, and that too upon a subject sufficiently so of itself.—No. 155, 'The young Hero disarmed,' by Farmer; 169, 'The meeting of Penelope and Ulysses,' by Hilton; and Haines's 'Sappho,' 167, are all works of the highest merit, especially the first, which proves the artist to be a worthy competitor of W. Kidd, whom he strongly resembles in point of manner and subject. We must defer our remarks on the south room to our next and concluding paper on the British Gallery.

W. H. PARRY.

The Drama.

DREDDY LANE.—Operas still continue their 'triumphant success' but we are happy to find Mr. Hayne's tragedy of Conscience announced for Monday next, in consequence of numerous inquiries. This does not surprise us, for we should really almost be led to suspect the good taste of the public, if this tragedy was not much admired.

The Oratorio at this theatre, on Wednesday night, was an admirable selection, and attracted a crowded audience. The first act consisted almost entirely of pieces by Handel and Mozart, and concluded with Bockan's Quartetto, which was, as usual, endorsed. Mr. Kiesewetter played some popular airs of Mozart's on the violin, of which instrument he is a perfect master, as well in elegance as in brilliancy. The second act was chiefly from the Così fan tutti and Figaro. One of the eccentricities of the evening, was a duet between Braham and Pyne—a duet between Othello and Iago;—this is really too bad. Shakespeare is sadly treated at this house; his statue is turned out of doors, and placed in a most lamentable position on the portico; and his immortal productions are metamorphosed on the stage. Braham, Madame Comparse, and Mrs. Salmon, sung frequently, and were much applauded; and the Oratorio, on the whole, was the best of the season.

COVENT GARDEN.—On Wednesday night, Miss Dance appeared in the character of Belvidera, in Otway's tragedy of Venice Preserved, and did more than justify the expectations which her performance of Mrs. Haller had excited. In scenes of tenderness, as well as in several passages of strong sensibility, she produced a pleasing and powerful impression. The well-known words to Jaffier,—"I know thou'll kill me," were spoken by her in the true tone of nature and feminine terror. The adieu, in the third act, 'Remember, twelve!' was uttered by Miss Dance with a tenderness of tone and a sweetness of inflexion, and even a novelty of manner, which left nothing to be wished for; and her whole performance of the character was such as to place her in the first rank in the tragic drama. C. Kemble played the love-sick, whining conspirator, Jaffier, with admirable truth and correctness. Mr. Macready was the Pierre of the evening, and we confess he disappointed us. It was a very unequal performance. The tragedy is to be repeated this evening, (Thursday,) when, we are told, 'all orders must be stopped at the doors;' this, we doubt not, will be the case, but, as Mr. Dibdin once said, in one of his humorous bills, 'the bearers will be permitted to walk up without any other check than that given them by the door keeper.' Miss Dance needs not the meretricious aid of puffing.

The Daemna has been produced at this theatre with great success, Miss Hallande, in Carlos, and Miss Stephens, in Clara, were admirable.

MR. MATHEWS AT HOME.—We are happy to find that this gentleman, who has contributed more to the amusements of the metropolis than any other individual, continues to attract crowded houses—a very satisfactory and conclusive evidence of the merits of the entertainments.

OURANOLOGIA.—The proprietor of the English Opera House is indefatigable in providing for the amusement and instruction of the public. Mr. Mathews goes through his adventures in the air, earth, and water, and the remaining three nights are most delightfully employed by Mr. Bartley, who has soared higher than Mr. Mathews, and exhibits the phenomena of the heavens. Of all the astronomical lectures which have been given in town, with orreries and eidouranions, that of Mr. Bartley is decidedly the best. The machinery is remarkably ingenious and accurate, and presents a complete view of the system of planetary motion, preserving the relative proportions of the different revolving bodies as to size, velocity, and distance from the sun. The satellites of the different planets are exhibited with the same precision, and the theory of the tides explained by the action of the moon. To the scientific student, and to young persons, we particularly recommend this lecture, which, while it explains to them the wonders of the universe, will teach them to 'look from nature up to nature's God!'

SURREY THEATRE.—This theatre closed a very successful season on Thursday night last, when the performances were for the benefit of Mrs. Dibdin, who was deservedly honoured with a brilliant audience. A new piece was produced, as a rehearsal for the holidays, under the title of Alonso and Imogen. It is an interesting and magnificent spectacle. Mrs. Dibdin delivered an address in the character of Queen Elizabeth, in which she whimsically announced the preparations for the ensuing campaign. The friends of the Surrey, (and, they are numerous, even on our side of the water,) will be glad to hear that the house is undergoing an entire splendid decoration, previous to its opening on Easter Monday.

MISS MACAULEY.—This lady is attracting the fashionables at the west end of the town, to her little theatre, in King Street, which, notwithstanding its inconvenience for want of ventilation, is generally crowded with an elegant audience. It is honourable to the feelings of the public thus to patronize a lady of talents, who has thrown herself on their support.

M. ALEXANDRE.—'Last, not least, in our dear love' of amusement, comes M. Alexandre, who filled the great room at the Freemason's Tavern, on Saturday night, with elegant company, and delighted them by his vocal illusions: This gentleman's wonderful talents are calculated equally to interest and amuse the professor of natural philosophy and the votary of pleasure.

MR. KEAN IN AMERICA.—The highest compliment ever offered to dramatic genius and talents, has been paid to Mr. Kean, in Boston. Independent of paying the regular admission, the premiums for the sale of boxes, which amounted to a considerable sum, have been appropriated to charitable objects. The poor will long remember Mr. Kean.—New York Paper.

Literature and Science.

MR. W. D. Robinson has in the press, Memoirs of the Revolution of Mexico; with a History of the Campaign of General Mina; Anecdotes of his Life; and Observations on the Practicability of uniting the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, by means of navigable canals.

Colour of the Skin.—At a late meeting of the Royal Society, Sir Everard Home communicated some observations on the influence of the black substance in the skin of the Negro, in preventing the scorching operation of the sun's rays. As black surfaces become much warmer by exposure to the sun's rays than those which are white, or of paler tints, the cause of the black colour in the Negro has long appeared problematical to the physiologist. In this paper Sir Everard shows, that by exposing the back of the hand, and other parts of the body, covered with thin white linen, to the direct influence of the sun's rays, they become irritated and inflamed; small specks or freckles first appear: and these, on continued exposure, are followed by a vesicular separation of the cuticle: the same happens when the bare surface is exposed, which, in common language, becomes sun-burnt. When, however, the part of the body thus exposed is covered with a piece of black crape, though the temperature of such part, when exposed to the bright sunshine, exceeds that produced upon the bare skin, the scorching and blistering influence of the rays is entirely prevented; hence it appears, that the deleterious effects of the sun's rays are prevented by an artificial blackening of the surface of the skin; that perspiration becomes more copious, as is especially remarked in the Negro; and, in short, that the conversion of the radiant matter of the sun into sensible heat, which conversion is effected by the black surface, tends to prevent the scorching effects, and to promote the cuticular secretion.

American Academy of Language and Belles Lettres.—It is with pleasure (says a United States paper of the 11th of March) that we are enabled to announce the complete organization of this National Institution. The following is a list of the officers for the present year, and that of the private members is composed of names hardly less distinguished:—

President.—His Ex. John Quincy Adams, Sec. of State—Washington.

Vice Presidents.—Hon. Brockholst Livingston, Judge Supreme Court U. S. N. York; Hon. Joseph Story, do. do. do. Mass.; and Hon. William Lowndes, Member of Congress—South Carolina.

Corresponding Secretary.—William S. Cardell, Esq. New York.

Recording Secretary.—Rev. Alex-

Treasurer.—John Stearns, M. D. President N. York State Medical Society.

Councillors.—Hon. James Kent, LL. D. Chancellor of the State of New York; Hon. Daniel Webster, Boston—late Member of Congress; Rt. Rev. C. Brownell, LL. D. Bishop of Connecticut; Rev. John M. Mason, D.D. N. York; Hon. Joseph Hopkinson, New Jersey, late Member of Congress; Peter S. Du Pont, LL. D. Philadelphia; John Augustin Smith, M. D. President William and Mary College, Virg.; Hon. John L. Taylor, Chief Justice, North Carolina; Hon. Henry Clay, Kentucky; Washington Irving, Esq. now in London.

The following gentlemen have been appointed, in behalf of the Institution, trustees to receive donations, and make such investments of them as they may deem 'most secure and productive for the permanent and important purposes of the institution.'—Col. Richard Varick; Hon. B. Livingston; Hon. C. D. Colden, Mayor of N. York, William S. Cardell, Esq.; and Dr. John Stearns.

A few days since, in Paris, a wag thought he would make some fun on the Boulevards, by cutting the string of a blind man's dog; but he had not long to rejoice at the success of his wit, for the blind man opened his eyes, followed the wag, at speed through the crowd, caught him, and belaboured his shoulders well with his oaken towel, to the great amusement of all present; then tranquilly returned to his dog, tied the string, closed his eyes, and went on as if nothing had happened, crying pity the poor blind, give a half-penny to the poor blind man.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The attention of Advertisers is particularly called to the peculiar advantages that must result from their Advertisements being placed in the columns of The Literary Chronicle, over any weekly or daily publication. Besides finding a station in a work of permanent interest and constant reference, it must be obvious that they come directly before the eye and under the immediate notice of the reader, who is looking for novelties in literature and subjects connected with the Arts and Sciences. Far different are the views of the readers of journal journals, where the news of the day is the principal object of pursuit, and where the crowded miscellaneous advertisements bury or exclude those for which a literary paper is evidently a fitter medium.

* * To insure immediate insertion, it is requested that Advertisements may be sent by Thursday, at the latest, the extent of the weekly impression of the Literary Chronicle, requiring that the work should go to press early.

Table Talk; or, Original Essays. By William Hazlitt. 8vo. pp. 400. London, 1821.

Let the world say what it will of Mr. Hazlitt,—and it has almost said as severe things of him as he has done of it,—he is a clever writer. Notwithstanding his strong prejudices, his eccentricity, his egotism, and his pedantry, there is a great deal of originality about him, and he has an honest bluntness, which calls things by their right names. This is observable in all his writings, whether they are on plays or politics, poetry or painting; and all these are favourite subjects with him, which he has often treated with great ability.

Although we deem 'Table Talk' a very incorrect title for 'Original Essays,' yet we will not quarrel with the author on this account, conscious that table talk is seldom half so interesting or instructive as a page or two of this volume. To us it appears, that if this work is not one of Mr. Hazlitt's best productions, it is one of the least exceptionable. There is less of politics in it, and even his prejudices and personalities are not so acrimonious as formerly. In succinctness of remark, and terseness of expression, these essays are equal to any of the author's former works.

The volume contains sixteen essays on the following subjects:—On the Pleasure of Painting—On the Past and Future—On Genius and Common Sense—Character of Cobbett—On People with one Idea—On the Ignorance of the Learned—The Indian Jugglers—On Living to One's self—On Thought and Action—Will-making—On certain Inconsistencies in Sir Joshua Reynolds's Discourses—On Paradox and Common Place,—and on Vulgarity and Affectation.

The essays 'On the Pleasure of Painting,' and 'On the Ignorance of the Learned,' have already appeared in periodical publications; we shall, therefore, pass them over, to notice some of those which make their first appearance before the public in the present volume. In the 'Essay on the Past and the Future,' Mr. Hazlitt sets out with declaring he conceives that 'the past is as real and substantial a part of our being, that it is as much a bona fide undeniable consideration in the estimate of human life, as the future can possibly be;' and that, 'neither in itself, nor as a subject of general contemplation, has the future any advantage over the past.' With respect, however, to our grosser passions and pursuits, he admits that it has. He says,—

'As far as regards the appeal to the understanding or the imagination, the past is just as good, as real, of as much intrinsic and ostensible value as the future; but there is another principle in the human mind, the principle of action or will; and of this the past has no hold, the future engrosses it entirely to itself. It is this strong lever of the affections that gives so powerful a bias to our sentiments on this subject, and violently transposes the natural order of our associations. We regret the pleasures we have lost, and eagerly anticipate those which are to come; we dwell with satisfaction on the evils from which we have escaped, (post-hæc meminisse iuvat), and dread future pain. The good that is passed is in this sense like money that is spent, which is of no further use, and about which we give ourselves little concern. The good we expect is like a store yet untouched, and in the enjoyment of which we promise ourselves infinite gratification. What has happened to us we think of no consequence; what is to happen to us, of the greatest. Why so? Simply because the one is still in our power, and the other not,—because the efforts of the will to bring any object to pass, or to prevent it, strengthen our attachment or aversion to that object,—because the pains and attention bestowed upon anything, add to our interest in it, and because the habitual and earnest pursuit of any end redoubles the ardour of our expectations, and converts the speculative and indolent satisfaction we might otherwise feel in it, into real passion.'

In the essay on 'Genius and Common Sense,' there is a great deal of acute reasoning and smartness of observation, tending to establish what Madame de Staël has said in a very few words; namely, that 'genius is nothing more than good sense intent upon new ideas;' or, as he himself expresses it, 'some strong quality in the mind, answering to and bringing out some new and striking quality in nature.' In this essay, Mr. Hazlitt gives a singular character of Mr. Wordsworth, whom he declares to be 'the greatest, that is the most original, poet of the present day, only because he is the greatest egotist.' This conclusion does not by any means satisfy us, and we can never consider egotism as a test or even a mark of genius or originality. Were this the case, our author's friend, Mr. Leigh Hunt, would be at once deemed the most original prose writer of the present day, Mr. Hazlitt himself not even excepted. In the distinction which our author draws between capacity and genius, we perfectly agree with him. He says,—

'Capacity is not the same thing as genius. Capacity may be described to relate to the quantity of knowledge, however acquired; genius to its quality and the mode of acquiring it. Capacity is a power over given ideas or combinations of ideas; genius is the power over those which are not given, and for which no obvious or precise rule can be laid down. Our capacity is power of any sort; genius is power of a different sort from what has yet been shown. A retentive memory, a clear understanding is capacity, but it is not genius; the admirable Crichton was a person of prodigious capacity; but there is no proof (that I know) that he had an atom of genius. His verses that remain are dull and sterile. He could learn all that was known of any subject; he could do any thing if others could show him the way to do it. This was very wonderful, but this is all you can say of it. It requires a good capacity to play well at chess; but, after all, it is a game of skill, and not of genius. Know what you will of it, the understanding still moves in certain tracts in which others have trod before it, quicker or slower, with more or less comprehension and presence of mind. The greatest skill strikes out nothing for itself, from its own peculiar resources; the nature of the game is a thing determined and fixed; there is no royal or poetical road to checkmate your adversary. There is no place for genius but in the indefinite and unknown. The discovery of the binomial theorem was an effort of genius; but there was none shown in Jedediah Buxton's being able to multiply nine figures by nine in his head. If he could have multiplied ninety figures by ninety, instead of nine, it would have been equally useless toil and trouble. He is a man of capacity who possesses considerable intellectual riches; he is a man of genius who finds out a vein of new ore. Originality is the seeing nature differently from others, and yet as it is in itself. It is not singularity or affectation, but the discovery of new and valuable truth.

The sixth Essay is on the character of Cobbett, in which that versatile and unprincipled, but powerful writer, is painted to the life. The essay is much too long for insertion, and we must, therefore, content ourselves with a few extracts. Speaking of Cobbett, our author says,—

"He has been compared to Paine; and so far it is true there are no two writers who come more into juxtaposition from the nature of their subjects, from the internal resources on which they draw, and from the popular effect of their writings and their adaptation, (though that is a bad word in the present case,) to the capacity of every reader. But still, if we turn to a volume of Paine's, (his Common Sense or Rights of Man), we are struck, (not to say somewhat refreshed,) by the difference. Paine is a much more sententious writer than Cobbett. You cannot open a page in any of his best and earlier works, without meeting with some maxim, some antithetical and memorable saying, which is a sort of starting-place for the argument, and the goal to which it returns. There is not a single bon mot, a single sentence in Cobbett, that has ever been quoted again. If any thing is ever quoted from him, it is an epithet of abuse, or a nickname. He is an excellent hand at invention in that way, and has "damnable iteration in him." What could be better than his pestered Erskine year after year with his second title of Baron Clackmannan? He is rather too fond of the sons and daughters of Corruption. Paine affected to reduce things to first principles, to announce self-evident truths. Cobbett troubles himself about little but the details and local circumstances. The first appeared to have made up his mind beforehand to certain opinions, and to try to find the most compendious and pointed expressions for them; his successor appears to have no clue, no fixed or leading principles, nor ever to have thought on a question till he sits down to write about it; but then there seems no end of his matters of fact and raw materials, which are brought out in all their strength and sharpness, from not having been squared or frittered down, of vamped up to suit a theory—he goes on with his descriptions and illustrations as if he would never come to a stop; they have all the force of novelty with all the familiarity of old acquaintance; his knowledge grows out of the subject, and his style is that of a man who has an absolute intuition of what he is talking about, and never thinks of any thing else. He deals in premises and speaks to evidence—the coming to a conclusion and summing up, (which was Paine's forte) lies in a smaller compass. The one could not compose an elementary treatise on politics, to become a manual for the popular reader; nor could the other, in all probability, have kept up a weekly journal for the same number of years, with the same spirit, interest, and untired perseverance. Paine's writings are a sort of introduction to political arithmetic on a new plan; Cobbett keeps a day-book, and makes an entry at full of all the occurrences and troublesome questions that start up throughout the year. Cobbett, with vast industry, vast information, and the utmost power of making what he says intelligible, never seems to get at the beginning or come to the end of any question; Paine, in a few short sentences, seems, by his peremptory manner, "to clear it from all controversy, past, present, and to come." Paine takes a bird's-eye view of things. Cobbett sticks close to them, inspects the component parts, and keeps fast hold of the smallest advantages they afford him. Or, if I might here be indulged in a pastoral allusion, Paine tries to enclose his ideas in a fold for security and repose; Cobbett lets his pour out upon the plain like a flock of sheep, to feed and batten. Cobbett is a pleasanter writer for those to read who do not agree with him; for he is less dogmatical, goes more into the common grounds of fact and argument to which all appeal, is more desultory and various, and appears less to be driving at a previous conclusion than urged on by the force of present conviction. He is, therefore, tolerated by all parties, though he has made himself by turns obnoxious to all; and even those he abuses read him. The reformers read him when he was a tory, and the tories read him now that he is a reformer. He must, I think, however, be caviare to the whigs."

'As a political partisan, no one can stand against him. With his brandished club, like Giant Despair, in the Pilgrim's Progress, he knocks out their brains; and not only no individual, but no corrupt system could hold out against his powerful and repeated attacks; but with the same weapon, swung round like a flail, that he levels his antagonists, he lays his friends low, and puts his own party hors de combat. This is a bad propensity, and a worse principle in political tactics, though a common one. If his blows were straight forward and steadily directed to the same object, no unpopular minister could live before him; instead of which he lays about right and left, impartially and remorselessly, makes a clear stage, has all the ring to himself, and then runs out of it, just when he should stand his ground. He throws his head into his adversary's stomach, and takes away from him all inclination for the fight, hits fair or foul, strikes at every thing, and as you come up to his aid or stand ready to pursue his advantage, trips up your heels or lays you sprawling, and pummels you when down as much to his heart's content as ever the Yanguestan carriers belaboured Rosinante with their pack-staves. "He has the back-trick simply the best of any man in Illyria." He pays off both scores of old friendship and new-acquired enmity in a breath, in one perpetual volley, one raking fire of "arrowy sleet" shot from his pen. However his own reputation or the cause may suffer in consequence, he cares not one pin about that, so that he disables all who oppose, or who pretend to help him. In fact, he cannot bear success of any kind, not even of his own views or party; and if any principle were likely to become popular, would turn round against it to shew his power in shouldering it on one side. In short, wherever power is, there is he against it: he naturally butts at all obstacles, as unicorns are attracted to oak-trees, and feels his own strength only by resistance to the opinions and wishes of the rest of the world. To sail with the stream, to agree with the company, is not his humour. If he could bring about a reform in parliament, the odds are, that he would instantly fall foul of and try to mar his own handy-work; and he quarrels with his own creatures as soon as he has written them into a little vogue—and a prison. I do not think this is vanity or fickleness so much as a pugnacious disposition, that must have an antagonist power to contend with, and only finds itself at ease in systematic opposition. If it were not for this, the high towers and rotten places of the world would fall before the battering-ram of his hard-headed reasoning; but if he once found them tottering, he would apply his strength to prop them up, and disappoint the expectations of his followers. He cannot agree to any thing established, nor to set up any thing else in its stead. While it is established, he presses hard against it, because it presses upon him, at least in imagination. Let it crumble under his grasp, and the motive to resistance is gone. He then requires some other grievance to set his face against. His principle is repulsion, his nature contradiction: he is made up of mere antipathies, an Ishmaelite, indeed, without a fellow. He is always playing at hunt-the-slipper in politics. He turns round upon whoever is next him. The way to wear him from any opinion, and make him conceive an intolerable hatred against it, would be to place somebody near him who was perpetually dinning it in his ears. When he is in England, he does nothing but abuse the borough-mongers, and laugh at the whole system: when he is in America, he grows impatient of freedom and a republic. If he had staid there a little longer, he would have become a loyal and a loving subject of his Majesty King George IV. He lampooned the French revolution when it was hailed as the dawn of liberty by millions: by the time it was brought into almost universal ill-odour by some means or other (partly, no doubt, by himself) he had turned, with one, or two, or three others, staunch Buonapartist.

Mr. Hazlitt, with an evident partiality for Cobbett, says, that he is 'a very honest man, with a total want of principle.' We leave our readers to reconcile this contradiction, for Mr. Hazlitt's solution of the 'paradox,' which he admits it to be, is by no means satisfactory.

The next essay is 'on People with one Idea,' and to prove that there are really such beings in the world, Mr. Hazlitt names three well known characters, Major Cartwright, Alderman Wood, and Mr. Owen. He commences with the Major:—

'There is Major C——: he has but one idea or subject of discourse, Parliamentary Reform. Now, Parliamentary Reform is (as far as I know) a very good thing, a very good idea, and a very good subject to talk about: but why should it be the only one? To hear the worthy and gallant Major resume his favourite topic, is like law-business, or a person who has a suit in Chancery going on. Nothing can be attended to, nothing can be talked of but that. Now it is getting on, now again it is standing still; at one time the master has promised to pass judgment by a certain day, at another he has put it off again and called for more papers, and both are equally reasons for speaking of it. Like the piece of pack-thread in the barrister's hands, he turns and twists it all ways, and cannot proceed a step without it. Some school-boys cannot read but in their own book: and the man of one idea cannot converse out of his own subject. Conversation it is not; but a sort of recital of the preamble of a bill, or a collection of grave arguments for a man's being of eccentricity in all this; but that is not the case. It is a political homily personified, a walking common-place we have to encounter and listen to. It is just as if a man was to insist on your hearing him go through the fifth chapter of the Book of Judges every time you meet, or like the story of the Cosmogony, in the Vicar of Wakefield. It is a tune played on a barrel-organ. It is a common vehicle of discourse into which they get and are set down when they please, without any pains or trouble to themselves. Neither is it professional pedantry or trading quackery: it has no excuse. The man has no more to do with the question which he saddles on all his hearers than you have. This is what makes the matter hopeless. If a farmer talks to you about his pigs or his poultry, or a physician about his patients, or a lawyer about his briefs, or a merchant about stock, or an author about himself, you know how to account for this: it is a common infirmity, you have a laugh at his expense, and there is no more to be said. But here is a man who goes out of his way to be absurd, and is troublesome by a romantic effort of generosity. You cannot say to him, "All this may be interesting to you, but I have no concern in it;" you cannot put him off in that way. He retorts the Latin adage upon you—Nihil humani a me alienum puto. He has got possession of a subject which is of universal and paramount interest (not "a fee grief, due to some single breast")—and on that plea may hold you by the button as long as he chooses. His delight is to harangue on what nowise regards himself: how then can you refuse to listen to what as little amuses you? Time and tide wait for no man. The business of the state admits of no delay. The question of Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments stand first on the order of the day—takes precedence in its own right of every other question. Any other topic, grave or gay, is looked upon in the light of impertinence, and sent to Coventry.

Alderman Wood gets off easily; the author only supposing that he has 'talked of nothing but the queen, in all companies, for the last six months. Happy Alderman Wood!' The enthusiastic but benevolent Apostle of New Lanark, is painted with great truth; and, with his portrait, we must close for the present:—

'Mr. Owen is a man remarkable for one idea. It is that of himself and the Lanark cotton-mills. He carries this idea backwards and forwards with him from Glasgow to London, and expects to find it in the same state of purity and perfection in the latter place as at the former. He acquires a wonderful velocity and impetuosity in his undaunted transit. Resistance to him is vain, while the whirling motion of the mail-coach remains in his head.

"Nor Alps nor Apennines can keep him out, Nor fortified redoubt."

'He even got possession, in the suddenness of his onset, of the steam engine of the Times newspaper, and struck off ten thousand wood-cuts of the Projected Villages, which afforded an ocular demonstration to all who saw them of the practicability of Mr. Owen's whole scheme. He comes into a room with one of these documents in his hand, with the air of a schoolmaster and a quack-doctor mixed, asks very kindly, how you do, and on hearing you are still in an indifferent state of health owing to bad digestion, instantly turns round, and observes, "that all that will be remedied in his plan: that, indeed, he thinks too much attention has been paid to the mind, and not enough to the body; that, in his system, which he has now perfected, and which will shortly be generally adopted, he has provided effectually for both: that he has been long of opinion, that the mind depends altogether on the physical organization, and where the latter is neglected or disordered, the former must languish and want its due vigour: that exercise is, therefore, a part of his system, with full liberty to develop every faculty of mind and body: that two objections had been made to his New View of Society, viz. its want of relaxation from labour, and its want of variety; but the first of these, the too great restraint, he trusted he had already answered, for where the powers of mind and body were freely exercised and brought out, surely liberty must be allowed to exist in the highest degree; and, as to the second, the monotony which would be produced by a regular and general plan of co-operation, he conceived he had proved in his 'New View' and 'Addresses to the higher Classes;' that the co-operation he had recommended was necessarily conducive to the most extensive improvement of the ideas and faculties, and where this was the case, there must be the greatest possible variety instead of a want of it." And, having said this, this expert and sweeping orator takes up his hat and walks down stairs after reading his lecture of truisms like a play-bill or an apothecary's advertisement; and, should you stop him at the door, to say, by way of putting in a word in common, that Mr. Southey seems somewhat favourable to his plan, in his late letter to Mr. William Smith, he looks at you with a smile of pity at the fatuity of all opposition and the idleness of all encouragement. People who thus swell out some rapid scheme of their own into undue importance, seem to me to labour under water in the head—to exhibit a huge hydrocephalus! They may be very worthy people for all that, but they are bad companions and very indifferent reasoners. Tom Moore says, of some one somewhere, "That he puts his hand in his breeches' pocket, like a crocodile." The phrase is hieroglyphical: but Mr. Owen and others might be said to put their foot in the question of social improvement and reform much in the same unaccountable manner.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Memoirs from 1754 to 1758. By James Earl Waldegrave, K. G. one of his Majesty's Privy Council, in the reign of George II. and Governor to the Prince of Wales, afterwards George III. 4to. pp. 174. London, 1821.

THERE are many subjects to which we are more partial than the secret history of courts, or the intrigues of courtiers: the latter are events of such every day occurrence, that they scarcely can be come matter of history, especially as the truth is seldom discovered until a lapse of years has deprived them of much of their interest. This is certainly the case with the Memoirs of the Earl Waldegrave, now before us, which, though detailing minutely the ministerial intrigues of the day, can scarcely be expected to possess much interest after a lapse of upwards of sixty years. 'Such memoirs, however, if not always interesting, are frequently instructive; and the noble earl, in the conclusion of his works, adds one more to the thousand confutations which the declaration of the wisest of men has received, that 'all is vanity and vexation of spirit.' Who can envy the dependents of a court; if the Earl Waldegrave, who was a constant favourite, was constrained to paint it as so wretched a life? In his concluding reflections, he says,—

'I have now finished my relation of all the material transactions wherein I was immediately concerned; and though I can never forget my obligations to the kindest of masters, I have been too long behind the scenes, I have had too near a view of the machinery of a court, to envy any man either the power of a minister or the favour of princes.

'The constant anxiety and frequent mortifications which accompany ministerial employments, are tolerably well understood; but the world is totally unacquainted with the situation of those whom fortune has selected to be the constant attendants and companions of royalty, who partake of its domestic amusements and social happiness.

'But I must not lift up the veil; and shall only add, that so man can have a clear conception how great personages pass their leisure hours, who has not been a prince's governor or a king's favourite.'

Although we have spoken rather slightly of works of this description, yet we are not insensible that they are of some value in enabling us to trace events to their causes, and thus are of some importance in the history of the period to which they relate. These Memoirs throw considerable light on the politics and the changes of administration, which occurred during the latter years of the reign of George II, and they may be depended upon for their fidelity.

From an address to the reader, we learn that Earl Waldegrave's grandfather married a daughter of James the Second, by Arabella Churchill, sister to the great Duke of Marlborough, and was created by that king a baron, but never took his seat in the House of Lords. The earl, whose work is before us, was born in March, 1714-15, and was, at an early period of life, well instructed in ancient and modern languages. Though the state of parties still rendered Catholic and Jacobite connexions (and such were those of the earl) very formidable barriers to promotion at court, yet Lord Waldegrave, gaining the personal favour of George the Second, surmounted them both very rapidly. In 1743, he was appointed a lord of the bedchamber, and, on the death of Frederick, Prince of Wales, he was made master of the stanneries. On the resignation or removal of the Earl of Harcourt from the office of governor to the Prince of Wales, (afterwards George III.) the king pressed the appointment on Earl Waldegrave, who accepted it with hesitation, and, during the four years that he retained the office, he neither acquired the confidence of his pupil nor succeeded in ingratiating himself with the princess dowager. New intrigues rendering a change again desirable, the earl resigned his office, and assisted the king in negotiating various new administrations at the commencement of the seven years' war. These events form the chief subject of his work, for, although he lived to the year 1763, yet he refused all appointments under the new monarch, and has not extended his Memoirs later than the year 1758. The work is printed from a MS. in the hand-writing of the author, which was found by his heirs after his death, and has remained ever since in the possession of the Waldegrave family. It has been evidently intended for posterity, though no injunction was left as to the mode or period of giving it to the public. The MS. had been communicated to Lord Orford, who speaks of it with great praise, in his printed correspondence, and has borrowed some remarks, and even expressions from it. The editor has given the Memoirs to the world as he found them. He says, 'not a syllable has been suppressed. Neither comment nor emendation have been deemed necessary.' Some marginal notes, and an appendix of original letters, principally from Mr. Fox, which elucidate some passages in the text, have been added; and these conclude the labours of the editor.

The style of the Memoirs is clear, plain, and perspicuous; and many of the reflections are rather those of a philosopher than of a politician or a courtier. Indeed, we think Lord Waldegrave was a very honest man, without sufficient ambition for a minister, and wanting in the servility essential to a courtier.

The work commences with sketches of the principal political royal characters of the day, including George II, the Princess Dowager, his late venerable Majesty then Prince of Wales, the Duke of Cumberland, the Duke of Newcastle, Mr. Murray, afterwards Lord Mansfield, Earl of Bute, Lord Anson, Duke of Devonshire, Sir Thomas Robinson, Mr. Pitt, Mr. Fox, Mr. Pelham, Lords Hardwick and Holderness, &c. The whole of these persons are gone to that tribunal where their characters will be more justly weighed than in the balance of public opinion, and the conduct and characters of many of them can scarcely now be deemed matters of interest. We shall, however, notice one or two of them.

George the Second is described as possessing 'a good understanding, though not of the first class; with a clear insight into men and things within a certain compass.' His great attention to money was his capital failing, but he was 'always just, and sometimes charitable, though seldom generous.' 'Upon the whole,' says his lordship, 'he has some qualities of a great prince, many of a good one; none which are essentially bad.' This we consider as no mean praise in a sovereign.

The reign of our late beloved monarch was so long and memorable, and his death so recent, that we yet feel considerable interest in every thing that relates to him. We, therefore, quote Lord Waldegrave's portrait of him, written in 1758, at length. He says,—

'The Prince of Wales is entering into his 21st year, and it would be unfair to decide upon his character in the early stages of life, when there is so much time for improvement.

'His parts, though not excellent, will be found very tolerable, if ever they are properly exercised.

'He is strictly honest, but wants that frank and open behaviour which makes honesty appear amiable.

'When he had a very scanty allowance, it was one of his favourite maxims that men should be just before they are generous: his income is now very considerably augmented, but his generosity has not increased in equal proportion.

'His religion is free from all hypocrisy, but is not of the most charitable sort; he has rather too much attention to the sins of his neighbour.

'He has spirit, but not of the active kind; and does not want resolution, but it is mixed with too much obstinacy.

‘He has great command of his passions, and will seldom do wrong, except when he mistakes wrong for right; but as often as this shall happen, it will be difficult to undeceive him, because he is uncommonly indolent, and has strong prejudices.’

‘His want of application and aversion to business would be far less dangerous, he was eager in the pursuit of pleasure; for the transition from pleasure to business is both shorter and easier than from a state of total inaction.’

‘He has a kind of unhappiness in his temper, which, if it be not conquered before it has taken too deep a root, will be a source of frequent anxiety. Whenever he is displeased, his anger does not break out with heat and violence; but he becomes sullen and silent, and retires to his closet; not to compose his mind by study or contemplation, but merely to indulge the melancholy enjoyment of his own ill humour. Even when the fit is ended, unfavourable symptoms very frequently return, which indicate that on certain occasions his Royal Highness has too correct a memory.’

‘Though I have mentioned his good and bad qualities, without flattery and without aggravation, allowances should still be made, on account of his youth and his bad education: for, though the Bishop of Peterborough, now Bishop of Salisbury, the preceptor; Mr. Stone, the sub-governor; and Mr. Scott, the sub-preceptor, were men of sense, men of learning, and worthy good men, they had but little weight and influence. The mother and the nursery always prevailed.’

‘During the course of the last year, there has, indeed, been some alteration; the authority of the nursery has gradually declined, and the Earl of Bute, by the assistance of the mother, has now the entire confidence. But whether this change will be greatly to his Royal Highness’s advantage, is a nice question, which cannot hitherto be determined with any certainty.’

Of Mr. Pitt, the great Lord Chamberlain, Lord Waldegrave says,—

‘Mr. Pitt has the finest genius, improved by study and all the ornamental part of classical learning.’

‘He came early into the House of Commons, where he soon distinguished himself; lost a cornetcy of horse, which was then his only subsistence; and in less than twenty years has raised himself to be first minister, and the most powerful sub-ject in this country.’

‘He has a peculiar clearness and facility of expression; and has an eye as significant as his words. He is not always a fair or conclusive reasoner, but commands the passions with sovereign authority; and to inflame or captivate a popular assembly is a consummate orator. He has courage of every sort, cool or impetuous, active or deliberate.’

‘At present he is the guide and champion of the people: whether he will long continue their friend seems somewhat doubtful. But if we may judge from his natural disposition, as it has hitherto shewn itself, his popularity and zeal for public liberty will have the same period: for he is imperious, violent, and implacable; impatient even of the slightest contradiction; and, under the mask of patriotism, has the despotic spirit of a tyrant.’

‘However, though his political sins are black and dangerous, his private character is irreproachable; he is incapable of a treacherous or ungenerous action; and in the common offices of life is justly esteemed a man of veracity and a man of honour.’

‘He mixes little in company, confining his society to a small junto of his relations, with a few obsequious friends, who consult him as an oracle, admire his superior understanding, and never presume to have an opinion of their own.’

‘His lordship’s character of the opposition of that day, would apply to the party at almost any period. A few unbenevolent patriots voted against the court; but their principle of dissatisfaction being thoroughly understood, those who had parts or activity to be dangerous, or even troublesome enemies, were soon quieted.’ The Princess of Wales was no favourite with his lordship, who hints at her so frequently imputed intimacy with the Earl of Bute. So far, however, as we may judge of her character by her conduct, we think the following portrait of her is correct:—

‘The Princess of Wales was reputed a woman of excellent sense, by those who knew her very imperfectly; but, in fact, was one of those moderate geniuses, who with much natural dissimulation, a civil address, an assenting conversation, and a few ideas of their own, can act with tolerable propriety, as long as they are conducted by wise and prudent counsellors.’

Mr. Murray, (afterwards Lord Mansfield,) is said by his lordship to have been ‘the ablest man, as well as the ablest debater in the House of Commons,’ and ‘so greatly superior to the rest of the profession, that he stood without a rival.’ We now come to his lordship’s appointment to succeed Earl Harcourt as governor to the Prince, and we cannot but admire the amiable and conciliatory conduct which he states himself to have adopted in this office:—

‘I found his Royal Highness uncommonly full of princely prejudices, contracted in the nursery, and improved by the society of bed-chamber women, and pages of the back-stairs.’

‘As a right system of education seemed quite impracticable, the best which could be hoped for was to give him true notions of common things: to instruct him by conversation, rather than by books; and sometimes, under the disguise of amusement, to entice him to the pursuit of more serious studies.’

‘The next point I laboured was to preserve harmony and union in the royal family; and having free access to the closet, I had frequent opportunities of doing good offices; was a very useful apologist, whenever his Majesty was displeased with his grandson’s shyness, or want of attention; and never failed to notify even the most minute circumstance of the young prince’s behaviour which was likely to give satisfaction.’

‘On the other hand, the princess and her son seemed perfectly satisfied with my zeal, diligence, and faithful services; and I was treated with so much civility, that I thought myself almost a favourite.’

‘This continued near three years, till the time already mentioned, when they changed their plan, and began by their actions, without directly avowing it, to set the King at defiance.’

‘The governor’s apologies being no longer necessary, the best use they could make of me was to provoke me to some hasty imprudent action, which might oblige me to quit my station, and make way for Bute’s advancement.’

‘However, they could not find out the slightest pretence for shewing any public mark of their displeasure; and, though some hard things were said to me in private, I always kept my temper, giving the severest answers in the most respectful language, and letting them civilly understand that I feared their anger no more than I had deserved it; and though it might be in their power to fret me, I was determined not to be in the wrong.’

The intrigues on the part of the princess dowager, for the promotion of Earl Bute, induced his lordship to resign his office of governor to the prince, which he describes as a ‘most painful servitude,’ and one in which his spirits and patience were so much exhausted, that he could have quitted his Royal Highness, and have given up all future hopes of court preferment, without the least regret or uneasiness. His lordship, on his resignation, refused a pension of 2000*l.* a-year, but requested and obtained a reversion of the office of one of the tellers of the Exchequer. Lord Waldegrave had tendered his resignation, and which had been also accepted, before the prince knew it. His lordship, in relating a subsequent interview with his Royal Highness on the subject, says:—

‘I had not acquainted either the Prince or Princess of Wales with this transaction; who strongly suspected, that, notwithstanding the ill usage I had received, I might still have some inclination to continue in his Royal Highness’s service; and having often perceived that I would not understand the most intelligible hints, they now resolved to explain themselves in the clearest and most precise manner.

'Accordingly, one day after dinner, the Prince of Wales began the conversation by desiring I would take nothing amiss; and then proceeded, with much hesitation and confusion, that he certainly should be exceeding glad to employ me hereafter, but that just at present he had very particular reasons against my continuing in his service; that it would be very improper for him to give me a negative; hoped I would not lay him under such a difficulty; and that he should esteem it a real obligation, if my resignation could have the appearance of being entirely my own act.

'I answered, that far from taking any thing amiss, I returned his Royal Highness my humblest thanks for the very gracious manner in which he had expressed himself. That as to my quitting his service, I had often proposed it to the King, who, though much averse to it, had at last given his consent.

'That this had long been my object; for that several months ago, when his Royal Highness had thought proper to tell me that he expected to have the nomination of the person who was to be at the head of the new establishment, it being necessary there should be a man in such a place whom he could thoroughly confide in; when he had added, that unless he was gratified in this particular, he should consider all those who were placed about him as his enemies; and when it was very apparent that I was not the person in whom his confidence was reposed, I should undoubtedly have resigned my employment the next morning, if I had not been apprehensive that it might have produced an immediate rupture; for I was determined, if there must be a quarrel between him and his grandfather, which I thought very probable, it should never be placed in my account. That I had persisted in doing all good offices, as long as they were practicable; that when it was no longer in my power to do any real good, I still had endeavoured to do as little harm as possible; and had made use of every opportunity to soften and alleviate whatever had been amiss; but, at the same time, the King having appointed me his Royal Highness's governor, I was accountable to his Majesty, and it was my duty to give information, as to some particulars, when he required it; or supposing it had been my intention to deceive the King, even in that case, it would have been absurd to have denied those things which might be seen at every drawing-room, and were the subject of conversation at every coffee-house.

'Those who had persuaded his Royal Highness to speak to me in the manner I have mentioned, had forgot to furnish him with a proper reply; possibly they did not expect that I should have presumed to return so uncourtly an answer; he was much embarrassed, said little, and went immediately to his mother, to give an account of what had passed.

'In about two days I was sent for by her Royal Highness, who began by apologizing for her son's behaviour; telling me, that I certainly must have misunderstood him on several occasions, or that he had said more than he really intended; that he had a great regard for me, did not like new faces, and was very desirous that I should continue in his service; but that he had a very particular esteem for the Earl of Bute, and had set his heart on making him groom of the stole; that being master of the horse was equally honourable, and if I would accept that employment, every thing might be made easy, and the King and her son would be both satisfied.

'The Prince, who was present, assented to every thing she said, but entered no further into the conversation.

'I returned their Royal Highnesses my humblest thanks; assured them, that whether I quitted or whether I remained his Royal Highness's servant, I should always be desirous of doing every thing they should approve of, as far as was consistent with the superior duty I owed to the King; and that nothing could give me more real satisfaction, than to see perfect harmony and union in the royal family.

'Many compliments passed between us, without the least insincerity on either side; for we did not mean to deceive each other: but as we were soon to be divided for the rest of our lives, it seemed best to part with the appearance of good humour and civility.

'One of the compliments might, indeed, be somewhat equivocal; I told her Royal Highness that I had frequently taken the liberty of speaking to the King concerning Lord Bute's promotion; but had never obtained a serious answer; for that as often as I touched on the subject, he immediately laughed in my face.

'After this friendly conference, which was about a month before the new establishment took place, I was treated with the greatest politeness; and when his Majesty granted their request, he made choice of me to be the messenger of good news.'

The remainder of this volume chiefly relates to the employment of his lordship in negotiating administrations, which appears to have been as difficult a business then, as it was found a few years ago on the death of Mr. Percival. In an interview which his lordship had with the King, his Majesty expressed his dislike to Mr. Pitt and Lord Temple, in very strong terms, the substance of which was, that—

'The secretary [Mr. Pitt] made him some very long speeches, which possibly might be very fine, but were greatly beyond his comprehension; and that his letters were affected, formal, and pedantic. That as to Temple, he was a disagreeable fellow, there was no bearing him; that when he attempted to argue, he was pert, and sometimes insolent; that when he meant to be civil, he was exceedingly troublesome, and that, in the business of his office, he was totally ignorant.'

The Earl Waldegrave was, at the particular wish of his Majesty, appointed to the treasury, but he does not appear to have acted in the office. In one of his interviews with the King for forming the administration, his Majesty made the following observations on English politics:—

'That we were, indeed, a very extraordinary people, continually talking of our constitution, laws, and liberty. That as to our constitution, he allowed it to be a good one, and defied any man to produce a single instance wherein he had exceeded his proper limits. That he never meant to screen or protect any servant who had done amiss; but still he had a right to chuse those who were to serve him, though, at present, so far from having an option, he was not even allowed a negative.

'That as to our laws, we passed near a hundred every session, which seemed made for no other purpose but to afford us the pleasure of breaking them; and as to our zeal for liberty, it was in itself highly commendable; but our notions must be somewhat singular, when the chief of the nobility chose rather to be the dependents and followers of a Duke of Newcastle, than to be the friends and counsellors of their sovereign.'

With this extract we close the Memoirs by the Earl Waldegrave. The events to which they relate are limited to a period of four years, but it was a period of great political intrigue; and his lordship, having been behind the curtain, was enabled to observe the machinery by which the whole was directed. The incidents detailed by his lordship are not of themselves of a very prominent interest, but the work must be considered as a useful, if not a valuable contribution towards the history of the period to which it relates.

The Belvidere Apollo; Fazio, a Tragedy; and other Poems. By the Rev. H. H. Milman. 8vo. pp. 192. London, 1821.

MR. MILMAN's tragedy of Fazio, which fills the principal part of the volume before us, is too well known to the public, either on the stage or in the closet, to need a single comment. The other poems are the Apollo Belvidere, a prize poem, which was recited in the theatre at Oxford, in 1817; Judicium Regule, an Ode; Alexander Tumulus Achillis invens, a Latin prize poem, of 1813; and Fortune, from the Italian of Guidi.

In the Belvidere Apollo, the poet pays a noble tribute to the matchless skill displayed in that splendid monument of antiquity; we insert the whole poem:—

‘Heard ye the arrow’s hurtle in the sky?
Heard ye the dragon monster’s deathful cry?
In settled majesty of calm disdain,
Proud of his might, yet scornful of the slain,
The heav’nly Archer stands—no human birth,
No perishable denizen of earth;
Youth blooms immortal in his beardless face,
A God in strength, with more than godlike grace;
All, all divine—no struggling muscle glows,
Through beaving vein no mantling life-blood flows,
But animate with deity alone,
In deathless glory lives the breathing stone.

Bright kindling with a conqueror’s stern delight,
His keen eye tracks the arrow’s fateful flight;
Burns his indignant cheek with vengeful fire,
And his lip quivers with insulting ire:
Firm fix’d his tread, yet light, as when on high
He walks th’ impalpable and pathless sky:
The rich luxuriance of his hair, confined
In graceful ringlets, wanders on the wind,
That lifts in sport his mantle’s drooping fold,
Proud to display that form of faultless mould.

Mighty Ephesian†! with an eagle’s flight
Thy proud soul mounted through the fields of light,
View’d the bright concave of Heav’n’s blest abode,
And the cold marble leapt to life a God:
Contagious awe through breathless myriads ran,
And nations bow’d before the work of man.
For mild he seem’d, as in Elysian bowers,
Wasting in careless ease the joyous hours;
Haughty, as bards have sung, with princely sway
Curbing the fierce flame-breathing steeds of day;
Beauteous as vision seen in dreamy sleep
By holy maid on Delphi’s haunted steep,
Mid the dim twilight of the laurel grove,
Too fair to worship, too divine to love.

Yet on that form in wild delicious trace
With more than reverence gazed the Maid of France.
Day after day the love-sick dreamer stood
With him alone, nor thought it solitude;
To cherish grief, her last, her dearest care,
Her one fond hope—so periah of despair.
Often as the shifting light her sight beguiled,
Blushing she shrunk, and thought the marble smiled:
Oft breathless hat’ning heard, or seem’d to hear,
A voice of music melt upon her ear.
Slowly she wand’r’d, and cold and senseless grown,
Closed her dim eyes, herself besumb’d to stone.
Yet love in death a sickly strength supplied;
Once more she gazed, then feebly smiled and died.’

* The Apollo is in the act of watching the arrow with which he slew the serpent Python.

† Argaine of Ephesus.

The foregoing fact is related in the work of Mons. Pinel sur l’Insanité.

The ode, ‘Judicium Regale,’ is a sort of ‘Vision of Judgment.’ We do not, by this remark, mean to say, that it is either absurd or impious, like that of Mr. Southey; but the subjects are not very dissimilar. The poet laureat brings George III. to Judgment. Mr. Milman brings Buonaparte; of course, their fates differ widely. We are always sorry when we see poets meddling with politics; they are very seldom either charitable in their opinions or correct in their judgment; and we really think, that a person of Mr. Milman’s fertile imagination, might have selected a better subject than that of Buonaparte, whom it is ungenerous to insult in his misfortunes; but, Shakespeare has told us, that—

‘This certain, greatness once fall’n out with fortune, Must fall out with men too; what the decline’d is,
He shall as soon read in the eyes of others
As feel in his own fall.’

Mr. Southey could muster but two accusers against the sovereign of Britain, and these made a very pitiful charge. Mr. Milman has been more successful against Buonaparte, whom men and empires accuse. The description of Buonaparte, who is designated as the ‘Imperial Criminal,’ is forcibly drawn, and wants nothing but truth to recommend it. Mr. Milman thus portrays the fallen emperor:—

‘In that wan face nor ancient majesty
Left wither’d splendour dim, nor old renown
Lofly disdain in that and sunken eye;
No giant ruin even in wreck elate,
Frowning dominion o’er imperious fate,
But one to native lowliness cast down.
A sullen careless desperation gave
The hollow semblance of intrepid grief,
Not that heroic patience nobly brave,
That even from misery wrings a proud relief;
Nor the dark pride of haughty spirits of ill,
That from the lowering grandeur of their sin,
Wear on the brow triumphant gladness still,
Heedless of racking agony within;
Nor penitence was there, nor pale remorse,
Nor memory of his fall from kingly state,
And warrior glory in his sun-like course,
Fortune his slave, and Victory his mate.
Twere doubt if that dark form could truly feel,
Or were indeed a shape and soul of steel.’

We pass over the accusations of Prussia, Spain, the Italian States, and the Pope, &c. to quote the following passage relating to Great Britain:—

‘Whom saw I then in port and pride a Queen,
Come walking o’er her own obsequious sea?
I knew thee well, the valiant, rich, and free—
As when old Rome, her Roman virtue tame,
Gazed, when in arms that bold dictator came;
Startled to sight the fierce insulting Gaul—
Camillus of mankind! thy regal mien
Gladden’d all earth; the nations from their rest
Joyful upleap’d; with modest front elate,

Like one that hath proud conscience in her breast,
Thou breakest the blank silence—“Woe and hate
To this bad man for those my good and great,
That sleep amid the Spaniard’s mountains rude,
In the sad beauty of the hero’s fate.

To this bad man immortal gratitude,
For he hath taught, who slaves the free of earth,
Fettereth the whirlwind; hath given glorious birth
To deeds that dwarf my old majestic fame,
Make Blake and Marlborough languid sound and tame

To Nelson and that chief to whom defeat
Is like an undiscover’d star—bath shown
More than the Macedonian victories vain
To rivet on the earth the oppressor’s chain;
As little will you sun’s empyrean throne
Endure a mortal seat, as this wide globe
Be one man’s appanage; or my fair isle,
That precious gem in ocean’s azure robe,
Cast freedom’s banner down, by force or guile
Master’d, and forfeit earth’s renown and love,
And her bright visions of high meed above.”

But France, ungrateful France, is brought in accusation against her idol. ‘This is the unkiindest cut of all.’ But what can France charge him with? Why first with making her the arbiter of the destinies of Europe. This passage is one of the best in the ode, and gives a powerful description of the once gigantic greatness of the French empire. France is made to say,—

‘High in the flaming arc of victory riding,
From Alp to Alp his chamails warriors guiding,
The pearl of wild Lod’s arch bestriding,
I saw yon chieftain in his morn of fame;
Cities and armies at his beck sank down,
And in the gaudy colours of renown
The fighting Orient vested his young name.
The bright and baleful meteor I adored,
Low bow’d I down, and said—“So thou my Lord!”

Like old and ruinous towers, the ancient thrones
Crumbl’d, and dynasties of elder time;
The banners of my conquest-plumed sons
Flouted the winds of many a distant clime:
On necks of vanquish’d kings I fix’d my seat,
And the broad Rhine roll’d wassal at my feet.
Turn’d did the indignant nations league their might,
Thrice the red darkness of the battle night
Folded the recreant terror of their flight.
Realms sack’d and ravaged empires sooth’d my toils,
And satrap chiefs were monarchs from my spoils.

In solitude of freedom that rich Queen
Sate in her sanctity of waves serene.”

The thousand-times repeated charge of murdering Wright and Pichegru is reiterated; and, when the whole of the charges are gone through, judgment on the culprit is thus invoked:—

“For yon dark chief of woe, and guilt, and strife,
O scepter’d judges! punish him with life.
Fear not he seek with the old Roman paid,
That weakness to the noble soul allied,
To die as Cato, and as Brutus died.

Fear not that in his abject heart he show
That martyr fortitude, that smiles in woe.
By him shall that great secret be betray'd,
Of what poor stuff are earth's dread tyrants made.

Oh, let him live to be despised, to see
France happy, and the glorious nations free;
Death were delight to that deep misery!"

Then did that kingly conclave, with one voice,
Pass the dread sentence on the gloomy man;
In his son's icy deadness, he alone

By other's woes seemed harden'd to his own.
From land to land the penal tidings ran;
Earth lifted up her rich face to rejoice,
The bright blue heavens bade wintry warring cease,

And spring came dancing o'er a world at peace.

With all due deference to the poet, we think that Bonaparte, during his five years' exile or imprisonment, has given strong evidence that he does possess the 'martyr fortitude that smiles in woe;' and, however long his life may be, we will guarantee him from the supposed misery of living

— to see

France happy, and the glorious nations free.

The experience of every succeeding day, gives some excuse to Bonaparte's ambitious projects, by showing how faithless were the parties with whom he had to deal, and that the monarchs who formerly so tamely succumbed to his power, now are the worst parts of his character without a particle of his talents.

In taking leave of Mr. Milman, which we must do somewhat hastily, as we have a number of other authors to pay our respects to, we cannot but think he has been rather injudicious in the publication of these poems. They are unworthy of the talents of the author of Fazio, Samor, and the Fall of Jerusalem,—productions which have justly gained him a high reputation. We are far from saying that these less important pieces are without merit, for they really possess many beauties, but they are much inferior to the poems we have mentioned, and we have too great a respect for Mr. Milman, and admire his talents too much, not to feel jealous for his fame.

Annals of the Coinage of Britain and its Dependencies. By the Rev. R. Ruding.

NOTWITHSTANDING the assertion of some antiquaries to the contrary, it does not appear that Britain had any coinage previous to the invasion of Julius Cæsar, who describes the Britons as a people then just emerging from barbarism, and no further acquainted with commerce than to have discovered that it could not be conducted by simple barter alone. The earliest coin which can with the least appearance of probability be attributed to any particular British monarch, bears upon it the letters S E G O, probably for Segonax, who was one of the four petty Kentish monarchs that, by command of Cassi-vellaun, attacked Cæsar's camp upon his second invasion of Britain.

It was, however, during the reign of Cunobeline, that the British coins were improved in imitation of the Roman money. On some of these coins the name of the monarch is given with a Latin termination; and the devices which are impressed upon the others are evident imitations of the coins of Augustus Cæsar. Of many of the coins of Cunobeline, (and nearly forty varieties have been discovered,) a word appears that has occasioned much controversy, but without any elucidation of its meaning, which still remains involved in impenetrable obscurity.
This is the word TASCIO or TASCIA, which has been supposed by some to signify tribute; by others, to be the name of the moneyer, with various other conjectures equally unsatisfactory.

It is probable that the British coinage closed with the money of Cunobe-line, for, in a few years after his death, the second subjection of Britain took place, under Claudius, which was so complete and severe, that the country became rather a Roman than a British island, and thus continued for nearly four hundred years.

The coins of the Anglo-Saxons consisted of the sceatta, in value about a penny, and another, which was only worth one fourth of a penny. It has been attempted to be proved that the Saxons had a gold coinage, but the arguments to establish this fact are by no means conclusive. In point of antiquity, the penny succeeds; the etymologies of it are nearly as numerous as the modes of spelling it; and it was written in various ways,—as peneg, peng, peninc, pening, penincg, penning, and pending; its most probable derivation is from penda, to weigh.
The penny, the halfpenny, and the farthing, all of which were of silver, were Anglo-Saxon coins; they also had the styca, two of which were equal to one farthing. The Saxons had also other monies, or rather denominations of monies, the exact nature of which is by no means determined; such as the mancus, the mark, the shilling, the thrima, and the ora. The mancus is believed to have been only a certain weight, equal to thirty pennies or six shillings. The mark, which was a Danish mode of computation, was, early in the tenth century, estimated at one hundred pennies; but, in the year 1194, at one hundred and sixty. The scill, or scilling, a word of doubtful derivation, appears at a very early period in the Anglo-Saxon laws, some fines having been regulated by it about the middle of the sixth century; its value was five and afterwards four pennies.

The thrima appears to have been equal to three-fifths of the shilling of five pence; and the ora was anciently reckoned at fifteen pennies. These are all the coins and denominations of money which appear to have been used by the Anglo-Saxons.

It would lead us too much into detail to notice the coinage of the different kingdoms of the heptarchy; in which the kingdom of Kent claims the precedence. During this period, and the reigns of the sole monarchs, the coins we have enumerated prevailed, and there were also several others.
Mints were established in various parts of the kingdom, and the names of the money, and in many instances that of the mint, were on the reverse of the coins. Harold, during his short-lived sovereignty, seems to have been studious to perpetuate his memory by frequent coinages, for he had mints at thirty-seven different towns, and his coins are far from being uncommon.
These coins have, on the obverse, Har-old's name and title as King of England, and the reverse bears the moneyer's name, and the place of mintage.
All of them have PAX across the centre, which has been supposed to allude to the peace which Edward the Confessor granted to him and to his father,
Earl Godwin, in 1052.

William the Conqueror, anxious to persuade the English that he looked upon them as his natural subjects, and not as a conquered people, made no innovation on the coinage. His coins not only resemble those of Harold in weight and fineness, but some of them correctly imitated the type of that mon-arch's pennies. This adherence to the weight of the Saxon penny, will appear to be very extraordinary, when we consider that he introduced the French mode of computation, by shillings of twelve pennies; and can be ascribed only to a refund policy, which forbade an alteration, the effect of which would immediately be perceived by his new subjects. Of the coins of William I. the penny is the only one which has descended to our times. These were extremely rare until the beginning of the eighteenth century, when, after a dreadful fire, which burnt many houses in Upper Ouse Gate, in the city of York, in the year 1703-4, a small oak box, containing about two hundred and fifty pennies of the two Williams, was discovered, on digging a deep fouloulation for a new building. Before this discovery, the utmost diligence of that indefatigable collector, Thoresby, could procure no more than two of them. The coins of William I. have, on the obverse, his name and title as King, with the addition of some of the leading letters of ANGLO-RUM; and on the reverse, the name of the moneyer, together with the place of mintage.

William Rufus coined but little money, and employed few of his father's moneyers. From the weight and fineness of his money, it seems that, notwithstanding his necessities, (for he soon dissipated his father's immense wealth,) he made no alteration in the standard. His coins bear on the obverse his name and title, except in one instance, where the legend is WILLELMVS only, and in another, which is inscribed LIVLIVM DVO. The reverses have the town and moneyer.

Henry I. made several important and beneficial regulations relative to the coinage. He denounced severe punishment against moneyers or other persons on whom counterfeit coins should be found. In his laws, it was ordained that falsifiers of the money should suffer the loss of a hand, without redemption. This penalty, dreadful as it may appear, was insufficient to prevent the crime of counterfeiting the coin; accordingly, Henry, on his return from Normandy, in 1105, added to the penalty of the loss of a hand, the further punishment of the loss of sight, and emasculation. Notwithstanding the severity of these ordinances, the money, in 1108, was so much corrupted, as to render a new coinage absolutely necessary:—

The strong hand of the law having proved ineffectual for the protection of the coins, the censures of the church were, in 1123, called into its aid. At a council which was holden at Rome in that year, when Callixtus the Second presided, some ancient statutes were revived, by which it was decreed, that whoever should knowingly make, or studiously circulate false money, should be separated from the congregation of the faithful as one accurSED, an oppressor of the poor, and a disturber of the state.

1123. These ecclesiastical denunciations seem likewise to have been pronounced in vain, for, in about two years afterward, the King sent orders, from Normandy, for the punishment of all the moneyers in England, by inflicting upon them the severest sentence of the law; because the money was so corrupted that it would not pass in any market.

In compliance with these commands, Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, summoned them, throughout all England, to appear at Winchester against Christmas-day. When they arrived there, they were taken apart singly, and underwent the dreadful infliction. The whole was done within the twelve days before Christmas, and, indeed, (saith the chronicler,) most justly, for they had brought the greatest loss upon the whole nation, by the immense quantity of base metal which they had circulated. They were afterwards compelled to abjure the realm, and to go into banishment.

The English goldsmiths were at this time eminent for excellence of workmanship, and were sometimes invited to practice their art in foreign courts. The types of the coins of Henry I. are as various as those of any monarch in the English series. His name and title are variously written upon the obverse of his money. On some pieces H. R. only are found; on others, HENRICVS; on others, his name and title; and on some, his name and title as King of the English. The reverses bear the name of the mint and moneyer, which, in some instances, are placed within two concentric circles. One penny has PAX across the centre of the reverse.

The necessities of King Stephen induced him to diminish the weight which the penny bore in the reign of his predecessor. During this disturbed reign, several barons, particularly those related to the King, had coins struck. The coins of Stephen are almost invariably badly executed. They are scarce, yet a considerable variety of types is to be found. His name on the obverse is commonly wrong spelled, and occurs frequently without his title. When that appears, it is simply Rex, without any addition. The reverses bear, in general, the mint and moneyer; but it is peculiar to coins of this reign to exhibit reverses without any legend, the outer circle being charged with unmeaning ornaments.

The wretched state to which money had been reduced in the reign of Stephen, by adulteration and other methods, rendered a new coinage absolutely necessary, when Henry II. took possession of the crown. A foreign artist, Philip Aymary, a native of Tours, was introduced into the Mint; but, as he was suspected to connive at the frauds of the moneyers, who were severely punished, he was soon dismissed. It appears, that there were at least two coinages in this reign, and that the same device was used on both. The name of Henry II, HENRI written, appears on the obverse, with his title of King of England; but, upon an Anglo-Gallic penny, struck in Aquitaine, it is HENRICVS REX. The reverse, as usual, have the name of the Mint and the moneyer. The coins of this monarchy were rare, until a large quantity of them was found at Royston, about the year 1721; and a still larger hoard, to the number of more than five thousand seven hundred, at Tealby, in Lincolnshire, in 1807. They are commonly very ill struck.

It does not appear certain, that Richard I. coined any money during his reign; at all events, if he did, none of his coins have come down to us. We are not, however, without specimens of his money, the produce of his Anglo-Gallic Mints, which bear his name as King of England, though they were struck by him either in the quality of Earl of Poitou or as Duke of Aquitaine.

King John, when very young, having been declared by his father Lord of Ireland, had mints in Dublin and Waterford, and his money struck with his name and title impressed on it. The coins are of peculiarly barbarous workmanship, bearing, on the obverse, a rude face, resembling the form in which the full moon is usually drawn, with his title JOHANNES DOM; and, on the reverse, the name of the moneyer and the place of mintage. On his usurpation of the crown of England, he made several regulations respecting money, particularly to stop the diminishing of the coins, which had been carried on to an alarming extent. Although he had mints in seventeen different towns in England, yet no coins from any of these mints have ever been discovered. The only specimens we have are his Irish coins, some struck before and others after his assuming the royal dignity. His title, upon the coins, is only JOHANNES or JOHANNES REX, without any notice of either England, or even Ireland, where they were minted. The reverse has the Mint and moneyer as usual, but with devices, which appears on his money only. The penny has a crescent and a blazing star; and the half-penny, a crescent and a cross patée, with a small star in each angle of the triangle; the farthing has a blazing star only. The bust on the obverse, and these devices on the reverse, are placed within the triangle.

During the minority of Henry III, there was a coinage of pennies, half-pennies, and farthings, but only a few of the first have been preserved:—

'The alteration of type, which was introduced upon the money in this reign, forms a kind of æra in the Numismatic History of England. From the conquest until this time, with the exception of the coins of Henry II. and the obverse of those of John, a great variety prevailed in the impressions both of the obverse and reverse of the coins. The portraits of the monarchs were represented either in full or in profile; and the crosses were exhibited under almost every possible form. But the portrait of Henry III. is invariably full-faced; the cross consists of double lines; and the only difference between his earlier and later coinages is, that in the former the cross is bounded by the inner circle, and has four pellets in each quarter; whilst in the latter it extends to the outer circle, and the number of the pellets is reduced to three. To this description his gold penny forms the only exception.

'Rude as this ornament of the reverse may appear to modern taste, it however seems, for some reason or other, to have been highly satisfactory to those who conducted the operations of the Mint, for it kept entire possession of the coins until Henry VII. introduced heraldic bearings. It then began gradually to give ground, but was not entirely lost before the latter end of the reign of James I. at the termination of a period of nearly 400 years.'

His style upon his money is sometimes Henricus Rex only; at others the number III, TERC, or ANG, with Terc, on the reverse is added. The reverse, besides the rude impress described above, has generally the name of the Mint and the moneyer. The gold penny of this king is of a very different type from that of his silver money. On the obverse, the sovereign is represented crowned, and sitting on a chair of state; in his right hand is a sceptre, in his left a globe. The reverse has the long cross of his later coinage, with a rose and three small pellets in each quarter. It is the only gold coin which is stamped with the name of the Mint and the moneyer.

Henry the Third had mints in thirty-four different towns; and he also struck money in Gascony. There are also coins, apparently ecclesiastical, probably struck in his reign, with the history of which we are unacquainted.

High Birth, a Satire, addressed to a Young Nobleman; in imitation of the Eighth Satire of Juvenal. 8vo. pp. 48. London, 1821.

THE object of this satire is good; it is to prove the truth of Pope's assertion, that—

'Honour and fame from no condition rise;

And that naught

— Can enoble slaves and cowards,
Not all the blood of all the Howards.'

Some personages of 'Highbirth,' well known in the fashionable circles, but who certainly would not do credit to any station in society, are justly reprehended; but the satire is destitute of one very essential quality—point. If there are any readers who deem this of no consequence, we think they may be pleased with 'High Birth' in every other respect.

1. Conversations on English Grammar, in a Series of Familiar and Entertaining Dialogues, between a Mother and her Daughters; in which the various Rules of Grammar are introduced and explained, &c. By Mrs. Williams. 12mo. pp. 213. London, 1821.

Mrs. WILLIAMS'S 'Conversations' not only contain a clear and intelligible explanation of the principles of English grammar, but are well calculated to convert what is generally considered (by young persons at least,) a very dry study, into an agreeable and pleasing employment. We know no better method of instilling knowledge than by this familiar tête à tête between the instructor and the pupil, who will thus insensibly acquire information, without feeling any of the repugnance which usually accompanies set tasks and formal lessons.

2. A Grammar of Universal Geography, and of Elementary Astronomy. For the Use of Schools and Private Instruction. By Alexander Jamieson, Author of a Treatise on the Construction of Maps, &c. 18mo. pp. 552. London, 1821.

This appears to us to be a very clever little work, embracing a great quantity of information admirably arranged; and we recommend it as well suited to teaching the first principles of geography and astronomy. The author truly observes, that he has traversed the globe to lay its treasures at the feet of his pupil, whom he now invites to take the same course, to prove to his own mind, that these riches are the common property of all who will take the trouble to acquire them.

3. The Mental Calculator; being a Compendium of Concise yet General Rules, for the ready Solution of various useful and interesting Problems in Astronomy; with Explanatory Illustrations. Forming an Epitome of the Elements of that Science. To which is added a Guide to the Constellations. By P. Lovekin. 18mo. pp. 117. London, 1821.

This work at once forms a substitute for, and an assistant to, a pair of globes. The rules for solving a variety of astronomical problems, are so arranged as to be easily committed to memory, particularly as abstruse terms are avoided as much as possible. The 'Guide to the Constellations' will be of infinite service to youth, and may even be consulted by 'grown up children' with advantage.

4. Stories from the Spanish History, for the Amusement of Children. By Mrs. Jamieson. 18mo. pp. 140. London, 1820.

THIS is a pleasing collection of the most striking anecdotes and interesting events with which the history of Spain, so fertile in every thing romantic and entertaining, abounds. The selection is judicious, and made with that discrimination which distinguishes the works of this popular writer.

5. Biographical Sketches of the Apostles, and the most Remarkable Characters mentioned in the New Testament. 18mo. pp. 173. London, 1820.

A CONDENSED but a connected sketch of the principal events in the lives of the most remarkable personages in the New Testament, with biographical notices of the four primitive martyrs, can scarcely need any recommendation. No person who feels an interest in the religious instruction of youth, should remain unacquainted with this volume.

ETYMOLOGY OF THE WORD SHILLING.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—On turning over Richelet's French Dictionary, I found the following etymology, if so it may be called, of the word shilling:—'Schilling, in his Chronicle of Prussia, p. 67.—In Prussia, under the sixth master of the Teutonic order, Bernhard Schilling, citizen of Thorn, extracted from a mine of the town of Nicolas-Dorf, the quantity of several pigs of silver; and, because there were great abuses in the money current, in Bohemia and Poland, Schilling was permitted to coin little pieces, which he called by his name. On referring to L'Art de verifier les Dates, the most important chronological work in existence, I find the Sixth Master of the Teutonic order was elected, A. D. 1244, and died 1253; perhaps some of your readers, fond of antiquarian lore, will tell us whether this authority is to be depended on.

THE NEWSMAN.

A Sketch from the Life.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

* Careless what he brings, his one concern is to conduct it to the destin'd inn :—
To him indiff'rent whether grief or joy,
Houses in ashes, and the fall of stocks,
Births, deaths, and marriages, epistles wet
With tears, that trickled down the writer's cheeks

Fast as the periods from his fluent quill,
Or charg'd with am'rous sighs of absent swains
Or nymphs responsive, equally affect him—
Unconscious of them all.—COWPER'S TASK.

At about nine o'clock on a Sunday morning, just before the bells ring for church, this eccentric man may be seen, leaving London behind him, and speeding his way to the north. In height, he is about five feet, his age is sixty, and whoever has seen an out-pensioner of Greenwich Hospital, might identify him. He wears a blue coat, of coarse cloth, and made by a tailor, (I beg pardon) by a habit-maker of the last century; at a period when professional gentlemen gave their customers' cuffs without insult, and collars without being recognised as puppets. His waistcoat is of a pattern which resembles a fancy perfumer's morning dress. His breeches are leather, and being used as an accommodation to the palms and fingers, would make an excellent hone to set the wiry edge of a razor. His hose of worsted, are worn in relief, with a jagged tongue at the knee, which reposes on a scarlet garter, that is every evening be-nighted in his chamber. A pair of dirty half-boots embrace his ancles, and taper up to his calf to an exquisite point. His face looks like a veteran's that has passed through the storm, and his hair straggles over his shoulders like withering ivy over a yielding ruin. He wears a hat with broad brim and oval crown, round which a piece of whipcord is tied, and a pen slipped in—perhaps the very identical one that, the night previously, had been whirled into the office by some editor, because it did not shed ink away fast enough, and trace the blank paper with facility. However, whether this pen were rejected for its softness or hardness I know not,—it serves its present purpose to attract credit, which, unfortunately for its user, is not always creditable. And sometimes this newsman has to give fifty stamps with his foot for the one which he gives with his paper. To be prepared against the changes of the weather, he carries his umbrella under one arm and his newspapers in a case under the other. An old phial, fixed to his button hole, supplies him with ink; and, being visited with an internal complaint, his nose leaves his lips, always considerably in the rear;—hence, like the title of the paper in which I appear, he is very chronical. If I may judge of the state of his mind, from the moanings which he occasionally utters, I should conclude, like too many of his fellow-countrymen, his calling is one more of necessity than inclination. Let the slanderer then put his finger to his lip, and the rigid Christian contemplate, that the afflicted do not always choose that course which is most agreeable, nor tread twenty miles with that pleasure they would enjoy, if the iron rod of national affliction were not suspended over them. The bread of industry is often obtained with difficulty, while idleness in disguise riots in luxurious carelessness; but how glorious will be the reward of the one, and how painful the merited justice of the other.

IO SONO.

CRUELTY TO CHIMNEY SWEEPERS.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—There seems to want an explanation of the coroner's suggestion to the jury, who sat very recently on the body of a boy only twelve years of age, that was jammed into a chimney, with rubbish, and, poor creature! suffered to remain there an hour, and then die!—Shocking inhumanity!—such unfeeling conduct merits the severest punishment. Now, sir, from the public prints, it appears, that the great reason for not extricating the sufferer from his situation was, because it would disfigure a part of the chimney which had been repaired; as if the removal of a few bricks were equal to the life of a fellow-creature! Whoever the bricklayer is, that so greatly admired the works of his handicraft, he deserves more the name of a monster than a man, and whatever accommodation, or compromise of sympathy, might have been made by the parties concerned, a vote of censure is not sufficient to express that indignation for one so devoid of humanity. Day after day, delinquents are suffered to escape the meed of due punishment,—defenceless children perish under the pressure of cruelty, and yet, because it is 'not every body's business to interfere, it is nobody's.' Surely the 'Vice Suppression Society' might be here usefully and humanely employed to the greatest advantage, and with the most beneficial effect, seeing, that to save but one soul from an untimely fate, there will be 'great recompense of reward.' Actuated with the best motives, if you think the above desultory remarks deserving of a page in your impartial and instructive paper, I shall be happy to see them inserted, that the respectable coroner might be so kind as to throw some light on the melancholy catastrophe, for general satisfaction.

I am, sir,
With much respect,
March 24, 1831. PULVIS.

Original Criticisms

ON

The Principal Performers of the Theatres Royal Drury Lane & Covent Garden.

No. XVI.—MR. VANDENHOFF.

'We hate e'en Kemble thus at second hand.'

CHURCHILL.

PRECEDDED by the most enthusiastic eulogiums from all parts of the country, Mr. Vandenhoff has, at length, made his appearance. Every dramatic amateur will remember that this is the gentleman whose name made so conspicuous a figure in the play bills, during the first year of Mr. Elliston's management. What were the reasons that precluded his appearance, at that time, it is neither our object nor our wish to inquire; but this much we will say, that if, as we have heard it reported, Mr. Vandenhoff refused an engagement at Drury Lane, merely because he was to enact the second characters to Mr. Kean, his conduct savours very strongly of ridiculous self-conceit; as his pretensions, in our opinion at least, are very far from being of that high order which we had been

* By referring to the review of Ruding's Coinage, in the present number, our Correspondent will perceive, that the word shilling was applied to a piece of coin many centuries before the time fixed by Schreus, in his Lexicon.—Ed.

led to expect. Mr. Vandenhoff seems to have delayed his appearance, till the absence of Mr. Kean should have afforded him a fit opportunity for the display of his talents, but, in so doing, he appears to have forgotten that he had to contend with two most powerful competitors. The names of Macready and C. Kemble, gentlemen eminently adapted, both by nature and study, to attain the very summit of their profession, with highly cultivated and classic minds, and talents matured by experience, might have presented themselves to him, as probable obstacles to that pre-eminence his ambition prompted him to court. But, not to enter more fully into his motives, we shall content ourselves with observing that Mr. Vandenhoff appeared in King Lear, a severe test, as the character is universally allowed to be the most arduous throughout the whole range of the drama, and, as he has been found wanting, his selection bears the stamp, to use no stronger term, of folly and temerity. With regard to his performance of Lear, we shall only say, that after that of Kean it was bad indeed; it was even inferior to the representation of the little itinerant Booth. His performance was by no means correct; when he was expressing passages of the most frightful and tremendous vehemence, he was impatient and querulous; when, on the contrary, he ought to have been calm and soul-subdued, he launched forth into the other extreme. By a vain attempt at originality, he certainly struck out very many of Kean's beauties, but he inserted few others in their places. We will not, however, deny, that the performance had some merit: his declamation, at times, was excellent, and we are happy to say that he does not rant to the galleries. His scenes with Edgar, as Mad Tom, and his lowly submission to the raging elements were distinguished by a pathos that insinuated itself into the souls of the audience, and obtained considerable approbation. His Sir Giles Overreach was clever in parts, in others miserably tame; the effect of the concluding scene, which we have seen played by Kean with such heart-rendering excellence, was entirely destroyed by Mr. Vandenhoff's misrepresentation, but his instructions to Margaret were well given, and his manner of speaking of 'his honourable, his right honourable daughter,' excellent.

We are of opinion that his Coriolanus possesses more merit than any of his other performances; the character was twice repeated with more unequivocal testimonies in his favour than either of the characters he had previously assumed; perhaps this may be owing to the part itself, which is more easily delineated than old Lear or Sir Giles Overreach, added to which, a more intimate acquaintance with his audience, of course, tended to diminish those restraints, and that alarm which a first appearance must necessarily produce. We cannot, however, refrain from observing, that the performance would have possessed double merit in our eyes, had it not resembled that of Kemble throughout, so very closely. Mr. Vandenhoff made but little impression in the earlier scenes of the play, but as it proceeded he entered with tolerable spirit into the various passions which agitate the soul of the hero of Corioli. His figure, however, though commanding, is deficient in grace; his countenance is unimpressive, and his voice is apt to sink into feebleness and hollowness of tone. He was not happy in sustaining the calm philosophic dignity of the hero, nor was his frown of that awful nature which would cause a plebeian rabble to retreat from him in dread and stupefied dismay. The lofty spirit, the overweening pride of the patrician, his indignation, his haughty bearing, and his revenge, are what Mr. Vandenhoff has not talent sufficient to express with force. He was also deficient in the sublimity which enshrines the haughty soul of Coriolanus; still he gave some passages with fine effect. In the last scene, by far the most dramatic, in the alternate struggles between revenge and compassion, filial and conjugal affection, he was highly successful. In the celebrated passage, 'I flattered your Volscians in Corioli,—alone I did it, Boy,' his voice was not equal to his conception, but he soon recovered himself, and his bursting indignation and astonishment were honoured with extreme applause. Mr. Vandenhoff is a striking proof of the fickleness of public taste: for the first week he was received with tumultuous approbation, whereas, in the rage for novelty of every description, he is now almost entirely forgotten. In the same manner as the sun on a hazy day, when his beams are obscured by a mass of clouds, suddenly flashes on our sight, and straight is seen no more; thus Mr. Vandenhoff, after blazing forth as a genius of the very first order, has, after a few faint struggles, fallen from his high estate, and settled somewhere about the class of Mr. Booth. Well may we exclaim, 'O! what a fall is here,' on beholding the representative of old Lear, of the haughty Coriolanus, the wily Sir Giles Overreach, thrust into the Earl of Leicester (a miserably meagre sketch of a lightly finished portrait), in the melodrama of Kenilworth. We regret that Mr. Vandenhoff has not been more fortunate in the selection of his characters, as we think that if his abilities were directed to a proper line, he might still prove a very good performer. We should like to see him in such a character as Brutus, which, we are convinced, would be far more adapted to him, than any thing he has yet attempted. But, with all his faults, this gentleman may be called a valuable adjunct to the Covent Garden company: he has much to learn before he can fill, with excellence, the characters he has assumed; but, if he studies closely, we do not despair of seeing him all that his fondest hopes may desire; above every thing let him endeavour to form a school of his own: however excellent the style of Kemble may be, yet to follow it implicitly denotes a weak mind; an indifferent original, is, in our estimation, superior to the best imitation.

O good old man; how well in thee appears
The constant service of the antique world,

OF

THE INNS OF COURT, &c. &c.

Inner Temple,—one of the four inns of court, was founded about the year 1133, by the Knights Templars, who, having their house in Holborn, took another habitation, which they called the New Temple, containing that space of ground between White Friars, east, and Essex House, west, and between the buildings on the south side of Fleet Street, north, and the Thames, south. It is called the Temple from the above order of men, who had their mansion near the Temple of our Lord in Jerusalem*, and thence called Knights Templars; of this society there were then but nine, although they afterwards increased to that degree, that many of the nobility in most parts of Christendom, became of this fraternity, and that they had temples in many places in England; as at Canterbury, Cambridge, Bristol, Dover, &c.; but their chieftone was this at London, which they built after the model of that at Jerusalem.

They were at first so poor, that they had but one horse to serve two to ride on. (Vide their ancient seal.)

Their order was similar to that of the Canons Regular: they were habited in white, and their upper garment was of r-d cloth, worn cross-ways, to show that they were not ashamed of the doctrine of the cross; they are, for the same reason, portrayed and carved with their legs, and also the arms of some of them, forming a saltire cross. They professed not only to believe but to defend the Christian religion, the Holy Land, and pilgrims going to visit the Sepulchre of our Lord, for which reason they are represented in armour, like a rope, close twisted about their limbs and head, except the face, and also with swords in their hands.

This order was first founded about the year 1118; but, as their number increased, so did they in wealth; and, as in wealth, in vice, many being tried for heresy and other crimes, in England, who were condemned to perpetual penance in several monasteries; but those in France were used more severely, for their lands were seized by King Philip, and the knights, to the number of about sixty were burnt at Paris; so that, between the years 1308 and 1313, this order became utterly dissolved, and A. D. 1324, their lands, (lest the same should be applied to prophane uses,) were given by the crown to the Knights Hospitallers of the order of St. John the Baptist, or St. John of Jerusalem, who, soon after, demised the same for the rent of 10l. per annum, unto divers professors of the common law, who were supposed to have come from Thiaives's Inn, Holborn.

Wat Tyler and his rebels made great spoils of the records of this house in the 4th of Rich. 11. However, that they were here settled in the time of Edward 111. is beyond dispute, and the number increased to that degree that they divided into two societies; that next the White Friars, standing farthest within the liberty of the city, was called the Inner Temple; and that between the west end of the church and Devereux Court, the Middle Temple; and without the city liberties, from the Middle Temple, westward, including part of the Bishop of Exeter's house, now Essex Buildings, was called the Outer Temple. These lawyers held, as tenants to the said Hospitallers, up to their dissolution, 30th Henry VIII., and afterwards from the crown, by lease, unto the 6th of King James I. when they had a grant thereof, by letters patent, dated at Westminster, August 13th, by the name of, Hospitalia et capitula messuagiorum cognita per nomen de le Inner Temple, sive Novi Templi, Lond., unto Sir Julius Caesar, Knight, then Chancellor and under Treasurer of the said King's Exchequer. The treasurer, benchers, &c. of these houses, and their assigns, for ever, for lodgings, reception, and education of the professors and students of the laws of this realm, yielding and paying to the said King and his successors, viz. for the mansion called the Inner Temple, 10l. yearly, and for the Middle Temple, 10l. yearly, at the Feasts of St. Michael and Annunciation of our Lady. As to the buildings: the first foundation of the church is uncertain; some say it was founded a place of sanctuary, by Dunwallo Malmutus, a British King, about the year of the world 4748; but the best authors agree, that it was founded by the Knights Templars, in the year 1185, and dedicated to the 'Blessed Virgin.' In 1240, it was rededicated, being then, (as it is believed,) newly erected, and the structure, probably in substance, that which is now standing. In the church are monuments of the Knights Templars; the cross-legged ones denote those who made vows to go to the Holy Land, against the infidels, and the straight legged shew those that were not so bound; three of the cross-legged ones were succeeding Earls of Pembroke, from 1219 to 1241. The church narrowly escaped the great fire of London, in 1666, but was afterwards repaired, and a new screen put up, when Sir Thos. Robinson was trea-suror of the Inner Temple, and Sir Francis Withens, treasurer of the Middle Temple. The hall is said to have been first erected in Edward the Third's reign. In 1554, or about this time, one Mr. Packington, treasurer, built Tanfield Court, so called from the chambers of Sir Lawrence Tanfield, chief baron being there, until which time it was known by the name of Packington's Court. The first treasurer of this house was appointed A. D. 1505; and the first reader, A. D. 1606. The badge of this society is the figure of a pegasus.

Middle Temple.—Another of the inns of court, so called from the said Knight Templars, the founders of the house, and because it is situate in the middle, between the Inner and Outer Temple, which last was part of Essex Buildings. (Vide preceding account of Inner Temple.)

The first treasurer was appointed 16th Henry 7th, and the first reader in the 17th Henry 7th, or, A. D. 1501. (The office of reader has been discontinued upwards of a century.)

As to the buildings—the Cloister Chambers were consumed by fire, A. D. 1678; re-erected in 1681; part of the building between Brick and Essex Court was also burnt; and rebuilt, A. D. 1704.

The hall is ancient; it appears to have been well repaired in 1699. Their armorial ensigns are, Argent on a Cross Gules, a Holy Lamb, &c.

Lincoln's Inn.—Also another of the inns of court, situate on the west side of Chancery Lane. In this place, Ralph Neville, Bishop of Chichester and Chancellor of England, built a house in the reign of Henry the Third, (as appears in the register of the house, vol. 6, fol. 361.) on ground which was given him by the king; and, after him, Richard de Wihts had his residence here; but, in the next age, it fell into the possession of Henry Lacy, Earl of Lincoln, whose inn or lodging, when in town, being here, gave it that name, which it has ever since retained; and he is said, about the year 1310, to have introduced the study of the law here; although leases have afterwards been let to the students by the Bishop of Chichester; Robert Sherborn, Bishop of that see, having conveyed it to one Syliard, a student of this house, for ninety-nine years; after which lease, Sampson, a succeeding Bishop of Chichester, did, by deed, dated July, 1836, pass the inheritance of the house and garden to the said William Syli-ard, and Eustace, his brother; and Eustace surviving, his son Edward, by deed, 12th Nov. 1579, in consideration of 520l. conveyed to Richard Kingsmill, and the rest of the then bench, this house, garden, &c. in fee, and a fine was levied accordingly.

As to the buildings—The Hall was erected A. D. 1506; the great gate towards Chancery Lane, was finished 1518. In the year 1558, an order was passed for the building of a brick wall and gates, for the better inclosure of the inn, but it was not finished until about the year 1667, when also the chambers on the north side the quadrangle were erected, amounting to 415l. 11s. 11d. The chapel was finished, and consecrated A. D. 1623; Inigo Jones, the king's surveyor, estimating the charge at 2000l. raised by voluntary subscription of some, and a tax on other gentlemen. The west window contains several coats of arms; among which is that of Henry Lacy, Earl of Lincoln, from whom this inn had its name;—the arms are—Or, a Lion Rampant Azure. In the year 1663, the great terrace walk and wall, towards Lincoln's Inn Fields, were made, which cost about 1000l. A. D. 1697, Searl's Court was finished, the ground having been bought by Henry Searl, of this house, Esq. who began to build the same, but did not live to see it finished. The first reader of this house was appointed A. D. 1463, and the first governor (as he was then called) A. D. 1464; he went by the name of president in the 18th Elizabeth, and, lastly, treasurer.

This society has been honoured by several persons of very eminent learning, particularly Sir John Fortescue, Lord Chief Justice of England, William Lombard, and the learned antiquary, Sir Henry Spelman, admitted 1585.

The readers of this house (as those of the other three) have been discontinued many years; it arose from the sergeants being called before they had been readers (a thing not formerly done); also the revellings and controllers have been laid aside. Their armorial ensigns are (according to Dugdale) similar to those of the Earl of Lincoln, in the church before described.

We hoped to have concluded the Historical Account of the Inns of Court in the present number, but find ourselves under the necessity of extending it to another article.

Original Poetry.

A MISUNDERSTANDING.

THE THOUGHT FROM TOM JONES.

A COUNTRY lad, in warm debate,
On some great point or other,
Alleg'd, if so and so we't case,
That such and such must follow.

By, at the time, a scholar said,
Who saw the blunder made,
He (tho' 'twas throwing pearls 'fore swine)
Called classics to his aid.

'Thy conclusion that,' said he, 'you draw
Don't follow the premises,
A nos sequitur, friend, it is,—
The other's choler rises.

His face, with rage and anger marked,
Assumed a fiery hue,
He loud exclaimed, 'Sir, I'm no more
A sequiter than you.' W. O.

FAREWELL.

FAREWELL—my day of joy is o'er,

May ev'ry bliss be thine,—
And all on earth conspire to bless
A heart that once was mine.

Since first we pledg'd our mutual faith,
Thou' years have roll'd away,
Still do I love as at the first—
Still for thy welfare pray.

Oh! yes, tho' very false thou art,
I cannot with thee ill;
Thou' I have lost my peace of mind,
May thine be with thee still.

For well I know it is not meet,
A lowly maid like me—
With naught but virtuous love and truth,—
Should be a bride to thee.

Yet when in far distant lands,
Thou' fairs forms shalt see,—
Oh! sometimes in thy happy hours,
Bestow a thought on me.

For spring may bloom and summer come,
They will not charm me long—
Soon in the dark and silent tomb
This form will rest from wrong. ELIZA.

SONG.

TUNE—'Believe me if all those endearing young charms.'

Oh! trust not, my Stella, thy Strep'hon's
Bright eye,
It false as the mirror may prove,
Which reflects ev'ry fair form of whoe'er passes by—
So faithless, so changeable is love.

Then, trust not, fair maiden, his false specious brow,—
Oh! trust his soft whispers no more;
Thou' quietest calm, love, old ocean sleeps now,
His billows to-morrow may roar.

Yet still, if thy bosom fast heave at his name,
If still at his absence repine,
No longer endeavour to smother a flame
Which glows with an ardent divine;
For nothing can conquer love's once welcomed
power,
Thou' long it may absent have been;—
So Venus, tho' lost mid the day's noon-tide hour,
Bends bright when night curtains the scene.

ALPHOS.

TO ———

When amid the night's darkness red lightnings are flashing,

Transforming the gloom to the brightness of
day;

When the rain and the hail 'gainst our casements are splashing,

And the loud thunders fill every heart with dismay;

Tu then,—midst this awful convulsion of nature,
We learn what a poor helpless being is man;—

That the life and the strength of the noblest creature,

Compared with the Deity, is but a span.

Yet, when the storm's hush'd, and the black clouds are breaking,

And the far-distant murmur but faintly we hear;

We hail the first dawn of the twilight awaking,
And calmness dispels every desperate fear.

As grateful survivors, escaped from the blast,
The thoughts of our mind roam with absolute ease;

We look to the future, not grieve for the past,
And welcome the present, as token of peace.

Then thus, dearest  , the sky of our wishes

By tempests afflictive of late has been torn;

Yet we, like the mariner who ne'er relinquishes

The last drifted plank, though a hope quite forlorn.

Have clung to each other, 'midst woes all uplifting;

While thy love through adversity mounted to air,

And saved the poor wretch, from his pinnacle falling,

Who, but for thy succour, had sunk to despair.

But, now that our most poignant grief has subsided,

And now that our darkest forebodings are o'er;

Let me yield my heart's thanks to that love
which presided,

That love, which from mine shall be parted
no more;

What, though the noon-blaze of our joy yet be wanting,

And the beams which are rising, at present,
seem weak;

To fix on one hope, is a joy so enchanting,
'Tis a gladness to me, which no language can speak.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—Mr. Haynes's tragedy of Conscience was performed, for the fifth time, on Monday night, to a crowded audience, who paid it the just tribute of unqualified applause. an approbation the more legitimate and valuable, as it is obtained by the beauty of the language and the continued interest of the story, and not by any clap-traps or stage artifices. The tragedy was much better acted than on the first night. Mr. Wallack, in the character of Lorenzo, made a considerable impression, and delivered several of the striking passages which abound in the part, with much effect. Mrs. West is not equal to the part of Elmira, but she was effective in many of the scenes, and elicited much applause. Indeed, it would require the talents of a Siddons or an O'Neil to do full justice to the character.

A new after-piece, in two acts, called Mistification, was produced at this theatre, on Saturday night. It consists of a series of unintelligible and unmeaning hoaxes, with as little humour and ingenuity as possible. The piece was favourably received, and ample justice done to it by Messrs. Cooper, Harley, Russell, Mrs. Edwin, Mrs. Orger, and Miss Povey, but their united talents will not be able to keep it long on the boards. Miss Povey had a pretty song, composed by Mr. T. Cooke, which was encored.

Oratorios.—The last oratorio for the present Lent, was performed on Wednesday night, to a most crowded and brilliant house. This is the last year of Sir George Smart's lease of the theatre, and the selection of Wednesday was well calculated to impress the audience with a lively sense of the loss that will be sustained in the retirement of this able and most liberal conductor. In addition to the rare combination of talent which had previously graced this house, we had, on this occasion, the gratification of hearing Angrisani and Ambrogetti, Miss Stephens, the Mademoiselles Corri, and Madame Vestris. A new ode, intitled Peace, in honour of the accession of his Majesty, the words by Mr. Bellchambers, the music by Bocha, was produced, and accompanied by the composer's pupils, on the harps; it possesses considerable merit, both as to its poetry and the music, and was received with great applause. M. Toulou, from the French Academy of Music, performed, for the first time in this country, on the flute. His style is much more remarkable for its exquisite softness than its power,—a circumstance which contrasts him very favourably with Drouet, and would, no doubt, if we could bear them in concert, add to the reputation of each. M. Toulou is evidently a complete master of his instrument, and he met with a very favourable reception.—Lindley on the violinello, Griesbach on the oboe, Williams on the clarinet, and Puzzi on the horn, had each a part in the concert, and it is hardly necessary to say, gave entire satisfaction. We were sorry to find the fine talent of Kieswetter thrown away on a part in a quartetto that is infinitely beneath him. Indeed, we suppose it might have been very well played by any performer in the orchestra.—There will be another selection on Whitsun Eve.

COVENT GARDEN.—We are told that man is an imitative being, but he certainly never became so much so as at the present day; when the principal merit of our farces is to be made to consist in mimicry. We thought the town had got weary of this, or that, at least, nothing but the superior excellence of Mathews would induce the public to tolerate it. But we are mistaken, and a new after-piece, in one act, called London Stars, which was produced at this theatre, owed its success (and it was successful) to Mr. Yates's imitations of all the principal performers of the metropolis, including Emery, in Tyke; Macready, in Virginius; Farnen, Braham, &c. The dialogue is below mediocrity, but these imitations, with the excellent acting of Blanchard, Connor, and Mrs. Davenport, carried the piece through triumphantly.

Literature and Science.

New Printing Press.—The foreign journals state, that Mr. Hellfarth, a printer, at Erfurt, has invented a press to print eight sheets at a time. This machine, which may be made of any size, supplies 7000 copies of each sheet in twelve hours, making 56,000 sheets printed on both sides. The machine is put in motion by one horse, and three men are sufficient to supply it with sheets and take them away. Each sheet perfects itself.

Magnetism.—Professor Hanstein, of Christiana, has announced that he has ascertained that every perpendicular object, of whatever materials,—for instance, a tree, the wall of a house, &c. has a magnetic north pole at the foot, and a south pole at the top.

Scarlet Fever.—It is announced in the Journal de Medecine Pratique of Berlin, that the Belladonna is a preservative against the scarlet fever. The fact was first discovered at Leipsic, but it has lately been confirmed by several experiments.

Geography.—Count Romanzow has fitted out two new expeditions from Russia. In one, the adventurers are to endeavour to travel along the solid ice on the coast of Tschutski, from Asia to America; the other, to ascend one of the rivers on the north-west coast, in order to penetrate the unknown space which is between Icy Cape and Mackenzie's River.

TO READERS & CORRESPONDENTS.

We shall be happy to hear again from L. L. D. The communications of Julian, B. W., O. T., W. I., and B. A., have been received.

The Family Trunk, No. VI., in our next. The arguments of our Northern correspondent, appear to us to have been anticipated in his former letter on the same subject.

'Kneilworth, or the Pageant of 1575,' has not sufficient general interest for insertion.

'The Parting' is under consideration.

C. P.—y puzzles us, for, with all our sagacity, we are unable to say how long an 'ignorant fool,' as he calls himself, would be in becoming well grounded in grammar, logic, mathematics, and Latin.

Errata, p. 205, c. 1, 2, for 'away' read 'way'; p. 220, c. 3, 1, 2, for 'Mr.' read 'Matthew'; 1. 45, for 'servients' read 'servientes.'

PERRY'S SYSTEM OF EDUCATION.

A DISCOVERY important to all concerned in the Education of Youth, has been made by Mr. Perry, of Manchester. It is a System of Education for Academies and Schools in general, in which the Classics, Mathematics, and Commercial branches are taught, which possesses the following peculiar and remarkable advantages.—1. The pupils of a Seminary, how numerous soever they may be, receive much more instruction, and make disproportionately greater progress, than on the prevailing systems, and are taught individually as in private tuition, without any aid from Assistants or Monitors. 2. Imperfect instruction is essentially incompatible with the principles of the System. 3. Every moment of each scholar's time is wholly employed. 4. The pupils acquire an unusual accuracy and facility of expression, both in oral and written language. 5. The trouble and fatigue of teaching a school of indefinite extent, are incomparably less than on other systems, even where they are aided by all the services that Assistants or Monitors can lend. 6. The subsidiary practices are much more powerful than those adopted in the prevailing systems. 7. The pupils are delighted with the System. 8. It exceeds all other systems in Economy. 9. The system is unique in its principle, and, therefore, essentially different from all others. 10. Teachers and their academies quickly learn the system.—Comprehensive introductions to every branch of Academic Education, with extensive selections from the Classics, have been drawn up purposely to suit the principles of the system, by Mr. Perry, and published for him. A prospectus, in which the advantages of this New System are more minutely detailed, with testimonials from schools that have adopted it, and the terms on which the heads of Seminaries for either sex are taught the system, or any part of the United Kingdom, on application (post paid) to Mr. Perry, Academy, Manchester. No premium will be required, should the party taught not adopt the system. Teachers are instructed in the system, in the succession in which they transmit their names. An interview may be had with Mr. Perry, for a few days, and also Prospectuses, at No. 3, Adam Street, Adelphi, from 10 o'clock till 2, and from 4 till 7—April 13th, 1821.

Narrative of the Chinese Embassy to the Khan of the Tourgouth Tartars, in the years 1713, 13, 14, and 15; by the Chinese Ambassador, and published by the Emperor's authority, at Peking. Translated from the Chinese, and accompanied by an Appendix of Miscellaneous Translations. By Sir George Thomas Staunton, Bart. LL.D. & F.R.S. 8vo. pp. 330. London, 1821.

THE Embassy to the Tourgouth Tartars, the particulars of which are detailed in the volume before us, was certainly a singular and remarkable event in Chinese history. The appointment of a deputation, consisting of several official persons, with a suitable train, to proceed upon a laborious, and, in some degree, hazardous expedition, to a distance of some thousand miles, and through the territories of a powerful neighbour, with whom they had little previous intercourse, and that not always of the most amicable nature, certainly seems to bespeak the existence of a spirit of enterprise, and more enlarged and enlightened views, in the government of China at that period, than their subsequent history had taught us to expect. This spirit, in a considerable degree, attributable to the unusual energy which had been just infused into the administration of the Chinese government, by the then recent accession of the present Tartar dynasty, and the occupation of the throne by a monarch distinguished by his virtues and talents, and, comparatively speaking, by his enlightened liberality.

The Tourgouth tribes had separated from the kindred tribes of Eleuths, and migrated from their original place of settlement, in a more eastern division of Tartary, to that extensive tract of country which was granted them by the Russians, between the Volga and the Jaisk, in the vicinity of the Caspian Sea. One of the objects of the Embassy was to keep up the connexion between the Chinese and those expantriated Tartars, and to keep open the way for their abandoning their temporary connexion with Russia, upon the first favourable opportunity, and conferring on the Chinese Empire the gratifying homage of their voluntary return and final submission. This return and submission actually took place in 1771, when they returned to their former settlements in the neighbourhood of China, and the Tourgouths are no longer numbered among the tribes in Russia.

Notwithstanding the apparent minuteness with which the proceedings of the Embassy are narrated by Tu-li-shin, the envoy, yet they furnish very little matter for interesting extract, either relating to the Chinese themselves, or to the manners and customs of the people among whom they travelled. Of Udinsky, we are told,—

‘There is in this country a sort of stone, about the size of the palm of the hand, which wholly consists of laminae, or flakes lying over each other. It having been found that these flakes are very thin and transparent, the people of this country separate them from each other, and use them instead of glass or crystal. The casements in the windows of all the Russian houses are fitted with this material.

A Chinese Embassy differs much from an European one. With us an ambassador, who has the good fortune to be often employed, may amass a tolerable property in snuff-boxes, &c. which are presented to him, but ‘the officers of the Chinese Empire, when employed on service by their sovereign, dare not accept of the smallest present.’

Near Yeniseik,—

‘There is a species of deer, which is used both for riding and carrying burthens. It is called go-lan; its colour is white and brown; it has horns, and is about the size of an ass or mule.

‘In the woods is found the bird ho-kec, [probably a species of pheasant.]

‘In the very coldest parts of this northern country, a species of animal is found which burrows under the earth, and which dies if it is at all exposed at any time to the sun and air. It is of great size, and weighs ten thousand kin.’ Its bones are very white and shining, like ivory. It is not by nature a powerful animal, and is, therefore, not very dangerous or ferocious. It is found generally in the mud upon the banks of rivers. The Russians collect the bones of this animal, in order to make cups, saucers, combs, and other small articles. The flesh of the animal is of a very refrigerating quality, and is eaten as a remedy in fevers. The foreign name of this animal is Ma-men-tou va. We call it Kee-shoo.’

When the Embassy arrived at Tobolsky, they were well received by the Governor, General Kokolin (Prince Gagarin), who had previously sent a Russian officer, Yee-fan Go-fan Na-si-che, to meet them. Among other questions asked by this officer, he inquired, ‘what are the different ranks of ministers and great officers of state in China? Whom do you esteem amongst them the most honourable and exalted.’ To which Tu-li-shin answered,—

‘In our empire of China we have five ranks or orders, intitled Tsin-ung, Kuan-ung, Pei-wei, Pei-tse, and Kuo-lung, which orders are exclusively appropriated to the members of the imperial family, these personages being all considered as so many streams diverging from one and the same heavenly source. We have likewise other hereditary dignities; such as the Kung, Heon, Pe, and others, by which we enoble the sons and grand-sons of former distinguished ministers. As to the administration of the government, we have, in the interior department, great officers of state immediately attending on His Majesty's person (Ling-shu-ku-ta-chia), and we have colossals or ministers of state (Ta-hio-Sue). In the exterior departments we have the presidents of the several supreme tribunals (Shang-shu), and the generals and commanders in chief of the several detached corps of the army (Tu-lung, Chin-fung, Tung-lung, and Hoo-king-tung-lung). In the provinces we have Tartar generals (Tsang-kun), viceroys (Tsang-too), and Chinese generals (Ti-too). All the foregoing whom we have mentioned, are great officers of state, and hold the first rank in the empire.

‘Yee-fan Go-fan Na-si-che then said,— ‘In our Russian empire, the Cha-han-Khan has four great officers of state immediately attached to his person, who have power, whenever any business occurs, to transact and determine selves, upon their own authority, and without making any previous communication on the subject to their sovereign; have you any such great officers of state in China? And among those your excellencies have already described, whom do you esteem the greatest and most honourable?"

"We said,—“In our empire of China, none of the great officers of state are empowered to transact state affairs upon their own authority; in respect to such affairs, no distinction is made between the greater, and the lesser. They must, on all occasions, be regularly submitted to his Majesty; his gracious pleasure must be solicited, and his conclusive decision respectfully awaited. When the latter is received, his Majesty's ministers may then reverently proceed to the execution of the same; but none can, on such occasions, so far presume as to do any thing of their own accord. Among the great officers we have mentioned, the six officers who attend on his Majesty's person, and the six ministers of state, are the most exalted in dignity; none in the service of the government can be held to be superior.”

"Yee-jun Go-fan Na-si-che then said,—“In our empire of Russia, when consultations are held upon great affairs of state, our Chia-han Khan personally attends and assists at the council. In China, when you have consultations upon state affairs, does your emperor attend in the same manner?"

"We replied,—“In China, when any important affairs of government are to be taken into consideration, the princes, and the other great officers of the state council, meet to consult, and also to decide thereon provisionally; they then report their proceedings to the Emperor, and await his conclusive determination. But in our country the Emperor has no such custom as that of assisting personally in deliberations of this nature.”

Of the Russian code at that period, we are told, that,—

"According to the laws of the Russian empire, all persons who have been found guilty of treason, rebellion, or any similar offences, are executed by dividing their bodies and limbs into four quarters. Those who are guilty of deserting in time of battle are beheaded. Those also are beheaded who rob or wound travellers upon the highways, or who at any time commit murder. Persons who kill or wound each other in an affray, are made to suffer an injury equal to that which they had inflicted. Those who kill in any case with a sharp weapon are put to death. Those who cut and wound others are punished by chopping off the hand. Those who are guilty of a theft of government stores, are punished more or less severely, in proportion to the value and amount of the property stolen: some have their ears or noses cut off, some are branded, some banished. Those who counterfeit the current coin, are put to death by pouring melted metal down their throats. Those who sell wine or tobacco without licenses are severely beaten, and then banished with their families. In a case of adultery, aggravated by the subsequent murder of the husband, the wife is executed by being buried alive, with her head just above the ground; and the adulterer is hung on a tree. In common cases of adultery, the wife is severely beaten, and then returned to her husband, who cannot refuse to receive her. The adulterer, after being severely beaten, pays a fine to government. Young unmarried persons who cohabit, are severely beaten, and then compelled to marry.”

At Saratof, the Embassy was met by a deputation from the Khan of the Tourgouths, bearing presents from one of the Tourgouth Princes. The Embassy thence set out for the headquarters of the Tourgouths, upon the banks of the Lake Manuto, where they were received by the Khan A-yu-ke with suitable honours:—

"The tai-kis and priests (says the ambassador) were sent out by A-yu-ke to meet us upon the road, and so conduct us to the place prepared for our accommodation.—Accordingly, upon our approach, we found all the tai-kis, the priests, and the several chiefs of such of the Mang-gou tribes as are subject to A-yu-ke, drawn up in lines upon the road, together with their followers, to pay their respects to us. Their flocks and herds were also collected and displayed, and tables, covered with provisions, laid out before us. All the people had come out to a very considerable distance to meet us; great numbers of them even knelt down at our horses' heads, and in that posture offered their various eatables to our acceptance; and in all things they testified to us the utmost respect and attention.

"In the afternoon, A-yu-ke Khan sent Ko-ra, one of the priests who was immediately attached to his person, and others to wait upon us, and to say,—“Our Khan proposes to-morrow, it being a fortunate day, to have an interview with your excellencies, and to receive in form the edict of the most excellent Emperor.”

"Accordingly, on the 2nd day of the moon, we proceeded to wait on the Khan, taking with us the Imperial Edict, and followed by the tai-kis and priests of the Tourgouths in procession, and by our guard of Russian soldiers and officers. On arriving at A-yu-ke Khan's great tent of ceremony, we dismounted from our horses, and advancing with the Imperial Edict, delivered it in person. A-yu-ke received it kneeling; and then, turning towards the north, reverently wished the great Emperor of the East every felicity. This ceremony being concluded, we then proceeded to explain to him his Imperial Majesty's pleasure.

"“Our Emperor,” we said, “inquires, in his Edict, after the Khan's health. Being desirous of sending back to you your nephew O-la-pu-tchu-cur, and thus restoring him to the bosom of his family, he has ordered that the Russian merchant Ha-mi-sa-cur should be consulted with on the subject. He has already sent back four of O-la-pu-tchu-cur's attendants, and the arrangements for the prince's own return are now in progress agreeably to his Majesty's gracious intentions. The sincere and zealous attachment you have evinced by sending to our court your envoy Sa-mo-tan, with respectful inquiries and valuable offerings, his Majesty particularly notices and applauds; and, in consequence, specially depute the Eleuth Shu-ko-mi-se and us, to declare to you his imperial edict, and to deliver to you the presents which he sends you as marks of his favour.

"A-yu-ke Khan having expressed himself very grateful to his Majesty, invited us to sit down on his right hand; the music then began to play, and an entertainment was served up before us.

"A-yu-ke Khan having afterwards inquired of us respectfully concerning the venerable age of his Majesty, we informed him that our Emperor was born in the year Kia-pu, and was at this time in the 61st year of his age.

"A-yu-ke Khan then inquired, what was the number of the imperial princes, his Majesty's sons.

"We said, “those of his Majesty's sons who usually accompany him on his hunting excursions, some of whom are decorated with the titles of Ching, Fang, Kien, Fang, Pei-le, Pei-tse, are sixteen in number; how many more sons his Majesty may have, who, on account of their youth, have not yet gone beyond the precincts of the palace, we know not, as under such circumstances we can have no opportunity of seeing them.

"A-yu-ke Khan then inquired the number of the imperial princesses, his Majesty's daughters.

"We said, “We have heard that above ten of his Majesty's daughters are already settled in marriage; but, respecting the number of those who may be still within the precincts of the palace, we know nothing.”

"A-yu-ke Khan continued his inquiries by saying, “I have understood that his Imperial Majesty, in order to avoid the summer heats, visits, every year, his country residence, and there partakes of the diversion of hunting. What is the name of the place? how far is it from the capital? when does his Majesty proceed to it? and when does he return from it?”

"We replied, “the place which our Emperor visits, in order to avoid the summer heats, is called Je-ho or Ko-la-jo-tun. It is seven or eight days' journey from the imperial city. Every year, about the latter end of the 4th, or the beginning of the 5th moon, his Majesty sets out upon this journey. In the mid-autumn, or immediately at the last day of deer-hunting, which occurs in the course of the 9th moon, his Majesty always returns to his capital."

A-yu-ke Khan further inquired respecting the mountains, rivers, trees, and other vegetable productions of that country. We added: "Je-ha is situated beyond the boundary line of the Great Wall. There are there both high mountains and great rivers. The water is peculiarly sweet and excellent. The woods, as well as all other vegetation, are extremely luxuriant. Various kinds of beasts and birds are also found there in great abundance."

A-yu-ke Khan continued his inquiries, saying: "how do the people plough and sow the earth in your Emperor's country? do the times of sowing depend on the rainy seasons; or are the fields overflooded artificially?"

We replied, "In the empire of China, we plant or sow all the five species of grain, and also the various kinds of vegetables. In some places the fields are overflooded by art, in others they are watered by the rains only, and sown accordingly."

After an exchange of civilities, and the business of the mission was accomplished, the Embassy set out on its return, under very favourable circumstances, as to the season, weather, &c. if the following description is at all correct:—

"At this season of the year, the golden winds played softly upon the luxuriant verdure. The trees had not yet lost their foliage. The hills encompassing our route displayed the various tints of azure, yellow, and red. The surface of the grounds sparkled with icicles. Ropy and brilliant skies illuminated the forests. The whole scene seemed to our eyes like a piece of beautiful painting."

Kakolin, already mentioned, speaking of the affairs of his country, and the character of the Tourgouth tribes, says,—

"I have lately been at San-pi-ti-lipucur (St. Petersburg), and have had an interview there with the Cha-han Khan. The district of St. Petersburg belonged formerly to the kingdom of Sweden; but my sovereign, the Cha-han Khan, having invaded and conquered it, has built and fortified a city there, which, after the Khan's name, is now called St. Petersburg. This city is laid out on a plan exceeding in extent the city of Moscow, and the Khan has now made it his established residence. This year the Khan has fought another campaign with the kingdom of Sweden, and has taken from the Swedes twenty-one ships, one general officer, and eight hundred soldiers. Just now, the French and the other nations have joined the Swedes, and are assisting them in the defence of their towns and cities. The soldiers of these nations are all warlike and obedient to a strict discipline, so that when they march into action they always fight desperately, and never harbour a thought of retreating. But it is otherwise with the soldiers of the Tourgouths; they are lawless and disorderly. When they are brought into action they readily draw their bows and fire their guns, if the enemy is at a distance; but if the enemy is near them, they think of nothing but running away. There is no vigour or steadiness in their operations. If, by chance, they are at any time victorious, the only object they aim at is plunder. Ten years ago, our Khan engaged the services of ten thousand of the Tourgouth troops, and attached them to his army; but, although he opposed three thousand of them to a party of no more than three hundred Swedes, they were unable to gain the victory."

With this extract we close the Narrative of the Embassy, which might have been rendered much more interesting, if the Chinese names had not been so much retained as to render the narrative often unintelligible. The Appendix of translations has nothing to do with the subject of the Narrative, and is by no means calculated to give a good idea of Chinese literature, although, we presume, that was the view with which it was inserted.

General Index to the Gentleman's Magazine, from the Year 1787 to 1818, both inclusive. With a Prefatory Introduction, descriptive of the Rise and Progress of the Magazine, with Anecdotes of the Projector and his early Associates. By John Nichols, F. S. A. 8vo. Vols. III., IV., & V. London, 1821.

We dare say many of our readers, on seeing the title to the present review, will be as much surprised as a friend to whom we intimated our intention of making an Index the subject of a critical notice. 'What!' he exclaimed with a sneer, 'review an index! why I never heard of such a thing! you might as well review the Army List, the Court Guide, the Price Current, Lackington's new Catalogue, a Tavern Bill of Fare, the Ready Reckoner, or the London Directory. Review an index, and that, too, when works of so much value and interest are teeming from the press,—not to mention my own trifle, which, like a petition for Parliamentary Reform, was, on being presented, ordered "to lie on the table," where it has remained for more than two months unnoticed!' We were about to reply, (though not to retort about his 'trifle,' as he called a bulky octavo of six hundred pages, on the balance of power, printed uniformly with the best edition of Hume and Smollett, to which he intends it as a supplement! when our friend interrupted us, by adding, 'well, I suppose you reviewers imagine, that you can—'

'Find tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, Sermons in stones, and good in every thing.'

We were just permitted to hitch in that we would wish to do this,—when our friend hastily bade us good morning, and left us to make the best of our subject. We are not, however, insensible that an index does seem a very strange subject for a review; but, when our readers are told it is an index to a work which was the first of its kind in England,—a work which has enjoyed a high reputation for a period of ninety years,—and that the Index is prefaced by an historical narrative of the origin and progress of this work, they may then, perhaps, admit that we have had some reasons for making it the subject of a critical notice.

It has been well observed, that 'the periodical publications of every country are the archives in which the learned and philosophers hasten to deposit their discoveries and the result of their researches.' Such being the case, we shall take a very brief view of the origin of literary journals, before we proceed to notice Mr. Nichols's Preface.

Among the most laudable attempts of the seventeenth century, may be reckoned the plan then first adopted of acquainting the public, through the medium of a journal, with what passes in the republic of letters. This honour belongs to M. de Salles, Ecclesiastical Counsellor of the Parliament of Paris. His journal was received with universal applause, and was soon followed by others, on the same plan, in Italy and Germany. In 1682, Mr. Mencke began the Acta Eruditorum Lipsiensis, which was carried on several years with increasing celebrity.

When Bayle and Le Clerc fixed their residence in the Low Countries, the first at Rotterdam, and the other at Amsterdam, they were much surprised to find that in Holland,—which might then be called the mart of learning and the rendezvous of learned men, in consequence of the freedom of the press, the number of booksellers and immense libraries, public and private,—that, in such a country and with such advantages, no person had as yet thought of publishing a literary journal. M. Le Clerc immediately commenced one, which he continued down to 1737. M. Bayle was so busily engaged in composing his Biographical Dictionary, that he was obliged to drop his periodical labours in a few years; but M. Beauval took it up and continued it under the title of The Works of the Learned. M. Bernard's News from the Republic of Letters, was well received, as well as the Journal de Trevoux: the latter, however, was considered as a partial production in matters of religion and politics, and was conducted by a party of Jesuits.

In 1710, M. de Pontchartrain, Lord High Chancellor of France, engaged some of the ablest pens in the Academy, to conduct a new journal: M. Fontenelle wrote the philosophical part, M. Du Pin laboured in theology with general approbation, and M. Vaillant was not less successful in antiquities, &c. In England, we had not a regular literary journal until the time of Mr. Edward Cave,—

'The first projector of the Monthly Magazines; To 'invention all admitt'd; and each how he To be th' inventor mis'd' &c.'

We come now to the preface of the veteran editor, Mr. Nichols, who gives an interesting account of the work he has long and so ably conducted. The Gentleman's Magazine was commenced in January, 1731, by Edward Cave, of whom Dr. Johnson, in his biography of him, has said 'few lives would have more readers, if all those who received improvements or entertainment from him should retain so much kindness for their benefactor as to inquire after his conduct and character.' The primary object of the Magazine at its commencement was to give a monthly view of all the pieces of wit and humour and intelligence daily offered to the public in the newspapers. The next object with Mr. Cave, was to publish the parliamentary proceedings, a rather dangerous practice, as the orders of the house were at that time against it. He had the plan some time in contemplation before he ventured to act upon it; at length he boldly dared, and began in January, 1732, by giving the king's speech only. In June, he gave two protests of the Lords, and in the Commons the Speaker's thanks to Lord Gage, May 31, 1732, with his lordship's reply. But in July, the Parliament being then prorogued, he ventured to introduce the 'proceedings and debates of the last session of Parliament,' which were given with the initial and final letters of the names of the several speakers.

In order to obtain the debates, Cave used to take a friend or two with him into one of the houses of Parliament, and there privately take down notes of the several speeches. Thus furnished, he and his associates adjourned to a neighbouring tavern, where they compared and adjusted their notes. The reducing this crude matter into form was the work of a future day, and of an abler hand; Guthrie, the historian, a writer for the booksellers, was retained by Cave for the purpose. It appears from some letters of Mr. Cave, that Dr. Birch was one of the friends who sometimes accompanied him when taking minutes of the debates.

In 1734, Dr. Johnson, in a letter from Birmingham, tendered his assistance to Mr. Cave, and suggested that, besides the current wit of the month, the Magazine should admit not only poems, inscriptions, &c. never printed before, but also short literary dissertations in Latin or English; critical remarks on authors, ancient or modern; forgotten poems that deserve revival; and these he undertook to furnish on reasonable terms.

Mr. Cave now commenced offering prizes, sometimes of 50*l.* at other times of a gold medal, for the best poems on subjects that were fixed. The success that attended this work produced a number of competitors; but, of nearly twenty imitators, the London Magazine, which was supported by a powerful association of booksellers, was the only rival of any standing. It obtained a considerable sale for some years, and was continued until 1785, when it ceased to be published.

In 1738, Dr. Johnson transmitted his poem of 'London' to Mr. Cave, as the production of an author then 'under very disadvantageous circumstances of fortune,' and calling on him to 'encourage learning and relieve distress by his usual generosity.'

Mr. Cave was the first publisher that engaged the pen of Johnson, and a lasting and intimate friendship subsisted between them. It is not a little remarkable, however, that the Doctor, on first coming to town, applied, among others, to Mr. Wilcox, then a bookseller of some eminence in the Strand. Mr. Wilcox, after surveying his robust frame with a significant look, said 'young man, you had better buy a porter's knot.' The great moralist was not offended at the advice given him, but when he used to relate the anecdote, always added—'Wilcox was one of my best friends.'

Mr. Nichols inserts several of the Doctor's letters to Mr. Cave, by which it appears that his circumstances were far from flourishing. In one of them, dated April, 1738, in which he mentions having written a Greek epigram to Mr. Carter, who he says 'ought to be celebrated in as many languages as Louis le Grand,' he adds 'I would leave my epigram, but have not day light to transcribe it.' In another letter, dated October in the same year, he concludes 'I am, Sir, your, impransus, S. JOHNSON.' Though this letter concludes with a fair confession that he had not a dinner, yet his benevolent heart was not insensible to the necessities of a humble labourer in literature, Mr. Macbean, whom he strongly recommends to Mr. Cave, as having good materials for a military dictionary, which he would write at twelve shillings a sheet.

The earliest known communication of Dr. Johnson to the Magazine was a copy of Latin verses to the editor, in March, 1738, and several other articles with the preface to that year's volume were from his pen. The ability and nice adaptation with which he could draw up a prefatory address was one of his peculiar excellencies, and the preface of this year was a striking proof of his talents in that line.

The parliamentary debates continued to form a regular part of the Magazine, until there was a rigid order of the house on the 13th of April, 1738, to prohibit it. Some expedient was now become necessary, and the caution of Cave suggested to him a popular fiction. In June, 1738, he prefaced the debates by what he chose to call 'An Appendix to Captain Samuel Gulliver's Account of the famous Empire of Lilliput; and the proceedings in Parliament were given as 'Debates in the Senate of Lilliput,' sometimes with feigned denominations of the several speakers, sometimes with designations formed of the letters of their real names, in the manner of an anagram. Dr. Johnson now became the conductor of Guthrie in writing the debates, and, in 1740, had the sole management of them, which he continued for some time. Mr. Nichols, speaking on this subject, says:—

'Six days only before his death, this incomparable friend requested to see the present writer, from whom he had previously borrowed some of the early volumes of the Magazine, with a professed intention to point out the pieces which he had written in that collection. The books lay on the table, with many leaves doubled down, particularly those which contained his share in the Parliamentary Debates. And such was the goodness of Johnson's heart, that he solemnly declared, "that the only part of his writings which then gave him any compunction, was his account of the debates in the Gentleman's Magazine; but that at the time he wrote them, he did not think he was imposing on the world.—The mode," he said, "was to fix upon a speaker's name; then to make an argument for him; and to conjure up an answer." He wrote those debates with more velocity than any other of his productions; or often three columns of the magazine within the hour. He once wrote ten pages in a single day, and that not a long one, beginning, perhaps, at noon, and ending early in the evening.

* Inscription beneath a portrait of Mr. Cave.
—Eu.

In addition to the parliamentary debates, Johnson wrote a variety of articles for the Magazine, on almost all subjects, and the prefaces for many years were by him; and yet, with all his talents and his industry, and he was extraordinary in both, he had to struggle hard for a very humble maintenance, and he was now and then applying to Cave for a guinea, with all the submissiveness of poverty.

In 1747, complaint having been made in the House of Lords, against Mr. Cave, for printing an account of the trial of Lord Lovat, in the Magazine, he was taken into custody, reprimanded by their lordships, and imprisoned some time. Dr. Johnson's time now became too much occupied with his Dictionary, the Rambler, &c. to contribute much to the Magazine. Mr. Cave was the publisher of the Rambler, the sale of which was very inconsiderable, and seldom more than five hundred; it is remarkable, and a curious trait of the age, that the only paper which had a prosperous sale, and may be said to have been popular, was one which Dr. Johnson did not write. This was number 97, which was said to have been written by Richardson.

In 1751, a material change took place in the compilation of the miscellaneous part of the Magazine. Selections from other periodical publications were gradually laid aside, and the miscellany was rendered in a great degree an original work. Cave continued to improve his Magazine until his death, in 1754. It had been his favourite and his most successful speculation. He had it much at heart, and it has been said of him, that he never looked out of his window but with a view to benefit his magazine. If he heard of the loss of a single customer, he would say, 'let us be sure to look up something, taking of the best, for the next month.'

Among the early friends and correspondents of the Magazine, during Cave's life, was the ingenious but unfortunate Samuel Boyse, author of a poem, entitled, 'The Deity,' of whom the following melancholy particulars were related to Mr. Nichols, by Dr. Johnson, not long before his death:—

'By addicting himself to low vices, among which were gluttony and extravagance, Boyse rendered himself so contemptible and wretched, that he frequently was without the least subsistence for days together. After squandering away, in a dirty manner, any money which he had acquired, he has been known to pawn all his apparel. Dr. Johnson once collected a sum of money to redeem his clothes, which, in two days after, were pawned again. "This," said the doctor, "was when my acquaintances were few, and most of them as poor as myself. The money was collected by shillings." In that state he was frequently confined to his bed, sitting up with his arms through holes in a blanket, writing verses, in order to procure the means of existence. It seems hardly credible, but it is certainly true, that he was more than once in that deplorable situation, and to the end of his life never derived any advantage from the experience of his past sufferings. Mr. Boyse translated well from the French, but by the time one sheet of the work was done, he pawned the original. If the employer redeemed it, a second sheet would be completed, and the book again be pawned; and this perpetually. He had very little learning; but wrote verse with great facility, as fast as most would write prose. He was constantly employed by Mr. Cave, who paid him by the hundred lines, which, after awhile, his employer wanted to make what is called the long hundred. A late collector of poems, (Mr. Giles,) says, he was informed by Mr. Sandby, the bookseller, that this unhappy man was found dead in his bed, with a pen in his hand, and in the act of writing, in the same manner as above described. This circumstance Dr. Johnson assured me was not true; it being supposed, that in a fit of intoxication, he was run over by a coach; at least, he was brought home in such a condition, as to make this probable, but too far gone to give any account of the accident.'

The usual signature to Boyse's communications in the Magazine, was either Y. or Alceus. Mr. Nichols has preserved a letter from him to Mr. Cave, dated from a spunging-house, in Grocers' Alley, in the Poultry, requesting half-a-guinea to pay for his lodging, and get him some victuals, as without it, his coat would be taken from his back, and he sent to the Compter naked. His letter commences with the following:—

'Inscription for St. Lawrence's Cove.

Modie, teste celo summo,
Sine panno, sine nummo,
Sorte positus infestè,
Scribo tibi dolens moratè:
Pame, bile tumet jecur,
URBANE, mitte opem, precor;
Tibi enim cor humanum
Non a malis alienum;
Mibi meus nec malè grata.

Pro à te favore data

ALCEUS

'Ex gehennâ debitorû, vulgò domo spongiatorid.'

On the death of Cave, the Magazine came under the immediate guidance of Mr. David Henry, who had married a sister of Mr. Cave, and a nephew of the original projector. In 1778, Mr. Nichols purchased a considerable share of the proprietorship, and in January, 1783, the Magazine was enlarged and advanced in price, and some of the early volumes were reprinted. In 1790, the price was raised to eighteen-pence, and in 1809, to two shillings, at which price it has since remained. Mr. Nichols, in his preface, has principally confined himself to the history of the Magazine, previous to the time that he became its editor, speaking with due modesty of its subsequent career. He has, however, given a list of its contributors in its latter period, which includes almost every name in the least distinguished in the annals of science and literature: and, notwithstanding the numerous and very able competitors with which the Gentleman's Magazine has had to struggle, it still maintains its rank and its reputation.

We have hitherto only noticed the preface; and we shall now say a few words of the Index, which appears to us to be copious, and distinct, and systematically arranged. There are four indexes; the first is to the essays, &c.; the second to the poetry; the third to the names of persons; and the fourth is an index to the engravings.

Annals of the Coinage of Britain and its Dependencies. By the Rev. R. Rading.

DURING the turbulent reign of Henry III. various abuses had accumulated, of which none was more injurious than the adulteration of the coins, for its mischievous effects extended even to the lowest of his subjects. The regulated produce of his mints was clipped and diminished to less than half its le-gual weight, so that foreign merchants would not bring over their commodities, and every thing that was sold became very dear. On the accession of Edward I. he hastened to repair these evils, and began by inflicting severe punishment on all those who deteriorated the coin. He was particularly severe on the Jews, whom he seized in every city and burgh in England on the same day, the octave of St. Martin, 1278,—their goods were forfeited to the King, and many of them executed.

A new coinage took place in 1279; exchanges of money were appointed in various places, and the currency of clipped money strictly forbidden. Several other regulations were also made respecting the coinage, which were in some cases very oppressive. The style of Edward, upon the obverse of his coins, is Rex Anglie, Dominus Hibernie, which latter title he first introduced upon the money of England, though it had appeared upon the great seal of our monarchs from the accession of King John. The reverse of his money is ornamented, if that term be applicable, with the unmeaning cross and pellets. His Irish money is distinguished from the English by the triangle, which encloses the head. His Anglo-Gallic coins have on the obverse, his name, spelled EDWARDVS, or EDOARDVS, with the addition of REX only. They were all struck, as appears from the inscription on the reverse, in his Earldom of Ponthieu. The custom of stamping the moneyer's name upon the coins, began to grow into disuse in this reign.

Edward II. ordered that the money should be current at the proper value which it bore in the reign of his predecessor. He also made some severe regulations respecting clipped and base money, which, however, still continued to multiply. The style which this monarch used upon his coins differs from that of Edward I. merely in the manner in which the name is written, which is either EDWA or EDWAR. In every other respect his English money is exactly similar to that of his father, as is also his style upon the great seal. The same remark applies to his Anglo-Gallic money.

One of the first measures of Edward III. was to enforce the ordinances of his father and grandfather, relative to the corruption of the lawful coins, and the introduction of base money by foreigners. He issued a proclamation, that no moneyer, or officer of the Mint or Exchange in London, should go abroad without the King's special license, and prohibited the exportation of good money, on pain of death and the forfeiture of goods. The melting of money to make vessels, &c. by goldsmiths, was also restrained. In the year 1331, it was determined that halfpennies and farthings should be coined, with one-sixth of alloy, or 3s. 4d. in 20s. Notwithstanding these regulations, the scarcity of money continued. A gold coinage was made in the year 1343, the only one for a period of ninety years. It was of three sorts; that is, one coin with two leopards*, each piece to be current for six shillings, and to be of equal weight with two petit florins of Florence of full weight. Another piece of one leopard, and another piece of one Helm, being respectively the half and quarter of the larger coin, and of proportional value. The type presented upon the largest of his coins, an impression allusive to the royal arms of England; whilst the half bore a mantle on which his shield was displayed, quartering the arms of France and England; and the smallest piece was stamped with his crest. It was soon discovered that this money was rated too high, and it was generally brought into the Mint, and recoined into nobles, Maille nobles, and Ferling nobles. The value of the coins was frequently altered during the long reign of this monarch.

On the English coins of Edward III. his name is variously written. His gold money gives it EDWA. EDWAR, or EDWARD; his silver, sometimes EDWARD, but more usually EDWARDVS. After his conquest of France, he added the title of that kingdom to those of England and Ireland; but, at the ratification of the treaty of Bretigny, in 1360, he agreed to relinquish his claim to that crown, and accordingly his coins appear without the title, until he again resumed it, in 1369, when the peace was broken by the Dauphin, Charles, then regent. On his Anglo-Gallic money his name is sometimes abbreviated to Ed.

The words DEI GRATIA appear now for the first time on the English money. They were inscribed upon his earliest gold coins, and afterwards upon the groats, but never upon the small pieces of silver. It is remarkable that these emphatic words should not have obtained a place upon the coins at a much earlier period, as they are found upon all the great seals after the reign of William I. They were used as early as the latter end of the seventh century, by Ina, King of the West Saxons, in the introduction to his laws.

* These, though called leopards, were really lions.—REV.

Edward the Black Prince had the principality of Aquitain and Gascony conferred on him, with the privilege of coining monies. Under the authority of this grant, he struck various coins of gold and silver. On these coins he invariably styles himself, Primogenitus Regis Anglie, et Princeps Aquitanie.

The power of coining was also granted by King Edward to his fourth son, John, King of Castile and Leon, Duke of Lancaster, but of his money nothing satisfactory is known.

In the reign of Richard II. the warden, master, and other officers of the Mint, were examined before the Lords of Parliament, as to the state of the coinage, when they severally delivered their opinions at length. The result was a proclamation to prevent the export and encourage the import of money. The current value of the Scottish money was reduced one half, but the 'poor commons,' as they styled themselves, petitioned that it might be banished the realm altogether. The melting of money was prohibited; but, in 1396, a singular grant was issued to Margaret, Countess of Norfolk, and D. B. Goldsmith, of London, licensing them to melt down groats, half groats, and sterlings, to the amount of one hundred pounds, and to make thereof a silver vessel, for the use of the said Margaret, notwithstanding the statute.

The representation of Richard II. upon his coins does not differ from the busts of his three immediate predecessors. His name is written RICARD, or RICARDVS, with the title of REX ANGLIE ET FRANCIE, and DOMINVS HIBERNIE ET ACQUITANIE. The last title appears only on his gold coins. On the reverse of his silver money, is given the place of mintage.

During this reign, the Irish are said to have had little money, and to have merchandized chiefly in cattle. When Mac Murrough, an Irish chief, met the Earl of Gloucester, Richard's commander-in-chief, he was mounted on a horse which cost him, as it was said, four hundred cows.

Henry IV. repealed many of the statutes of his predecessor, relative to the coinage. The coins which he struck before his thirteenth year, were of the same weight as those of the preceding reign, but the subsequent coins were of diminished value. His name is written HENRIC or HENRICVS, with the title of REX ANGLIE ET FRANCIE DOMINVS HIBERNIE ET AQUITANIE.

Henry V. continued the reduced standard adopted by his father as to the weight and value of the coins; and, in consequence of a petition from the Commons, it was enacted that all manner of Scottish money of silver should be put out, and not be current in future for any payment in the realm of England. It was also enacted, that clipping, washing, and filing of money should be deemed and incur the pain of treason.

The English coins, both of gold and silver, of Henry V. are of the same weight with those of his successor, and cannot be distinguished from them; his Irish coinage is involved in equal obscurity. Some of his Anglo-Gallic money can, however, be satisfactorily ascertained: such as the Mouton, before the letter H. was placed in the centre of the reverse, in the year 1419, and likewise the Salute, with HERES FRANCIE.

No very material alteration in the coinage took place during the long reign of Henry VI. and although he had mints at several places, yet there is nothing in his coins to distinguish them from those of his predecessor.

In the fourth year of the reign of Edward IV. a new coinage took place; when the gold coins were reduced to twenty pounds sixteen shillings and eight pence, being the pound weight by tale; that is, there were to be made out of each pound of gold, fifty nobles, to be current at eight shillings and four pence; the silver was likewise reduced to thirty-seven shillings and sixpence the pound weight, by tale. In the following year, the monies were still further reduced, and the new nobles were called rials. The new species of money, called the angel, being of the value of the old noble, was called a noble-angel:—

On the reverse, the noble was distinguished by a sun, (which was the impress of Edward, and by him first introduced upon the coin,) surmounted by a rose, the badge of the house of York. This impress he adopted in commemoration of an extraordinary appearance in the heavens, immediately before the battle of Mortimer's Cross, in Herefordshire, where three suns were seen, which shone for a time, and then were suddenly conjoined in one. As Edward was then victorious, he from that time took a sun for his impress, which afterwards stood him in good stead at the battle of Barnet; when Warwick's cognizance, a star streaming with rays, being mistaken in a fog for Edward's sun, occasioned some of King Henry's soldiers to attack each other, and thus drove the Earl of Oxford, who suspected treachery, with the forces under his command, from the field.

Edward IV. does not appear to have made any alteration in the general type of his coins, only by the name, or the weight, or by the Mint marks; and he was the first English monarch who used the royal badge, a flaming sun, for that purpose. On his English silver coins, he is styled EDWARD DEI GRATIA REX ANGLIE ET FRANCIE. The reverse of the groats bears this inscription,—POSUI DEUM ADIUTOREM MEUM, with the place of Mintage, in an inner circle. The half-groats have as much of the legend as their size will admit. The penny, half-penny, and farthing, have the name of the Mint only on the reverse. His gold coins have the addition of DOMINVS HIBERNIE, to his title.

It is said by Ross, of Warwick, in his Historia Regum Anglie, that Edward V. actually struck money, but as none of these coins have yet been ascertained, it is probable that they were struck with his father's dies, which appears to have been the common practice on the accession of a new monarch.

Richard III. continued the same unvaried type and legend upon his coins, which differed from those of Edward IV. only in the name, and some few trifling distinctions.

Among the enactments of Henry VII., respecting the coinage, was one which made it treason to counterfeit the foreign coins of gold and silver, then permitted to be current in England, a crime of which many persons had been guilty, because they perceived that the forging them was neither felony nor treason. Although this monarch made no alteration in the standard of the coins, he introduced, during his reign, several variations from the usual type. He first placed upon them an arched crown, with a globe and cross on the arch. This, upon most of the coins, is only a single arch added to the old crown flure, but upon some few, there appear two lesser arches besides. In his 19th year, the type of his silver coins was totally changed. His portrait was then given on them in profile, with a crown of one arch only, a form in which it had not appeared upon the coins since the reign of King Stephen. On some of his groats and half-groats, he added to his name, either Septimus or the Roman numerals VII., a practice which had been disused ever since the reign of Henry III., on whose coins alone, of all our monarchs, from the earliest times, numerals or any other distinction of the kind had appeared. On his silver money, he is styled—HENRICUS DEI GRATIA REX ANGLIE ET FRANCIE; to which is added, upon his gold coins, DOMINVS HIBERNIE, in like manner as upon those of his predecessors.

The type of the usual gold money was continued nearly as before, but his new coin, the sovereign, bore on the obverse, the monarch seated in state, upon his throne, from whence it derived its name; and, on the reverse, a double rose, alluding to the union of the two Houses of York and Lancaster, with the royal arms in the centre. It is not known in what part of his reign these coins were first struck.

Henry VIII. stands recorded with infamy as the first of our English sovereigns, who debased the sterling fineness of the coins. In the beginning of his reign, the money resembled his father's in type, weight, alloy, and is now to be distinguished from it only by the Roman numerals VIII., being apparently struck from dies made with his punches. At an early period of his reign, private tokens were used to supply the want of silver coins. In the 39th year of his reign, he restrained the interest of money to ten per cent. and reduced the coins to the lowest degree of fineness which ever disgraced the English Mint, excepting a small quantity of silver in the 5th year of Edward VI. The gold was now brought down to twenty carats fine, and four carats alloy, and the silver to four ounces fine, and eight ounces alloy.

The gold coins of this king consisted of the double sovereign, sovereign, half-sovereign, George, noble, angel, angelet, crown, and half-crown. His style upon his English silver coins, before he assumed the title of King of Ireland, was HENRICVS VIII. DEI GRATIA, REX ANGLIE ET FRANCIE; and, on the reverse was inscribed, either the place of Mintage, or POSUI DEUM ADIUTOREM MEUM. Hereafterwards added to his title, HIBERNIE REX. The harp first appeared on the Irish money in this king's reign. The value of the sovereign was reduced to twenty shillings in the 36th year of his reign.

The universal complaints of the debased state of the coin, induced Edward VI. to adopt various measures to reform it. The current coin was reduced in value, so that a shilling circulated for nine-pence only, which created great distress among the poor people: the Irish groat passed only for two-pence. The ameliorations planned by Edward VI. he did not live to complete, but they were brought to a conclusion by Queen Elizabeth.

On his silver coins he is styled 'Edwardus VI. Dei Gratia Anglie et Francie et Hibernie Rex.' In addition to the mottos on the reverse of his father's coins will be found, 'Timor Domini Fons Vite,' and 'Inimicos ejus induam confusione.'

His gold coins bear the same style, but have, either on the obverse or reverse, 'Jesus autem transiens per medium illorum ibat,' or 'Scutum Fidei proteget eum;' or 'Per crucem tuam salva nos Christe Redemptor,' or 'Lucerna pedibus meis verbum tuum.'

Table Talk; or, Original Essays. By William Hazlitt.

(Concluded from p. 227.)

We had almost read and written ourselves into a very favourable opinion of 'Table Talk,' notwithstanding the author's contradictions respecting Cobbett's honesty and Wordsworth's genius, when we met with a passage at which we paused and stumbled, and stumbled and paused again. In an 'Essay on the Indian Jugglers,' in which various characters are discussed, from Michael Angelo and Napier of Merchiston, down to Jedediah Buxton and John Cavanagh, the celebrated five-player of St. Giles's, Mr. Hazlitt has made a singular discovery—no less than that Sir Humphry Davy is not a great man. But, as the author's opinion on greatness contains much that is true, we give him the benefit of a full quotation. He says,—

'Greatness is great power, producing great effects. It is not enough that a man has great power in himself, he must show it to all the world in a way that cannot be hid or gainsaid. He must fill up a certain idea in the public mind. I have no other notion of greatness than this two-fold definition, great results springing from great inherent energy. The great, in visible objects, has relation to that which extends over space; the great, in men alone, has to do with space and time. No man is truly great, who is great only in his life-time. The test of greatness is the page of history. Nothing can be said to be great that has a distinct limit, or that borders on something evidently greater than itself. Besides, what is short-lived and pampered into mere notoriety, is of a gross and vulgar quality in itself. A Lord Mayor is hardly a great man. A city orator or patriot of the day only shew, by reaching the height of their wishes, the distance they are at from any true ambition. Popularity is neither fame nor greatness. A King (as such) is not a great man. He has great power, but it is not his own. He merely wields the lever of the state, which a child, an idiot, or madman can do. It is the office, not the man we gaze at. Any one else in the same situation would be just as much an object of abject curiosity. We laugh at the country girl, who having seen a King, expressed her disappointment by saying, "Why, he is only a man!" Yet, knowing this, we run to see a king as if he was something more than a man. To display the greatest powers, unless they are applied to great purposes, makes nothing for the character of greatness. To throw a barley-corn through the eye of a needle, to multiply nine figures by nine in the memory, argues infinite dexterity of body and capacity of mind, but nothing comes of either. There is a surprising power at work, but the effects are not proportionate, or such as take hold of the imagination. To impress the idea of power on others, they must be made in some way to feel it. It must be communicated to their understandings in the shape of an increase of knowledge, or it must subdue and overawe them by subjecting their wills. Admiration, to be solid and lasting, must be founded on proofs from which we have no means of escaping; it is neither a slight nor a voluntary gift. A mathematician who solves a profound problem, a poet who creates an image of beauty in the mind that was not there before, imparts knowledge and power to others, in which his greatness and his fame consists, and on which it reposes. Jedediah Buxton will be forgotten; but Napier's bones will live. Lawgivers, philosophers, founders of religion, conquerors and heroes, inventors and great geniuses in arts and sciences, are great men, for they are great public benefactors, or formidable sources of mankind. Among ourselves, Shakespear, Newton, Bacon, Milton, Cromwell, were great men, for they shewed great power by acts and thoughts, which have not yet been consigned to oblivion. They must needs be men of lofty stature, whose shadows lengthen out to remote posterity. A great farce-writer may be a great man; for Moliere was but a great farce-writer. In my mind, the author of Don Quixote was a great man. So have there been many others. A great chess-player is not a great man, for he leaves the world as he found it. No act terminating in itself constitutes greatness. This will apply to all displays of power or trials of skill, which are confined to the momentary individual effort, and construct no permanent image or trophy of themselves without them. Is not an actor then a great man, because "he dies and leaves the world no copy?" I must make an exception for Mrs. Siddons, or else give up my definition of greatness for her sake. A man at the top of his profession is not, therefore, a great man. He is great in his way, but that is all, unless he shews the marks of a great moving intellect, so that we trace the master-mind, and can sympathize with the springs that urge him on. The rest is but a craft or mystery. John Hunter was a great man—that any one might see without the smallest skill in surgery. His style and manner shewed the man. He would set about cutting up the carcass of a whale with the same greatness of gusto that Michael Angelo would have hewn a block of marble. Lord Nelson was a great naval commander; but for myself, I have not much opinion of a sea-faring life. Sir Humphry Davy is a great chemist, but I am not sure that he is a great man. I am not a bit the wiser for any of his discoveries, nor I never met with any one that was. But it is in the nature of greatness to propagate an idea of itself, as wave impels wave, circle without circle.'

This is really too much. We could much more readily admit, what Mr. Hazlitt asserts, that compared with Mr. Wordsworth's lines, 'Lord Byron's stanzas are but exaggerated commonplace, and Walter Scott's poetry old wives' fables,' or that Mr. Cobbett is 'a very honest man with a total want of principle,' than that Sir Humphry Davy is not a great man. That Mr. Hazlitt is 'not a bit the wiser for any of his discoveries,' is not the fault of Sir Humphry, who, great as he is, has not discovered the art of converting base metals into gold. To enumerate the discoveries of Sir Humphry Davy, is not necessary to refute Mr. Hazlitt, —the safety-lamp alone will suffice. Bacon could say with truth, at the time when he wrote, that science could hardly boast of a single experiment which had served to increase the power, to diminish the suffering, and to augment the happiness of mankind. How different is the discovery of the safety-lamp, which is a complete protection against the fire-damp, which had created explosions of late years so frequent and so disastrous, that, in one single instance, more than a hundred persons perished at once. But the safety-lamp, the Davy, as the miners with pride and gratitude call it, makes the fire-damp itself give warning of the danger which it threatens. This formidable enemy has not only been conquered by science: it is forced to serve; it becomes a sure guide, a submissive slave. An eloquent writer, (we believe the late Professor Playfair,) speaking of the safety-lamp, says, 'this is exactly such a case as we should choose to place before Bacon, were he to visit the earth, in order to give him, in a small compass, an idea of the advancement which philosophy has made, since the time when he pointed out to her the route she ought to pursue. The great use of an immediate and constant appeal to experiment, cannot be better evinced than in this example. The result is as wonderful as it is important. An invisible and infallible barrier made effectual against a force, the most violent and irresistible in its operations, and a power that in its tremendous effects seemed to emulate the lightning and the earthquake, confined within a narrow space, and shut up in a net of the most slender texture—are facts which must excite a degree of wonder and astonishment, from which neither ignorance nor wisdom can defend the beholder. When to this we add, the beneficial consequences, and the saving of the lives of men, and consider that the effects are to remain as long as coal continues to be dug from the bowels of the earth, it may fairly be said, that there is hardly in the whole compass of art and science, a single invention of which one would rather wish to be the author. It is little that the highest praise, or even the voice of national gratitude, when most strongly expressed, can do for the happiness of one who is conscious of having done such a service to his fellow men.

We are very far from expecting to convince Mr. Hazlitt that Sir Humphrey Davy is a great man, but we wished to contrast the opinion of a real practical philosopher with his flippant assertion. Mr. Hazlitt, after attacking a variety of persons, somewhat ungratefully, we think, makes war upon the public; for, although the Quarterly Review ruined the sale of one of his works, yet the public has accorded him a due share of patronage and support:—

‘If,’ says he, ‘I had sufficient provocation to rail at the public, as Ben Jonson did at the audience in the prologues to his plays, I think I should do it in good set terms, nearly as follows. There is not a more mean, stupid, dastardly, pitiful, selfish, spiteful, envious, ungrateful animal, than the public. It is the greatest of cowards, for it is afraid of itself. From its unwieldy overgrown dimensions, it dreads the least opposition to it, and shakes like isinglass at the touch of a finger. It starts at its own shadow, like the man in the Hartz mountains, and trembles at the mention of its own name. It has a lion’s mouth, the heart of a hare, with ears erect and sleepless eyes. It stands ‘listening its fears.’ It is so in awe of its own opinion, that it never dares to form any, but catches up the first idle rumour, lest it should be behind-hand in its judgment, and echoes it till it is deafened with the sound of its own voice. The idea of what the public will think prevents the public from ever thinking at all, and acts as a spell on the exercise of private judgment, so that, in short, the public ear is at the mercy of the first impudent pretender who chooses to fill it with noisy assertions, or false surmises, or secret whispers. What is said by one is heard by all; the supposition that a thing is known to all the world, makes all the world believe it, and the hollow repetition of a vague report, drowns the “still small voice” of reason. We may believe or know that what is said is not true; but we know or fancy that others believe it—we dare not contradict, or are too indolent to dispute with them, and, therefore, give up our internal, and, as we think, our solitary conviction to a sound without substance, without proof, and often without meaning. Nay more, we may believe and know not only that a thing is false, but that others believe and know it to be so; that they are quite as much in the secret of the imposture as we are; that they see the puppets at work, the nature of the machinery, and yet if any one has the art or power to get the management of it, he shall keep possession of the public ear by virtue of a cantphrase or hack-name; and by dint of effrontery and perseverance, make all the world believe and repeat what all the world know to be false. The ear is quicker than the judgment. We know that certain things are said; by that circumstance alone, we know that they produce a certain effect on the imagination of others, and we conform to their prejudices by mechanical sympathy, and for want of sufficient spirit to differ with them. So far, then, is public opinion from resting on a broad and solid basis, as the aggregate of thought and feeling in a community, that it is slight and shallow and variable to the last degree—the bubble of the moment—so that we may safely say the public is the dupe of public opinion, not its parent. The public is pusillanimous and cowardly, because it is weak. It knows itself to be a great dunce, and that it has no opinions but upon suggestion. Yet it is unwilling to appear in leading-strings, and would have it thought that its decisions are as wise as they are weighty. It is hasty in taking up its favourites, more hasty in laying them aside, lest it should be supposed deficient in sagacity in either case. It is generally divided into two strong parties, each of which will allow neither common sense nor common honesty to the other side. It reads the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews, and believes them both—or if there is a doubt, malice turns the scale. Taylor and Hessey told me that they had sold nearly two editions of the Characters of Shakespeare’s Plays in about three months, but that after the Quarterly Review of them came out, they never sold another copy. The public, enlightened as they are, must have known the meaning of that attack, as well as those who made it. It was not ignorance, then, but cowardice that led them to give up their own opinion. A crew of mischievous critics at Edinburgh, having affixed the epithet of the Cockney School to one or two writers born in the metropolis, all the people in London became afraid of looking into their works, lest they, too, should be convicted of cockneyism. Oh, brave public!—This epithet proved too much for one of the writers in question, and stuck like a barbed arrow in his heart. Poor Keats! What was sport to the town, was death to him: young, sensitive, delicate, he was like—

“A bud bit by an envious worm,
Ere he could spread his sweet leaves to the air,
Or dedicate his beauty to the sun!”

and unable to endure the miscreant cry and idiot laugh, withdrew to sigh his last breath in foreign climes. The public is as envious and ungrateful as it is ignorant, stupid, and pigeon-livered—

“A huge-sized monster of ingratitude.”

It reads, it admires, it extols only because it is the fashion, not from any love of the subject or the man. It cries you up or runs you down out of mere caprice and levity. If you have pleased it, it is jealous of its own involuntary acknowledgment of merit, and seizes the first opportunity, the first shabby pretext, to pick a quarrel with you, and be quits once more. Every petty caviller is erected into a judge, every tale-bearer is implicitly believed. Every little low paltry creature that gaped and wondered only because others did so, is glad to find you (as he thinks) on a level with himself. An author is not then, after all, a being of another order. Public admiration is forced, and goes against the grain. Public obloquy is cordial and sincere; every individual feels his own importance in it. They give you up bound hand and foot into the power of your accusers. To attempt to defend yourself is a high crime and misdemeanour, a contempt of court, an extreme piece of impertinence. Or if you prove every charge unfounded, they never think of retracting their error, or making you amends. It would be a compromise of their dignity; they consider themselves as the party injured, and resent your innocence as an imputation on their judgment. The celebrated Bub Doddington, when out of favour at court, said, “he would not justify before his sovereign; it was for Majesty to be displeased, and for him to believe himself in the wrong!” The public are not quite so modest.—People already begin to talk of the Scotch novels as overrated. How, then, can common authors be supposed to keep their heads long above water? As a general rule, all those who live by the public starve, and are made a bye-word and a standing jest into the bargain."

We like to have Mr. Hazlitt's opinion on public men, even where we differ from him, and we therefore quote his portrait of Lord Castlereagh, without portraying ourselves for its faithfulness:—

'Lord Castlereagh is a man rather deficient than redundant in words and topics. He is not, (any more than St. Augustine was, in the opinion of La Fontaine,) so great a wit as Rabelais, nor is he so great a philosopher as Aristotle; but he has that in him which is not to be trifled with. He has a noble mask of a face, (not well filled up in the expression, which is relaxed and dormant,) with fine person and manner. On the strength of these he hazards his speeches in the House. He has also a knowledge of mankind, and of the composition of the House. He takes a thrust which he cannot parry on his shield; is "all tranquillity and smiles" under a volley of abuse; sees when to pay a compliment to a wavering antagonist; soothes the melting mood of his hearers, or gets up a speech full of indignation, and knows how to bestow his attentions on that great public body, whether he wheedles or bullies, so as to bring it to compliance. With a long reach of undefined purposes, (the result of a temper too indolent for thought, too violent for repose,) he has equal perseverance and pliancy in bringing his objects to pass. I would rather be Lord Castlereagh, as far as a sense of power is concerned, (principle is out of the question,) than such a man as Mr. Canning, who is a mere fluent sophist, and never knows the limits of discretion or the effect which will be produced by what he says, except as far as florid common-places may be depended on.'

In an 'Essay on Will-making,' we have an anecdote that is new to us, and accompanied by deductions still more novel:—

'There was a Sir Thomas Dyot in the reign of Charles II. who left the whole range of property, which forms Dyot Street, in St. Giles's, and the neighbourhood, on the sole and express condition that it should be appropriated entirely to that sort of buildings, and to the reception of that sort of population, which still keeps undisputed undivided possession of it. The name was changed the other day to George Street, as a more genteel appellation, which, I should think, is an indirect forfeiture of the estate. This Sir Thomas Dyot I should be disposed to put upon the list of old English worthies—as humane, liberal, and no flincher from what he took in his head. He was no common-place man in his line. He was the best commentator on that old-fashioned text—"The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the son of man hath not where to lay his head."

We have been much misinformed as to the population of Dyot Street, if it is such as an English worthy would wish perpetuated.—The last essay, on 'Paradox and Common Place,' appears to us both common place and paradoxical; but the two preceding ones on 'some inconsistencies in Sir Joshua Reynolds's discourses,' possess much merit. Mr. Hazlitt combats very successfully the two chief points aimed at by Sir Joshua; namely, that excellence in the Fine Arts is the result of pains and study rather than of genius, and that all beauteous, grace, and grandeur are to be found, not in actual nature, but in an idea existing in the mind. Mr. Hazlitt is a painter, we believe, and he treats the subject not only professionally, but also metaphysically.

Although we have felt it our duty to beseech on some parts of Mr. Hazlitt's work, yet we confess there is much in it that we admire. Mr. H. is a clever essayist, and there are few authors of the present day that we read with more pleasure.

SOME OBSERVATIONS ON THE

PLAGIARISMS OF LORD BYRON.

By W. B. L. Gent.

In the latter portion of my Poem, (vide Literary Chronicle, page 217,) I adverted to the frequent occurrence of interjections in Lord Byron's poems, with the pledge of a sequent notice. In order to redeem this pledge, I have gone fully into the point, conserving my memoranda as I travelled on. I began with the last new novel of 'Mistress Dolly Fogh,' written by Mrs. Ratcatcher, and followed out a regressive line till I got to Roger Bacon's Idylls (1312); I then stepped into the Latin, pursuing the path from Procopius of Cæsaria, up to the sonnets of Diogenes (Laertius), and thence to the epics of Plutarch, in all of whom I collected a sufficiency of these expletives to satisfy me (and consequently all beside) that they could not hold one grain of originality in Byron.

I now proceed to more important heads, but, as these assisting observations are merely meant to mark the many manglings of his macilent muse, I do not propose to confine myself to prescriptive detail, but rather to remark, extract, abuse, and be facetious, (a quality of which I am possessed in no mean degree), upon such occasions as it best besemeth me.

The character of his lordship's writing (under favour) and the beauty (if any there be) bear—I sigh to say it—in too many instances a strong omology to mine own, and one example will illustrate this doctrine more pointedly, perhaps, than any which for the present I can adduce, ex. gr.

His lordship, too, has been mightily beheld upon the sayings of the times, and the trite and pithy observations which are (periodically) discoverable to argue organs; and many of these disreputations have been effected in those places where men are most wont to congregate; and as it becometh not me (liberally speaking) to indulge in stultiloquence nor to advance criminatory charges without the proof, I subjoin one or two extractions (from divers), by the which the justice of my appointments may be very certainly evinced, ex. gr.

There are also some very beautiful little 'detached thoughts' of mine, which have at times appeared in a clever two-penny periodical (you may know it by its canary-coloured coverlid), from which his lordship has transcribed many sweet ideas in his Child Harold; these, however, I shall not produce, lest the world think me a vain man and an egotist; nonetheless, I regret the loss which it will sustain by what (I deem) may be considered an overstrained diffidence.

A very barefaced plagiarism is discernable in the Corsair (I quote from memory), ex. gr.

But I must now for the present take leave, in the hope, that my comparisons may be perfected in speedy time for the public eye; independently of which, I project the publication of a handsome octavo (my good friend Murray—a sweet civil gentleman, and comports withal—promieth Davison's purest pica,) wherein will appear sundry shrewd and ingenious speculations on poesy, more particularly as toucheth the above subject, and which I adventure to declare will edify and delight all nations of the earth—so sweet reader for present whiles adieu. By the bye, I had well might forgotten this pretty dissyllable.

The search for precedents cost me seven hours and thirty-five minutes, and would have occupied haply as many more, but a friend—a mutual friend, I mote have said (though his lordship once acted very scurvily in sneering at my proffered civilities, I quite accidentally assured me that the noble poet (poet!) once cast his hawk's eye upon a radiant Quaker damsel, who ultimately bade him 'farewell,' the impression of which, as it may be seen, still liveth in his lordship's memorie.

ANCIENT COIN FOUND IN SPA FIELDS.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

Sir,—Your excellent and highly interesting review of the 'Annals of Coinage,' has induced me to place in your pages, the particulars of a coin recently found among some rubbish in Spa Fields. Its size is that of our present halfcrown, but as thin as a wafer, and its quality nearly resembles gold. Each side has a circle approaching the rim, between which there are characters in old English scarcely legible. The obverse side appears to have ad a noza, &c.—the last word I think is twice or thrice, at least it seems so. A cross divides the centre,—each point of which has a fleur de lis; and in each division there are three more. On the reverse side are twelve fleurs de lis without a cross. If any of your antiquaries can oblige me with a definition of this apparently curious and ancient coin, I shall be much gratified, and I remain, I. Green. Sir, your's respectfully, P.

HOT CROSS BUNS.

THE custom of crying 'hot cross buns' in London and in many parts of England, on Good Friday, is thought to have had its origin, anterior to the solemn event of which this day is kept in commemoration. The Greeks were accustomed to present to the gods a kind of consecrated bread, purchased at the gates of the temples. One species of this bread is said to have been called by them boun, which Hesychius describes as a kind of cake with horns; and another ancient author describes its composition to have been of fine flour and honey. The prophet Jeremiah notices this kind of offering, when speaking of the Jewish women falling into idolatry in Egypt.

Formerly, a cake was in much request on this day, called water cakes, composed of water and flour only; but, to compensate for the want of flavour, the tops of the cakes were smeared with turmeric, which made them of a fine yellow colour. These have given way to the sweet cross-buns.

Although the custom of having hot cross-buns for breakfast, on Good Friday, prevails in some parts of the country, yet it is in London that it is most rigidly adhered to; and poor, indeed, must that family be, that is doomed to pass the day without the accustomed treat. The pastry-cooks never think of selling any thing else but buns on Good Friday, and from break of day until midnight, the cries of—'one a-penny bun; two a-penny bun; one a-penny, two a-penny, hot cross bun,' re-echoes through the streets of the metropolis. The grand mart, however, is at Chelsea; the Bun-House there, on Good Friday, affords quite a treat to the cocknies, and is recommended to all strangers as one of the 'sights of London.' The shop is literally besieged the whole day, and, notwithstanding the presence of a number of constables to keep order, it requires the utmost exertion to get near enough to the window to obtain a supply of the favourite cakes. These buns have afforded a competency, and even wealth to four generations of the same family; and it is singular, that their delicate flavour, lightness, and richness, have never been successfully imitated. In this house are preserved, mementos of domestic events, in the first half of the last century. The bottle conjuror is exhibited in a toy of his own age; portraits are also displayed of Duke William and other noted personages. The model of a British soldier, in the stiff costume of the same age, and some grotto works, serve to indicate the taste of a former owner, and were, perhaps, intended to rival the neighbouring exhibition at Don Saltero's.

The present proprietor of the Chelsea-Bun House relates, with exultation, that George the Second had often been a customer at the shop; and that his late majesty, when Prince George, and often during his reign, had stopped and purchased his buns. The late Queen, and all the princes and princesses have also been among his occasional customers.

The Family Trunk,

No. VI.

BY MOSES VON MCKLEWIT, GENT.

LENT DIET.

THE interest of late excited by the Catholic question, and the present season of the year, have tempted me to collect from my FAMILY TRUNK a few of the important facts and observations which my father had amassed on the subject of Lent food, which, as we all know, occupies a great share of consideration in the Catholic world. My father, as I have observed on a former occasion, had been under the painful necessity of wading through a variety of sage and learned authorities on the article of diet, in order to be the better enabled to contend against his old, and finally triumphant enemy, the gout. In the course of these, his recondite researches, the interesting and elaborate works of Drs. Hecquet and Andry, upon the subject of Lent food, published at Paris about a century before, fell in his way, and took my father's fancy so prodigiously, that he devoted a whole week to their thorough digestion, making a practical experiment of some of the tenets contained in them, by fasting almost during the whole time, until my mother, becoming naturally alarmed for the consequences of such severe lucubrations, threatened to commit the popish vogle lumes to the flames, if my father would not immediately betake himself to more solid and nutritive studies. It was during this period of self-mortification, that the learned Cadwalader Von Mucklewit had stored up in his ancient repository the valuable researches, from which I now offer to the world the following gleanings.

The first work, published on this important subject, was one by Dr. Hecquet, entitled Traité des Dispenses de Carême, in which the learned author's principal aim appears to have been to prove that a Lent diet had a natural agreement with the human constitution, and that it was the most nourishing, the most fattening, and in every respect the most wholesome that could be devised. Dr. Andry, on the other hand, holding opinions of a more worldly nature, and being moreover, perhaps, one of the flock of Epicurus, enters the lists, totis viribus, against Dr. Hecquet, and accordingly publishes two volumes, of which the titles are shortly Régime de Carême and Traité des Alimens de Carême, in which he most heretically combats the Pythagorean dogmata of his rival. To these answers of Dr. Andry his opponent enjoins in a second edition of his work 'considerably enlarged and improved.' And upon this state of the case issue is joined between the parties.

Among the many interesting points of this controversy, none seems, at the time, to have made a stronger impression upon the Parisian Scavans, who are represented to have been all alive to the subject, than the 'important question,' as it is called, 'whether the use of sea-ducks and tobacco ought to be prohibited in Lent?' and, as I doubt not, but all my readers will duly appreciate the momentous concern of this inquiry, I shall devote my present paper to a concise and impartial statement of the arguments used on each side by these learned antagonists.

Dr. Hecquet, who appears to have been a staunch Catholic, had taken the liberty of asserting, that the eating of a sea-duck, as not being bond fide a fish, according to the rash opinion of some naturalists, was inconsistent with the due observance of Lent; and, accordingly, he exhorts all good Catholics, who have a proper regard for their souls, to abstain from sea-duck, as well as all other amphibious animals, turtle included, during this holy season. And he assigns, as his reason for making this charitable exhortation, that amphibious animals abound more than all others with those volatile juices, which are totally at variance with the chaste propriety of conduct indispensable during Lent, and which even our Court of Aldermen themselves, had they lived in Popish times, would have been obliged to study, at the expense even of the same mortifying privations.

In reply to all this, Dr. Andry flatly denies that the question, as stated by his adversary, is, whether a sea-duck be fish, flesh, or fowl, but whether it sufficiently partakes of the nature of fish, to come under the denomination of Lent food; and upon this point he asserts, 'that whoever will take the trouble of analysing the blood of a sea-duck, will find it as different from that of any other duck, as a turtle's is from a calf's. And he further insists upon the propriety of eating sea-ducks during Lent, as Dr. Hecquet himself had admitted the same indulgence in favour of frogs, which, he still allowed, were no fish.

I come now to the more serious question concerning tobacco, which Dr. Hecquet discusses at some length, and comes finally to the conclusion, that the practice, whether considered as a pleasure or a nutriment, was equally destructive of that orthodox abstinence, which ought to be observed during this season. And he says, the question briefly resolves itself into this—'whether fasting be inconsistent with taking any thing that is vaporous?' And this, he adds, is undeniable for several reasons. 1. Because the Jews and Turks abstain from the use of odours on fasting days. 2. Because odours may be nourishing, as ought to be inferred from what Pliny says of some Indian nations, that live only on odours,—from what is recorded of Democritus, who lived three days by breathing only the vapour of hot loaves, and from what we read of some others, who kept themselves alive only by the smell of honey. The doctor allows, however, that when tobacco is necessary as a remedy, it may be taken on fast-days, at an appointed time, and immediately before meals.

On the other side, Dr. Andry undertakes to prove, that there is no ground whatever for his opponent's objections, which he examines with much minuteness, but, as I humbly conceive, without overturning the weighty arguments of Dr. Hecquet against the use of tobacco, whether by smoking or otherwise, in Lent; which I, therefore, hope, will be hereafter avoided by every good Catholic under whose eyes this lucubration should happen to fall.

It does not appear from any records, now extant, how this celebrated dispute terminated; but it is too probable, when we consider the frailties of our nature, that the gourmands of Paris continued to devour sea-ducks, and enjoy the fumes of tobacco, as before, without much respect to the truly pious exhortations of Dr. Hecquet, encouraged as they were, too, in their profane proceedings, by the heterodoxy of his antagonist. For, well may they have exclaimed,—

'Non nostrum tantas componere lites.'

Who shall decide when doctors disagree?

I shall conclude this short paper with an extract from Addison's Travels, which relates an anecdote, that my father had treasured with the rest of his collectanea on this subject. The place, to which it relates, is Fribourg, in Switzerland.

'At the Capucins,' says Addison, 'I saw the Escargatoire, which I took the more notice of, because I do not remember to have met with any thing of the same nature in other countries. It is a square place, boarded in, and filled with a vast quantity of large snails, that are esteemed excellent food, when they are well-dressed. The floor is strewed about half a foot deep with several plants, among which the snails nestle all the winter season. When Lent arrives, they open their magazines, and take out of them the best meagre food in the world; for there is no dish of fish, that they reckon comparable to a ragout of snails.'

ROYAL BOTANIC GARDENS, AT KEW.

Extract of a Letter dated 1st September, 1814, from Sir Joseph Banks to George Harrison, Esq., recommending the appointment of two Botanical Collectors at the Cape of Good Hope, and other distant parts abroad, for the Royal Botanic Garden, at Kew.

In obedience to the commands of Lord Liverpool, communicated to me by you, I beg leave to state to you, for his lordship's information, such remarks as occur to me on the subject of the Royal Botanic Garden, at Kew, as well as the means that appear, in my judgment, the most likely to continue to that establishment the superiority it has hitherto held over all similar institutions, in the opinion of foreigners as well as of Englishmen, and which, in fact, it still continues to hold, though somewhat impaired by the interruptions of commerce during the last war; or rather by the necessity of convey, the uncertainty and delays of which has for some years past, rendered the transport of living plants all but impossible, and induced the king to desist almost wholly from sending out collectors, as his Majesty had before been used to do.

The only Botanic Garden that has hitherto held any competition with the Royal Gardens at Kew, is that of the emperor, at the imperial palace, at Schonbrunn, near Vienna. This collection of plants was raised at an expense more suited to the pleasures of an emperor than to the sober expenditure of public money; ships were freighted for the sole purpose of bringing home living plants from both the Indies, and men of education, some of whom have since become eminent as naturalists, were sent abroad, with salaries adequate to their station in life; hot-houses and conservatories were built, on a scale in which magnificence was more consulted than economy; and yet the Royal Garden at Kew, where that well-considered economy for which our ever-revered monarch was ever so highly respected, was never for a moment forgotten, in a short time excelled those at Schonbrunn, and, at present, is considerably richer in more rare, curious, and interesting plants.

The plan of collecting, at Kew, as established by his Majesty's commands, has hitherto been, to employ those young gardeners, educated in the garden, who showed the most inclination to, and made the greatest proficiency in botanical pursuits, and were best skilled in the scientific arrangements of the plants in the garden. Among the many young men who work there in the hope of being recommended to gentlemen's families as gardeners, when they have learned the art, some were always to be found whose dispositions led them to the study of botany, and whose talents enabled them to excel in it; among these, the best were selected, and it is remarkable, that I do not recollect one instance of a man well acquainted with the plants in the garden who did not feel an ambition to be employed as a collector.

The establishment of a new collector was, forty years ago, one hundred a-year as wages, and he was allowed to draw bills for travelling expenses and board wages to the amount of two hundred more; but this he was not allowed to exceed; in fact, it was in almost all cases enough, and was never exceeded, without a satisfactory explanation being given. In no one instance, as far as I recollect, has censure been passed on any one of these collectors.

As the value of money is now so much greater both at home and in our colonies than it was forty years ago, when the establishment of a collector for Kew Gardens was first arranged, I beg leave to propose, that in case Lord Liverpool should decide upon employing such young men at present, their salaries may be fixed at 180*l*. a-year; of this they will be expected to save 150*l*. at the least, to accumulate at home, for their ultimate reward and provision on their return; the remaining 30*l*., it is presumed, will be quite sufficient to furnish them with clothes, and pocket-money enough, to render them respectable among their equals.

This plan of economy, I have no doubt, they will follow nearly, if not exactly; if they do not, their conduct abroad will be disapproved, and they will either be recalled, if it proves at all incorrect; if not, they will, on their return, have no claim on government in any shape, for they will have had the power of saving, if they continue ten years abroad, a sum quite sufficient to enable them to gain admission into the firm of some respectable nursery garden, the best possible provision a man educated as a gardener can look up to.

Some incidental expenses to government will, no doubt, be incurred, in providing for passages by sea; but these cannot be considerable, if the collectors are allowed, on all possible occasions, to be sent on board king's ships. Former collectors have, in this case, been allowed to mess with the warrant officers, whose mess extraordinaries are, of course, very moderate, and this will be the whole of the charge.

What the expense of living in and travelling over the countries to which they may be sent, I am utterly unable to calculate. That every thing is now much dearer in all our distant dependencies than it was twenty, or even ten years ago, cannot be doubted. In order, however, to reduce as much as may be the amount of these extra charges, the collectors must be directed by their instructions not to take upon themselves the character of gentlemen, but to establish themselves, in point of board and lodging, as servants ought to do; and if the governors of the places they visit are instructed to supply them with the use of slaves, bullocks, waggons, &c. from the public stores, and, above all, to grant them the use of the bullocks, &c. which the peasants of the Cape of Good Hope are obliged to provide gratis for those who travel on the account of government, neither the cost of living, nor the charge of travelling, can amount to any serious sum. The better to check all unreasonable expenditure, I am willing, if Lord Liverpool thinks it would be advantageous to the undertaking, to audit the accounts sent home by the collectors, and certify them to the treasury, when sent there for their lordships' approbation.

If by these expedients the amount of the board-wages and travelling expenses can be kept within 220*l*. a-year, as fairly may be expected, the whole of the regular annual expense of each collector, which was formerly 300*l*. a-year, will not exceed 400*l*.; which, it is hoped, will not be deemed unreasonable, as the persons employed are not allowed to have any claim upon government for their services, when they shall have been completed.

If Lord Liverpool shall honour this arrangement with his approbation, and direct it to be carried into execution, I beg leave to propose two persons, Allan Cunningham and James Bowie, who are ready to undertake the business of collectors,—indeed, anxious in the extreme to obtain the appointment; both of the men are, in Mr. Aiton's opinion, perfectly qualified to execute the business; they have both been educated at Kew, where Cunningham still continues; Bowie lives at present in a gentleman's service as gardener, but is ready to quit it at the shortest warning, should he be so fortunate as to succeed.

It is proposed, in the first instance, to send these two persons together to the Cape of Good Hope, where two people may, for one season, be advantageously employed in collecting such plants as have formerly been in the Royal Gardens, and whose names still remain in the printed catalogues, though they have died from old age before the means of increasing them could be discovered; most of these will be found near the Cape Town, and it is hoped, that in searching for them other novelties will be met with.

When this business of replacing plants that have been lost is ended, the one of the collectors may be sent to New South Wales, and the other may commence his journey to the distant parts of the Cape country, where, especially on the southern and south-eastern shores, there still remain vast tracts of unexplored country, the plants of which may be kept in this climate without the expense of hot-houses, and are, of course, more applicable to ornamental uses, and more suitable to foreign trade, than those intertropical productions whose existence depends on a strong degree of heat; these, of course, seldom flower well, and when they do cannot be placed in our rooms, if the weather is cold, without the greatest hazard of their entire destruction.

In New South Wales an infinite number of curious and beautiful plants, seen and described by Mr. Brown, naturalist in the voyage of the Investigator, are still wanting in our gardens; these also are cultivated in conservatories and green-houses, none of them requiring a stove. In the case of Van Diemen's Land, where many beautiful plants are found, we have every reason to hope that most of them will bear the cold of our winters, and become the ornaments of our open gardens.

Although it is but a few months since our friendly relations with the continent have been resumed, the following applications for plants from the Royal Gardens have already been made.

To his Royal Highness the Prince Regent:

From the King of Bavaria.
From the Duke of Saxa Weimar.

To the Queen:

From the Dowager Empress of Russia.
From the Queen of Württemberg.

To his Majesty's Ministers:
From the University of Leyden.

To the Superintendent of the Gardens:
From the Imperial Gardens at Schonbrun.
From the Teylerian Society at Leyden.

From the University of Erfurt.
On this latter head I shall consider it as my duty to regulate the correspondence between the superintendent of his Majesty's and those of foreign gardens, in such manner as to prevent the direct intercourse between the superintendent of Kew Garden, and the persons who correspond with him, from being so advantageous to the gardens where plants are received, as those to which collections are sent by command of the Queen, or the Prince Regent, or under the orders of his Majesty's ministers.

The commerce of living plants is at present of some importance, and promises in time to improve; the orders already received from the continent are not inconsiderable, and but for the extreme poverty of the whole of Europe, would, before this time, have become an object worthy consideration. This commerce must continue to improve, if new plants that are beautiful and interesting continue to be introduced into England; when sovereigns have obtained such plants from the Royal Gardens, their subjects will seek to procure them from our nurseries.

The domestic trade of plants, supported far above its natural level by the use of growing plants in all expensive entertainments, so much patronized by the regent, maintains a race of sober, healthy, and industrious population, daily on the increase. This also will be maintained and increased by the introduction of beautiful novelties. These considerations, it is hoped, will induce his Majesty's ministers, to foster an establishment, Kew Gardens, I mean, which does honour to the science of the country, promotes, in some degree, its commerce, aids its population, and enables the sovereign and his ministers to make acceptable presents to crowned heads, without incurring any expense in providing them.

THE FUNUS PASSERIS OF CATULLUS. (TRANSLATION.)

Weep soft joys and gentle loves,
And whose'er with beauty moves;
The sparrow of my girl is dead,
The sparrow of my darling maid—
Which more than e'en herself she lov'd,
For honey sweet to her it prov'd;
And well her beauteous form could trace,
As the young girl her mother's face—
Nor from her bosom would it stir,
But hopping round—now here, now there,

To charm her, bade its little throat,
For her alone, pour forth each note.
Gone, now, to Pluto's drear domain,
Whence nouse e'er return again.
Sud-bede, dark shades, thine every hour,
Who thus whate'er is fair devour!
Who bade to hell my sparrow speed—
Poor sparrow! oh, accursed deed!
For loss of thee, ah! see how red
The eyelids of my weeping maid.

HOPE.

THERE is a star that oft will dart a ray
Thro' the soul's darkness, and its portals ope;
To meet the cheering beams of mental day—
It is the heavenly morning star of Hope.
Sad is the heart that never felt its beams,
Its waking reveries and sleeping dreams;
No morning rises clad in rich delight,
For it no season wears ecstatic bloom,
Within, without, around is cheerless night,
Which shews no comfort e'en beyond the tomb;
But resting all its tide of sorrow there,
Drinks at the fount of woe the currents of despair.

THE PAST.

'Let us not rashly quit our hold upon the past,
When, perhaps, there is little else left to bind us to existence. Is it nothing to have being and to have been happy or miserable? or is it a matter of no moment to think whether I have been one or the other? Do I delude myself, do I build up a shadow or a dream, do I dress up in the gaudy garb of idleness or folly, a pure fiction, with nothing answering to it in the universe of things, or the records of truth, when I look back with fond delight, or with tender regret to that which was at one time to me MY ALL, when I receive the glowing image of some bright reality.

The thoughts of which will never from my heart!

HAZLITT'S Table Talk.

What cannot fortune grieve away
Or into darkness cast?
What sheds on life a cheering ray?
The memory of the past.

What will remain to cheer us still
When joys are fleeting fast?
What blunts the sting of present ill?
The pleasures of the past.

What makes us aye with fondness dwell
On dreams which would not last?
It is the witchery and spell
Which hallows all the past.

What makes us cheerful and content
While treading life's dull waste?
Dear thoughts that, with our sorrows blend,
Tell of bright moments past.

What doubles all the bliss of love,
Making it boundless, vast?
Memory of pangs all pangs above:
Fears, doubts, that now are past.

If aught can make fair friendship's stream
Of heav'n more deeply taste,
It is that soft and soothing beam—
The sunshine of the past.

And how could being's cold cares be Reluctantly embraced,
Did they not form eventually
The treasures of the past?

Who would this little hour outlive
That flies with so much haste,
Could he not all its value give
To valued moments past?
O, life would be a desert drear
Were all we've known effaced—
Could we not still, in fancy, hear
The loved voice of the past!
I'd rather shun in the cold grave
Misfortune's biting blast—
Than live, and living, cease to have
The memory of the past?

REVELLI'S PICTURE OF THE QUEEN'S TRIAL.

DISMISSING from our minds every political consideration respecting the Queen's trial, and avoiding every remark as to the similarity of subjects chosen by Mr. Revelli, who lately exhibited a picture of the Inquisition, we shall notice his present painting merely as a work of art. Having been in the House of Lords more than once during the important investigation, and being acquainted with the persons, at least, of most of the noblemen and other personages who had a prominent share in this memorable trial, we visited Mr. Revelli's picture with the hope of recognizing many old friends. By the help of the exhibitor and the description together, we did find them, indeed; but they were old friends with new faces, and out of the two hundred portraits which the picture is said to contain, we were not able to identify more than a dozen, and very few, even of this limited number, were good likenesses.

If the artist had not assured us that the picture was 'an accurate representation of the interior of the House of Lords, as it appeared on that memorable occasion,' and introduced himself very prominently in the act of taking sketches, we should have suspected that the picture had been painted without ocular inspection of the scene. The grand outline is by no means a faithful representation of the house, and neither the positions of the peers, nor their dresses have been attended to. The Dukes of York and Gloucester are represented as dressed in military costume, although it is notorious that they wore plain clothes on the occasion. Of the counsel on both sides, whose persons and portraits are very familiar to the public, it would be very difficult to identify more than three, and these only with a good stretch of imagination. The best likenesses in the whole picture are the portraits of Lord Holland, Sir Robert Dallas, the Duke of Wellington, Lady Anne Hamilton, and the Marquis of Lansdowne. The coup d'œil of the picture is rather pleasing, notwithstanding the harshness of the colouring, which is often very injudicious.

WIVELL'S PORTRAITS.

As forming a striking contrast to M. Revelli's picture, we must notice a series of portraits of the counsel employed on both sides in the Queen's trial, sketched in the House of Lords, by an artist of the name of Wivell, whose name was heretofore unknown to us, but who cannot long remain in obscurity. The engravings are plain and cheap; but some of them are the best likenesses we ever saw. Every passion and feeling of which Sir Robert Giffard is capable—his whole mind and character seem embodied in Mr. Wivell's sketch of him. It is a portrait from which Lavater would have found no difficulty in describing the man. The portrait of Sir John Copley is scarcely less happy; and Mr. Bronghiu, who is represented as giving vent to one of his strong exclamations, is drawn to the life. The portraits of Dr. Lushington, Messrs. Denman, Williams, and Parke, are also very good. We feel happy in bearing testimony to the merits of a young artist, whose talents give him so strong and so legitimate a claim on the liberal and extensive patronage of the public. To the engraver, Mr. Wright, who has done the sketches of Mr. Wivell so much justice, no ordinary praise is due, and we congratulate him on his fidelity of execution.

Extraordinary Atmospheric Phenomenon at Montreal.—The following account of the singular, we might almost say terrific darkness which overspread the town of Montreal in the early part of November, 1819, contains many interesting particulars of this remarkable phenomenon not generally known. We extract it from the Canadian Courant of November 10, 1819:—

'Remarkable Obscurity.'—To those, who are in the habit of anticipating a dreadful catastrophe from singular appearances, yesterday must have been an awful day. Even those blunt minds, the excursions of which seldom deviate from the routine of usual occupation, seemed for once to be withdrawn from the beaten path, and to contemplate with a mixture of astonishment and terror an appearance for which no one could account, and which it was therefore impossible to pronounce to be either the precursor or follower of preternatural disaster.

"On Saturday last the weather was bright and unclouded, but at eight o'clock in the evening the sky became surcharged with heavy black clouds from the N. W. and snow fell in large flakes. The next morning these clouds were diffused over the sky, and there descended a heavy shower of blackish rain, which, upon examination, was found to contain a substance resembling to the eye, the taste, and the smell of soot. Towards evening, however, the weather cleared, and yesterday morning was ushered in by a large frost.—This gradually relaxed, until the influence of a weighty damp vapour, which descended from a thick stratum of clouds that seemed progressively to deepen in colour and density, and at noon the darkness was so great, that candles were burning in the Court-house, the banks, and in most of the offices in this city. The gloom alternately increased or diminished, according to the ascendancy of the wind, which during the day was fitful and changeable, till three o'clock, when a formidable body of clouds from the N. E. hurried over the town, and brought the obscurity to its climax. At this moment there certainly reigned a very general awe. Nature had, from the morning, seemed sullen and dejected, as if aware of impending calamity, and the crisis appeared to have arrived. While the inhabitants were expressing to each other their surprise, and exchanging opinions on the probable cause of an appearance so unusual, they were almost electrified by a brilliant flash of lightning, succeeded by a clap of thunder that was echoed and reverberated for many seconds after its causes had past.

"This was followed by some others, rain again fell, and there seemed a good prospect of fair weather; but it was of short duration, for the clouds again accumulated from the N. E. and at four o'clock it was nearly as dark as before.—Those who had felt alarm, now became, by the continued contemplation of the subject of terror, tranquil, and were reposing after their recent inquietude, when, suddenly, the tocsin was tolled by every bell in the city, and the streets resounded with the cries of fire!! Montreal, certainly, at this moment, exhibited a scene which it has, we believe, never before presented, and which had a most appalling and wild effect. The sky was veiled in gloom—the place d'armes was crowded, was continually swelling by the floods of people who poured in from all the adjacent streets; and, towering over the heads of the throng, was to be seen the steeple of the French parish church, with its ball, blazing like a meteor, and throwing out, from the foot of the cross, with which it was surmounted, radiations of sparks, rendered lurid by the incumbent and surrounding haze. Never was there shewn a greater zeal than was exhibited on this occasion. The different engines were in a moment on the spot; lines were formed almost involuntarily; and every one seemed to think alone on the means of preserving the holy edifice. The ball continued to burn for a long time, being inaccessible to water; the tin, however, with which the steeple was covered, retarded its progress, and the wind was fortunately very gentle.

"By the activity of the people an engine was raised to the belfry, from which water was conveyed, through a trap-door, into the interior of the steeple, to prevent the extension of the flames. The fire was happily extinct by half-past eight in the evening. It had, however, a quarter of an hour before, consumed the timber in which the cross was inserted, so that it fell on that part of the wall above the principal entrance, and broke into many pieces, the largest of which descended on the pavement of the corner of the house of Mr. Bernard, the milliner. Thus terminated the events of this day, which will long be remembered by the inhabitants of Montreal, and be classed with the dark Sunday of 1785. We have omitted to state that the rain which descended yesterday was similar to that of last Sunday; but contained more of the sooty ingredient, and carried on its surface, as it flowed through the streets, a dense foam resembling soap-suds.

"We have been informed that many persons crossed to the other side of the river, expecting the accomplishment of a traditional prediction, that the island of Montreal is to be swallowed up by an earthquake. For the truth of this information, however, we will not vouch.

"At this moment (Wednesday morning, seven o'clock,) the sky is almost as clear, and day-light as strong, as is usual at this hour of the day, at this season of the year."

PERRY'S SYSTEM OF EDUCATION.

—A DISCOVERY, important to all employed in the Education of Youth, has been made by Mr. PERRY, of Manchester. It is a System of Education for Academies, Ladies' Seminaries, and Schools in general, in which the Classics, Mathematics, and Commercial Branches are taught, which possesses striking peculiar and remarkable advantages. It teaches every Pupil of a Seminary, consisting of indefinite numbers, individually, without Assistants or Monitors, and with disproportionately greater success than on the prevailing Systems; the trouble and fatigue to the Teacher are also less in the same ratio. Concerning the other numerous and singular advantages of this altogether unique System, differing essentially from Dr. Bell's, Mr. Lancaster's, M. Pestalozzi's, M. Duffell's, or any other whatever, and which is easily and quickly learned, the interested reader is referred to the Prospectus of the System, which may be had on application (post paid) to Mr. Perry, Academy, Manchester; or, as Mr. P. courts inquiry, an interview may be had with him for a few days; and also Prospectuses, at No. 3, Adam Street, Adelphi, London, from Eleven o'clock till Seven.

In this Work the Author has pointed out much false doctrine, and many erroneous principles in the popular Grammar of Mr. Cobbett. This Grammar, like Mr. Cobbett's, is intended for the use of the Working Classes of Society. The Author has, however, refrained from introducing Political Remarks, on the supposition that such remarks would be calculated to divert the attention of the learners from the subject more immediately under their consideration.

No. 3 will be published on Saturday, April 28; and a Number on each succeeding Saturday, till completed. The whole will be comprised in six Numbers. Being closely printed, and in small type, this Work will contain more than is usually to be found in volumes of three times its size. In the Sixth and last number, the Title, Table of Contents, Preface, List of Errata, &c. will be included.

LORD BYRON'S TRAGEDY.

Marino Faliero, Doge of Venice: an Historical Tragedy, in Five Acts, with Notes. The Prophecy of Dante, a Poem. By Lord Byron. 8vo. pp. 261. London, 1821.

Is the production of a new tragedy was in former times an occurrence that was so eagerly looked for, and so fully chronicled, it will readily be conceived that a tragedy from the distinguished pen of Lord Byron, must, even in these days, excite no common interest. Indeed, of all the productions of his lordship's pen, we know not one, the publication of which was watched with so much anxiety, or which, now that it has appeared, is read with so much avidity. The well known talents of his lordship and the present state of the stage united to create a powerful interest, and to raise a hope that we should now have a play, worthy of the brightest period in the annals of the drama.

In the preface to the tragedy, his lordship has some severe reflections on the taste of the public, which he unjustly censures. Speaking of his motives for writing the tragedy, he says—

"I have had no view to the stage: in its present state it is, perhaps, not a very exalted object of ambition; besides I have been too much behind the scenes, to have thought it so at any time. And I cannot conceive any man of irritable feeling putting himself at the mercies of an audience:—the sneering reader, and the loud critic, and the tart review, are scattered and distant calamities; but the trampling of an intelligent or of an ignorant audience on a production which, be it good or bad, has been a mental labour to the writer, is a palpable and immediate grievance, heightened by a man's doubt of their competency to judge, and his certainty of his own imprudence in electing them his judges. Were I capable of writing a play which could be deemed stage-worthy, success would give me no pleasure, and failure great pain. It is for this reason that, even during the time of being one of the committee of one of the theatres, I never made the attempt, and never will. But surely there is dramatic power somewhere, while Joanna Baillie, and Milman, and John Wilson exist. The 'City of the Plague,' and the 'Fall of Jerusalem,' are full of the best material for tragedy that has been since Horace Walpole, except passages of Elfwald and De Montfort."

Now with all due deference to his lordship, we not only think to be the author of a good tragedy a very exalted object of ambition, but have also a very different opinion as to the public, whose decisions in the theatre have afterwards invariably been confirmed out of doors.

The conspiracy of the Doge Marino Faliero, on which this tragedy is founded, is, as his lordship well observes, 'one of the most remarkable events in the annals of the most singular government, city, and people of modern history.' The story, as particularly detailed in the 'Lives of the Doges,' by Mariu Sanuto, is given by his lordship in the appendix; and, as it will make the reader fully acquainted with the subject of the tragedy; we shall give a sketch of it.

Mariuo Faliero, a man of talents and courage, and who had distinguished himself both as a warrior and a statesman, was chosen Doge of Venice, on the 11th of September, 1354. After he had held the office six months, he gave a feast where a circumstance occurred which laid the foundation of his fatal project; we give it in the words of the chronicler:—

"Now to this feast there came a certain Ser Michele Steno, a gentleman of poor estate and very young, but crafty and daring, and who loved one of the damshels of the Duchess. Ser Michele stood amongst the women upon the solajo; and he behaved indiscreetly, so that my Lord the Duke ordered that he should be kicked off the solajo; and the esquires of the Duke flung him down from the solajo accordingly. Ser Michele thought that such an affront was beyond all bearing; and when the feast was over, and all other persons had left the palace, he, continuing heated with anger, went to the hall of audience, and wrote certain unseemly words relating to the Duke and the Duchess, upon the chair in which the Duke was used to sit; for in those days the Duke did not cover his chair with cloth of sendal, but he sat in a chair of wood. Ser Michele wrote thereon:—"Marin Falier, the husband of the fair wife; others kiss her, but he keeps her." In the morning the words were seen, and the matter was considered very scandalous; and the Senate commanded the Avogadori of the Commonwealth to proceed therein with the greatest diligence. A largesse of great amount was immediately proffered by the Avogadori, in order to discover who had written these words. And at length it was known that Michele Steno had written them. It was resolved in the Council of Forty that he should be arrested; and he then confessed, that in the fit of vexation and spite, occasioned by his being thrust off the solajo in the presence of his mistress, he had written the words. Therefore the Council debated thereon. And the Council took his youth into consideration, and that he was a lover, and therefore they adjudged that he should be kept in close confinement during two months, and that afterwards he should be banished from Venice and the state during one year. In consequence of this merciful sentence the Duke became exceedingly wroth, it appearing to him that the Council had not acted in such a manner as was required by the respect due to his dual dignity; and he said that they ought to have condemned Ser Michele to be hanged by the neck, or at least to be banished for life."

The day after this sentence had been pronounced on Steno, the admiral of the arsenal went to the Doge to complain that a gentleman had struck him, and prayed for heavy punishment on him:—

"What wouldst thou have me to do for thee?" answered the Duke:—"think upon the shameful gibe which hath been written concerning me: and think on the manner in which they have punished that rascal Michele Steno, who wrote it; and see how the Council of Forty respect our person."—Upon this the admiral answered:—"My Lord Duke, if you would wish to make yourself a Prince, and to cut all those cuckold gentlemen in pieces, I have the heart, if you do but help me, to make you Prince of all this state; and then you may punish them all."—Hearing this, the Duke said:—"How can such a matter be brought about?"—and so they discoursed thereon.

The Duke called for his nephew Ser

Bertuccio Faliero, who lived with him in the palace, and they communed about this plot. And without leaving the place, they sent for Philip Calendaro, a seaman of great repute, and for Bertuccio Israello, who was exceedingly wily and cunning. Then taking counsel amongst themselves, they agreed to call in some others; and so, for several nights successively, they met with the Duke at home in his palace.

It was concerted that sixteen or seventeen leaders should be stationed in various parts of the City, each being at the head of forty men, armed and prepared; but the followers were not to know their destination. On the appointed day they were to make affrays amongst themselves here and there, in order that the Duke might have a pretence for tolling the bells of San Marco; these bells are never rung but by the order of the Duke. And at the sound of the bells, these sixteen or seventeen, with their followers, were to come to San Marco, through the streets which open upon the Piazza. And when the noble and leading citizens should come into the Piazza, to know the cause of the riot, then the conspirators were to cut them in pieces; and this work being finished, My Lord Marino Faliero the Duke was to be proclaimed the Lord of Venice. Things having been thus settled, they agreed to fulfil their intent on Wednesday, the fifteenth day of April, in the year 1355. So covertly did they plot, that no one ever dreamt of their machinations.

The plot was, however, discovered by one Beltramo Bergamasco, who mentioned it to Sir Niccolò Lioni, one of the senators, whose life he wished to preserve. The Council of Ten, and the Great Council were assembled, Beltramo was brought before them, and, ascertaining the truth of his statement, measures were taken to counteract the conspiracy. The tolling of the bells was prevented, and the principal conspirators all seized, most of whom were condemned to death by the Council of Ten, and afterwards executed:—

On Friday, the sixteenth day of April, judgment was also given, in the Council of Ten, that My Lord Marino Faliero, the Duke, should have his head cut off, and that the execution should be done on the landing place of the stone staircase, where the Dukes take their oath when they first enter the palace. On the following day, the seventeenth day of April, the doors of the palace being shut, the Duke had his head cut off, about the hour of noon. And the cap of estate was taken from the Duke's head before he came down stairs. When the execution was over, it is said, that one of the Council of Ten went to the columns of the palace over against the place of St. Mark, and that he showed the bloody sword unto the people, crying out with a loud voice:—"The terrible doom hath fallen upon the traitor!"—and the doors were opened, and the people all rushed in, to see the corpse of the Duke, who had been beheaded.

Such are the materials on which Lord Byron has founded his tragedy, and in no material point has he deviated from historical correctness. In his preface he states that he had once thought of making jealousy the motive which stimulated the Doge to engage in the conspiracy, but that the advice of Sir William Drummond and the late Monk Lewis dissuaded him from it. In speaking of this last production of his lordship's brilliant and prolific muse, we must not forget that it was not written for the stage, and therefore judge of it rather as a tragic poem than an acting tragedy, for which it is too long by at least one-half. Having detailed the story so amply, it will now be unnecessary to go through it in the tragedy, and we shall therefore notice some of the scenes as appear to us most worthy of attention; and to which it will be seen his lordship has often given the most powerful interest and effect. We ought to premise that, in order to preserve a near approach to the unity of the play, his lordship has represented the conspiracy as already formed, and the Doge acceding to it; whereas, in fact, it was of his own preparation, and that of Israel Bertuccio. The tragedy commences just before sentence has been passed on Steno, and the Doge is anxiously waiting the result. When it is made known to him that he has only been sentenced to a month's imprisonment, he breaks out into a violent rage, throws down the ducal bonnet, and wishes the enemies of Venice at the gates that he might do them homage. The whole of this scene between the Doge and his nephew is admirable; we quote a few passages:—

'Doge. Venice! Duke!
Who now is Duke in Venice? let me see him,
That he may do me right.

Bertuccio Faliero. If you forget
Your office, and its dignity and duty,
Remember that of man, and curb this passion.
The Duke of Venice—

Doge (interrupting him.)

There is no such thing—
It is a word—nay, worse—a worthless by-word:
The most despised, wrong'd, outraged, helpless
wretch,

Who begs his bread, if 'tis refused by one,

May win it from another kinder heart;

But he, who is denied his right by those Whose place it is to do no wrong, is poorer

Than the rejected beggar—he's a slave—

And that am I, and thou, and all our house,

Even from this hour; the meanest artisan
Will point the finger, and the haughty noble
May spit upon us: where is our redress!

Ber. Fal. The law, my prince—

Doge (interrupting him.)

You see what it has done—

I ask'd no remedy but from the law—
I sought no vengeance but redress by law—
I could do no judges but those named by law—
As sovereign, I appeal'd unto my subjects,
The very subjects who had made me sovereign,
And gave me thus a double right to be so.
The rights of place and choice, of birth and service,

Honours and years, these scars, these hoary hairs,
The travel, toil, the pains, the fatigues,
The blood and sweat of almost eighty years,
Were weigh'd 'gainst the balance, 'gainst the foolish scales,

The grossest insult, most contemptuous crime
Of a rank rash politician—and found wanting!
And this is to be home!

The deep sense of the wrong that had been done him by the imputation on his wife, never leaves the Doge;
speaking of Steno, he says—

'Doge. You know the full offence of this born villain,

This creeping, coward, rascal, acquitted felon,
Who threw his sting into a poisonous life,
And on the honour of—Oh God!—my wife,
The nearest dearest part of all men's honour,
Left a base slur to pass from mouth to mouth
Of loose mechanics, with all coarse foul comments,

And villainous jests, and blasphemies obscene;
While anering nobles, in more polish'd guise,
Whisper'd the tale, and smiled upon the lie.
Which made me look like them—a courteous
witto,

Patience—ay, proud, it may be, of dishonour.'

And in an interview afterwards with Israel Bertuccio, the chief of the assassins, alluding to the words—

'foul words,
That have cried shame to every ear in Venice,'
He says:—

'Ay, doubtless they have echo'd o'er the as-sena,

Keeping due time with every hammer's clink
As a good jest to jolly artisans;
Or making chorus to the creaking oar,
In the vile tune of every galleys' slave,
Who, as he sung the merry song, exalted
He was not a shamed dolt like a Doge.'

The second act is very heavy, particularly the scene between the Doge and Angelina his wife, and it appears to us highly improbable. That an old man should marry a young and beautiful wife, is, if not very natural, at least very common, but that he should marry her from such motives as his lordship assigns him, is extremely improbable. The Doge addressing his wife is made to say—

'I knew my heart would never treat you harshly.'

I knew my days could not disturb you long;
And then the daughter of my earliest friend,
His worthy daughter, fere to choose again,
Wealthier and wiser, in the ripest bloom

Of womanhood, more skilful to select
By passing these probationary years;
Inheriting a Prince's name and riches,
Secured, by the short penance of enduring
An old man for some summers, against all
That law's chicanery or envious kinsmen might Have urged against her right; my best friend's child

Would choose more fitly in respect of years,
And not less truly in a faithful heart."

The following passage is very spirited. Angiolina, in allusion to Steno, says,—

"Angi. Oh! had this false and flippant libeller

Sped his young blood for his absurd lampoon, Ne'er from that moment could this breast have known

A joyous hour, or dreamless slumber more.

Doge. Does not the law of Heaven say blood for blood?

And he who taints kills more than he who sheds it.

Is it the pain of blows, or shame of blows,
That make such deadly to the sense of man?
Do not the laws of man say blood for honour?
And less than honour for a little gold?

Say not the laws of nations blood for treason?
Is it nothing to have fill'd these veins with poison

For their once healthful current? Is it nothing
To have stain'd your name and mine—the noblest names?

Is it nothing to have brought into contempt
A prince before his people? to have fail'd
In the respect accorded by mankind

To youth in woman, and old age in man?
To virtue in your sex, and dignity

In ours?

Bertram, one of the conspirators, not having completed the number of men that he was to bring, is suspected by Calendario, who intimates his fears of him to Israel Bertuccio, but says, he has no ties of kindred to make him fear. Bertuccio replies,—

Is Ber. Such ties are not
For those who are call'd to the high destinies
Which purify corrupted commonwealths;
We must forget all feelings save our purpose—
We must reign all passions save our purpose—
And only look on death as beautiful,
So that the sacrifice ascend to heaven,
And draw down freedom on her evermore.

Calen. But if we fail—

Is Ber. They never fail who die
In a great cause: the blood may soak their gore;

Their heads may sadden in the sun; their limbs

Be strung to city gates and castle walls—
But still their spirit walks abroad. Though years

Eclipse, and others share as dark a doom,
They but augment the deep and sweeping thoughts

Which o'power all others, and conduct
The world at last to freedom: What were we,
If Brutus had not lived? He died in giving Rome liberty, but left a deathless lesson—
A name which is a virtue, and a soul

Which multiplies itself throughout all time,
When wicked men wax mighty, and a state Turns servile: he and his high friend were styled

"The hat of Romans!" Let us be the first Of true Vesuvians, sprung from Roman sires."

There is a fearful grandeur in the following soliloquy of the Doge, when on his way to meet the conspirators:—

"I am before the hour, the hour whose voice,
Pealing into the arch of night, might strike
These palaces with ominous tottering,
And rock their marbles to the corner-stone,
Waking the sleepers from some hideous dream
Of indistinct but awful augury
Of that which will befall them. Yes, proud city!

Thou must be cleansed of the black blood which makes thee

A last-house of tyranny: the task
Is forced upon me, I have sought it not;
And therefore was I punish'd, seeing this Patrician pestilence spread on and on,
Until at length it smote me in my slumbers,
And I am tainted, and must wash away
The plague-spots in the healing wave. Tall fame!

Where sleep my fathers, whose dim statues shadow

The floor which doth divide us from the dead,
Where all the pregnant hearts of our bold blood
Moulder'd into a mite of ashes, hold In one shrunk heap what once made many heroes,

When what is now a handful shook the earth—
Fame of the tutelary saints who guard our house!
Vault where two Doges rest—my sire! who died

The one of toil, the other in the field,
With a long race of other lineal chiefs
And sages, whose great labours, wounds, and state

I have inherited,—let the graves gape,
Till all time aises be peopled with the dead,
And pour them from thy portals to gaze on me!
I call them up, and them and thee to witness
What it hath been which put me to this task—
Their pure high blood, their blazon-roll of giories,

Their mighty name dishonour'd all is me,
Not by me, but by the ungrateful nobles
We fought to make our equals, not our lords—
And chiefly thou, Ordelfo the brave,
Who perish'd in the field, where I since con-quer'd,

Battling at Zara, did the Hecatombs
Of time and Venice's foes, there offer'd up
By thy descendant, merit such acquaintance?
Spirits! smile down upon me; for my cause
Is your's, in all life now can be of your's—
Your fame, your name, all mingled up in mine,
And in the future fortunes of our race!

Let me but prosper, and I make this city
Free and immortal, and our house's name
Worthier of what you were, now and hereafter!"

Bertram, in an interview with Calendario, inquires if there are not some among the senators whose age and qualities might mark them out for pity.

Calendario replies in the following passage, which is bold, and the idea we consider original:—

"Yes, such pity
As when the viper hath been cut to pieces,
The separate fragments quivering in the sun
In the last agony of venomous life, Deserve and have. Why, I should think us scorn

Of pitying some particular frog which made
One in the jaw of the swollen serpent, as

Of saving one of these: they form but links
Of one long chain; one mass, one breath, one body;

They eat, and drink, and live, and breed together.

Revel, and lie, oppress, and kill in concert,—
So let him die as one!"

The scene in the third act, in which the Doge is introduced to the senate, is highly dramatic, and we quote the principal passages:—

"Conspirators. Most welcome.—Brave Bertuccio, thou art late—
Who is this stranger?"

Calendario. It is time to name him.
Our comrades are even now prepared to greet him.

In brotherhood, as I have made it known
That thou wouldst add a brother to our cause,
Approved by thee, and thus approved by all,
Such is our trust in all thine actions. Now
Let him unfold himself.

Is Ber. Stranger, step forth!
(The Doge discovers himself.)

Cons. To arms!—we are betrayed—it is the Doge!

Down with them both! our traitorous captain,
and

The tyrant he hath sold us to!

Calen. (drawing his sword.) Hold! Hold!
Who moves a step against them dies. Hold!
hear,

Bertuccio—What! are you appall'd to see
A lone, unguarded, weaponless old man
Amongst you?—Israel, speak! what means this mystery?

Is Ber. Let them advance and strike at their own bosoms,
Ungrateful suicides: for on our lives Depend their own, their fortunes, and their hopes.

Doge. Strike!—If I dreaded death, a death more fearful

Than any your rash weapons can inflict,
I should not now be here!—Oh, noble courage!
The eldest born of fear, which makes you brave
Against this solitary hoary head!

See the bold chiefs, who would reform a state
And shake down senates, mad with wrath and dread

At sight of one patrician—Butcher me,
You can; I care not—Israel, are these men
The mighty hearts you spoke of? look upon them!

Calen. Faith! he hath shamed us, and deservedly.

Was this your trust in your true Chief Bertuccio,

To turn your swords against him and his guest?
Smother them, and bear him!

Is Ber. I disdain to speak.

They might and must have known a heart like mine

Incapable of treachery; and the power
They gave me to adopt all fitting means
To further their designs, was never abused.

They might be certain that whoever was brought
By me into this council, had been led
To take his choice—as brother, or as victim.

Doge. And which am I to be? your actions leave

Some cause to doubt the freedom of the choice.

Is Ber. My lord, we would have perished
here together,

Had these men now proceeded; but, behold,
They are ashamed of that mad moment's impulse,

And drop their heads; believe me, they are such

As I described them—Speak to them.

Calan Ay, speak;

We are all listening in wonder.

To Ber. (addressing the conspirators.)

You are safe,

Nay, more, almost triumphant—listen, then, And know my words for truth.

Doge. You see me here,

As one of you hath said, an old, unarmed, Defenceless man; and yesterday you saw me Presiding in the hall of ducal state, Apparent sovereign of our hundred isles, Robed in official purple, dealing out

The edicts of a power which is not mine, Nor yours, but of our masters—the patricians.

Why I was there you know, or think you know; Why I am here, who hath been most wrong'd, He, who among you, hath been most insulted,

Outraged and suddenly on, until he doubt If he be worm or no, may answer for me,

Asking of his own heart what brought him here? You judge my recent story, all men know it,

And judge of it far differently from those Who sate in judgment to heap scorn on scorn

But spare me the recital—it is here, Here at my heart the outrage—but my words,

Already spent in unavailing plaints, Would only shew my feebleness the more,

And I come here to strengthen even the strong, And urge them on to deeds, and not to war

With woman's weapons; but I need not urge you.

Our private wrongs have sprung from public vices

In this—I cannot call it commonwealth, Nor kingdom, which hath neither prince nor people,

But all the sins of the old Spartan state, Without its virtues, temperance, and valour.

The lords of Lacedæmon were true soldiers, But ours are Sybarites, while we are Helots,

Of whom I am the lowest, most enslaved, Although drest out to head a people, as

The Greeks of yore made drunk their slaves to form

A posture for their children. You are met To overthrow this monster of a state,

This mockery of a government, this spectacle, Which must be excoriated with blood, and then

We will renew the times of truth and justice, Condemning in a fair free commonwealth,

Not rash equality, but equal rights, Proportion'd like the columns to the temple,

Giving and taking strength reciprocal, And making firm the whole with grace and beauty.

So that no part could be removed without Infringement of the general symmetry.

In operating this great change, I claim To be one of you—if you trust in me;

If not, strike home, my life is compromised, And I would rather fall by freemen's hands,

Than live another day to act the tyrant As delegate of tyrants; such I am not,

And never have been—read it in our annals; I can appeal to my past government

By many lands and cities; they can tell you If I were an oppressor, or a man

Feeling and thinking for my fellow men. Happy had I been what the senate sought,

A thing of robes and trinkets, disend'd out To sit in state as for a sovereign's picture;

A popular scourge, a rarely sentence signer, A stickler for the senate and "the Forty,"

A sceptic of all measures which had not The sanction of "the Ten," a council-swearer,

A tool, a fool, a puppet,—they had me.

Foster'd the wretch who stung me. What I suffer Has reach'd me through my pity for the people;

That many know, and they who know not yet Will one day learn less: meantime, I do devote,

Whate'er the issue, my last days of life—My present power, such as it is, not that

Of Doge, but of a man who has been great Before he was degraded to a Doge,

And still has individual means and mind; I stake my fame (and I had fame)—my breath— (The least of all, for its last hours are nigh)

My heart—my hope—my soul—upon this cause! Such as I am, I offer me to you

And to your chiefs, accept me or reject me, A prince who fain would be a citizen

Or nothing, and who has left his throne to be so.

Although the Doge goes fully into the conspiracy, yet he is not altogether free from compunction:—

Doge. Bear with me! Step by step, and slow on blow, I will divide with you; Think not I waver:

Ah! no; it is the certainty of all Which I must do, doth make me tremble thus

But let these last and lingering thoughts have way,

To which you only and the night are conscious,

And both regardless; when the hour arrives, 'Tis mine to sound the knell, and strike the blow, Which shall unpeople many palaces,

And hew the highest genealogic trees Down to the earth, strew'd with their bleeding fruit, And crush their blossoms into barrenness:

This will I—must I—have I sworn to do, Nor ought can turn me from my destiny;

But still I quiver to behold what I Must be, and think what I have been! Dear with me.

Is. Ber. Re-man your breast; I feel so such remorse,

I understand it not; why should you change? You acted, and you act on your free will.

Doge. Ay, there it is—you feel not, nor do I, Else I should stab thee on the spot, to save

A thousand lives, and, killing, do no murder; You feel not—you go to this butcher-work

As if these high-born men were steers for slaughter.

When all is over, you'll be free and merry, And calmly wash those hands incarnadined;

But I, outdoing thee and all thy fellows In this surpassing massacre, shall be,

Shall see, and feel—oh God! oh God! 'tis true—

And thou dost well to answer that it was "My own free will and act," and yet you err,

For wilt do this? Doubt not—fear not! I Will not resign your most unmerciful accomplices!

And yet I act no more on my free will, Nor my own feelings—both compel me back;

But there is left within me and around, And, like the demon who believes and trembles,

Must I abhor and do. Away! away! Get thee into thy fellows, I will hit me

To gather the retainers of our house. Doubt not, Saint Mark's great bell shall wake all Venice, Except her slaughter'd senate; ere the sun

Be broad upon the Adriatic, there Shall be a voice of weeping, which shall drown

The roar of waters in the cry of blood! am resolved—come on.

Bertram, who is guilty of weakness rather than treachery, goes to his friend and patron Lioni, and cautions him not to go forth on the day of the intended massacre. Lioni, unable to gain the secret, secures Bertram. There is one passage in this scene which strikes us as peculiarly happy, and we quote it. Bertram says,—

'I come

To save patrician blood, and not to shed it! And thereunto I must to speedily, for Each minute may lose a life; since Time Has changed his slow a-the for the two-edged sword!

And is about to take, instead of sand, The dust from sepulchres, to fill his hour-glass.'

We cannot omit noticing another fine soliloquy of the Doge, which is when he has despatched his nephew to commence the dreadful work, and is waiting the issue:—

'Doge (solus.) He is gone,

And each footstep moves a life—'Tis done Now the destroying angel hovers o'er

Venice, and pauses ere he pours the vial, Even as the eagle o'erlooks his prey,

And for a moment, poised in middle air, Suspends the motion of his mighty wings,

Then swoops with his unerring beak—'Tis done!

That slowly walk't the waters! march—march on—

I would not smite t' the dark, but rather see That no stroke err. And you, ye black waves!

I have seen you dyed ere now, and deeply too, With Genoa's, Saracen, and Hunnish gore;

While that of Venice flow'd too, but victorious! Now thou must wear an unmix'd crimson; no

Barbaric blood can reconcile us now Unto that horrible incarnadine,

But fiend or foe will roll in civic slaughter. And have I lived to fouscore years for this?

I, who was named Preserver of the City? I, at whose name the million's caps were flung

Into the air, and cries from tens of thousands Rose up, imploring Heaven to send me blessing,

And fame, and length of days—to see this day? But this day, black within the calendar,

Shall be succeeded by a bright millennium. Doge Dandolo survived to ninety summers

To vanquish empires, and refuse their crowns; I will resign a crown, and make the state

Renew its freedom—but oh! by what means! The noble end must justify the means—What

Are a few drops of human blood? 'tis false, The blood of tyrants is not human; they,

Like to incarnate Moloches, feed on ours, Until 'tis time to give them to the tombs

Which they have made so populous—Oh world!

Oh men! what are ye, and our best designs, That we must work by crime to punish crime?

And slay as if Death had but this one gate, When a few years would make the sword superfluous?

And I, upon the verge of th' unknown realm, Yet send so many heralds on before me!—

I must not ponder this. (A pause.)

Mark! was there not A murmur as of some distant voices, and

The tramp of feet to martial music? What phantoms even of sound out white raise!

It cannot be—the signal hath not rung—
Why pauses it? my nephew's messenger
Should be upon his way to me, and he Himself perhaps even now draws grating back Upon its ponderous hinge the steep tower portal,
Where swings the sullen huge circular bell,
Which never knells but for a princely death,
Or for a state in peril, pealing forth
Tremendous bodements; let it do its office,
And be this peal its awfullest and last.
Sound till the strong tower rock!—What! silent still?

I would go forth, but that my post is here,
To be the centre of re-union to
The oft discordant elements which form
Leagues of this nature, and to keep compact
The wavering or the weak, in case of conflict;
For if they should do battle, 'twill be here,
Within the palace, that the strife will thicken;
Then here must be my station, as becomes
The master-mover.—Hark! he comes—he comes,
My nephew, brave Bertuccio's messenger.—
What tidings! is he marching? hath he sped!—
They here! all's lost—yet will I make an effort.

The Doge is arrested and brought before the Great Council, where he confesses the accusation against him. His wife, Angiolina, intercedes that his life may be spared, but the Council condemn him to immediate death. The scene in which this is described we quote at length:—

'The Court of the Ducal Palace: the outer gates are shut against the people.—The Doge enters in his ducal robes, in procession with the Council of Ten and other Patricians, attended by the Guards till they arrive at the top of the "Giant's Staircase," (where the Doge takes their oath); the executioner is stationed there with his sword.—On arriving, a Chief of the Ten takes off the ducal cap from the Doge's head.

Doge. So now the Doge is nothing, and at last

I am again Marino Faliero:
This will be to me, so though but for a moment.
Here I was crown'd, and here, bear witness,
Heaven!

With how much more contentment I resign
That shining mockery, the ducal bauble,
Than I received the fatal ornament.

One of the Ten.
Thou tremblest, Faliero!

Doge. 'Tis with age, then.
Ben. Faliero! hast thou aught further to command,

Compatible with justice, to the senate?

Doge. I would commend my nephew to their mercy,

My consent to their justice; for methinks
My death, and such a death, might settle all
Between the state and me.

Ben. They shall be cared for;
Even withoutstanding these unheard-of crimes.

Doge. Unheard-of! ay, there's not a history
But shows a thousand crow'ded conspirators
Against the people; but to set them free
Once sovereign only died, and one is dying.

Ben. And who were they who fell to such a cause?

Doge. The King of Sparta and the Doge of Venice—

Agio and Faliero!

Ben. Hast thou more
To utter or to do!
Doge. May I speak?
Ben. Thou may'st it;
But recollect the people are without,
Beyond the compass of the human voice.
Doge. I speak to Time and to Eternity,
Of which I grow a portion, not to man.
Ye elements! in which to be resolved
I have; let my voice be as a spirit Upon you! Ye blue waves! which bore my banner,
Ye winds! which flutter'd o'er as if you loved
it,
And fill'd my swelling sails as they were wafted
To many a triumph! Thou, my native air,
Which I have bled for, and thou foreign earth,
Which drank this willing blood from many a wound!

Ye storms, in which my gore will not sink, but Reek up to Heaven! Ye skies, which will receive it!
Thou sun! which shinest on these things, and Thou!
Who kindest and who quenchest suns!—Attest!

I am not innocent—last are these guiltless:
I perish, but not unavenged; far ages
Flout up from the abyss of time to me,
And show these eyes, before they close, the doom

Of this proud city, and I leave my curse
On her and her's for ever!—Yes, the hours
Are silently engendering of the day,
When she, who built against Attila a bulwark,
Shall yield, and bloodlessly and basely yield Unto a bastard Attila, without Shedding so much blood in her last defence
As these old veins, oft drain'd in shielding her,
Shall pour in sacrifice.—She shall be bought And sold, and be an appanage to those Who shall despise her!—She shall stoop to be
A province for an empire, petty town
In lieu of capital, with slaves for senators,
Beggars for nobles, pandars for a people!
Then, when the Hebrew's in thy palaces,
The Hun in thy high places, and the Greek Walks o'er thy mast, and smiles on it for his;
When thy patricians beg their bitter bread
In narrow streets, and in their shameful need
Make their nobility a plea for pity;
Then, when the few who still remain a wreck
Of thy great fathers' heritage, shall fawn
Round a barbarian Vice of King's Vice-gerent, Even in the palace where they sway'd as sovereigns,

Eyes in the palace where they slew their sovereign.

Proud of some name they have disgraced, or sprung

From an adulterous boastful of her guilt
With some large gondoller or foreign soldier,
Shall bear about their bastardy in triumph
To the third spurious generation; when Thy sons are in the lowest scale of being, Slaves turn'd o'er to the vanquish'd by the victors,

Despised by cowards for greater cowardice,
And scorn'd even by the vicious for such vice
As in the monstrous grasp of their conception
Defy all eodes to image or to name them;
Then, when of Cyprus, now thy subject kingdom,

All this inheritance shall be her shame
Brought on thy less virtuous descendants, grown
A wider ground for worse prostitution;—

When all the ill of conquer'd states shall cling
thee,

Vice without splendour, sin without relief

Even from the gloss of love to smooth it o'er,
But in its stead coarse huts of habitude,
Furient yet passionless, cold studied lewdness
Depaving nature's frailty to an art:—
When these and more are heavy on thee, when Smiles without mirth, and pastimes without pleasure,
Youth without honour, age without respect,
Meanness and weakness, and a sense of woe
Gaiest which thou wilt not strive, and dar'st not murmur,
Have made thee last and worst of peopled deserts:

Then, in the last gasp of thine agony,
Amidst thy many murders, think of mine!
Thou den of drunkards with the blood of princes!
Gehenna of the waters! thou sea Sodom!
Thou I devote thee to the infernal gods!
Thee and thy serpent seed!

[Here the DOGE turns and addresses the Executioner.]
Slave, do thine office!
Strike as I struck the foe! Strike as I would Have struck those tyrants! Strike deep as thy curse!
Strike—and but once!

[The DOGE throws himself upon his knees, and as the Executioner raises his sword the scene closes.]

The great length to which we have extended our extracts leaves us little room for critical remarks. The tragedy is certainly a noble production, and worthy of the pen of its distinguished author. The characters of Marino Faliero and Israel Bertuccio, are powerfully drawn, and throughout the whole tragedy there is a vigour and a tone of eloquence which leaves modern tragedies at an immeasurable distance. One of the characters, that of Bertram, will remind the reader of Jaffier in Venice Preserved; nor is that the only thing which will often remind him both of Otway and Shakespear. The hunters after plagiarisms will, we don't not, be again at work, and like those who would deny the glory of the sun because it has spots, will seek to nibble at the fair fame of the public author, because a similarity of sentiment may happen between him and an earlier writer.

The 'Prophecy of Dante,' which follows this tragedy, consists of four cantos on the exile of the poet, the author intending to continue the subject in some future canto. Dante is supposed to address the reader in the interval between the conclusion of the divina commedia and his death, and, shortly before the latter event, foretelling the fortunes of Italy in the ensuing centuries. The whole poem, which possesses many beauties, is so connected that it is difficult even to detach a passage; we shall, however, select a portion of the last canto, which alludes to Michael Angelo, and the building of St. Peter's at Rome:—ogle ‘Alas!

Despair and Genius are too oft connected.
Within the ages which before me pass
Art shall resume and equal even the sway
With which Apelles and old Phidias
She held in Halla's forgotten day.
Ye shall be taught by Ruin to revive
The Grecian forms at least from their decay,
And Roman souls at last again shall live
In Roman words at last again shall live
And temples, loftier than the old temples, Give
New wonders to the world; and while still stands
The austere Pantheon, unto heaven shall soar
A dome, its image, while the base expands
Into a base surpassing all before,
Such as our flesh shall flock to kneel in: ne'er
Such sight hath been unfolded by a door
As this, to which all nations shall repair
And lay their sins at this huge gate of heaven.
And the bold Architect unto whose care
The daring charge to raise it shall be given, Whom all arts shall acknowledge as their lord,
Whether into the marble chaos driven
His genius bid the Hebrew, at whose word
Israel left Egypt, stop the waves in stone,
Or bides of hell be by his pencil pour'd
Over the dimm'd before the Judgment throne;
Such as I saw them, such as all shall see,
Or fancies he built of grandeur yet unknown,
The stream of his great thoughts shall spring
from me,
The Ghibelline, who traversed the three realms
Which form the empire of eternity.
Amidst the clash of words, and clang of helmets,
The age which I anticipate, no less
Shall be the Age of Beauty, and while whelms
Clammy the nations with distress,
The genius of my country shall arise,
A Order towering o'er the Wilderness,
I live in all its branches to all eyes,
Fragrant as fair, and recognized afar,
Wafting its native essence through the skies.
Sovereign shall pause amidst their sport of war,
Wean'd for an hour from blood, to turn and gaze
On canvas or on stone; and they who mar-
At beauty upon earth, compell'd to praise, Shall feel the power of that which they destroy;
And Art's mistaken gratitude shall raise
To tyrants who but take her for a toy
Emblems and monuments, and prostitute
Her charms to pottiffs proud, who but employ
The man of genius as the meanest brute
To bear a burthen, and to serve a need.
To sell his labours, and his soul to boot:
Who tells for nations may be poor indeed
But free; who sweats for monarchs is no
more
Than the gilt chamberlain, who, clothed and free'd,
Stands sleek and slavish, bowing at his door.
Oh! Power that rulest and inspirest! how
Is it that they on earth, whose earthly power
Is likeliest to be in heaven in outward show,
Least like to thee in attributes divine,
Tread on the universal necks that bow,
And then assure us that their rights are thine?
And how is it that they, the sons of fame,
Whose inspiration seems to them to shine
From high, that whom the nations oft name,
Must pass their days in penury or pain,

Or step to grandeur through the paths of shame,

And wear a deeper brand and gaudier chain?

This poem opens a fine field for his lordship's talents, and when he comes to detail the more recent events in the history of Italy, he will have a noble theme for his muse. In conclusion, we cannot but think, that high as his lordship's reputation already stands, it will be considerably raised by the volume before us. We confess that we did not think he would have succeeded so well in a dramatic effort. We expected many beautiful and striking passages and much originality; but we did not think that the unity and connection of the incidents would have been so well maintained. The tragedy has already been produced on the stage, for an account of which we must refer to our dramatic review.

*Memoirs of the Life of the Right Honourable William Pitt. By George
Tomline, D. D. F. R. S. Lord
Bishop of Winchester. 4to. Vols.
I. and II. pp. 1203. London, 1821.*

There is, perhaps, no power on earth so despotic as that of the critic; he brings the whole world to the judgment seat, passes sentence on kings and princes with as little concern as on the meanest of their subjects, and will condemn an emperor with as much composure as the pope, in the heyday of his power, would feel in putting his foot on the neck of a rebellious prince.
Already have we in the present number passed judgment on a lay peer, and now a spiritual one is brought before us, and that a prelate of one of the richest sees in the country.

The life of Mr. Pitt, who directed the counsels of Great Britain during the most eventful period of its history, must at all times be interesting; but it becomes doubly so when the rank, talents, and opportunities of his present biographer are considered. The Bishop of Winchester superintended Mr. Pitt's education at the University; he afterwards became his confidential secretary, and, during his whole life, kept up a constant communication with him upon all matters connected with his official situation, having lived with him from the beginning of their acquaintance to the hour of his death, in the most unreserved and uninterrupted intimacy; and lastly, having, as one of his executors, access to all his papers.

These are advantages rarely united in the biographer, and give to the present work a value which memoirs seldom possess. Indeed, it perhaps may be said that Mr. Pitt's life was so identified with the events of the time, that little of him remains to be known to the public; but to an individual, who, like the Bishop of Winchester, has been behind the curtain, and 'through her loop-holes of retreat' has 'peeped at such a world,' there must have appeared much that was kept from public view. The two volumes now published only form a portion of the work, and bring the life of Mr. Pitt down to the declaration of war by France in 1793, a remarkable epoch in the life of the premier, and in the history of his country. The remaining portion, it is expected, will be comprized in one volume, 'for which,' says the right reverend author, 'I reserve what relates to Mr. Pitt's private life, and arduous as has been the task of describing his ministerial conduct, I foresee far greater difficulty in giving a just notion of his manners, temper, and disposition, which I always considered as constituting the most extraordinary part of his character.'

The religious and political principles of the Bishop of Winchester are well known; in the former, his rank in the church indicates his orthodoxy, and in the latter, it must be expected that the friend and companion of Pitt was an advocate of his principles. In advocating these, however, our author has not departed from that liberality which ought to guide every discussion.
We now close our remarks to take a hasty review of the life of this distinguished individual.

Mr. Pitt, the second son of the great Lord Chatham, was born on the 28th of May, 1759. In his youth he made rapid progress in his learning; in the year 1773, his father designing the law to be his profession, sent him for the completion of his education to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge; but, on account of his tender age, and the extreme delicacy of his constitution, his former tutor, Mr. Wilson, afterwards canon of Windsor, lived with him in the college apartment; his studies were, however, under the direction of his present biographer. At this early age,
Mr. Pitt's proficiency in the learned languages was so very great, that in Latin authors he seldom met with difficulty, and it was no uncommon thing for him to read into English six or seven pages of Thucydides, which he had not previously seen, without more than two or three mistakes and sometimes without even one. Nor was it in learning only that Mr. Pitt was so much superior to persons of his age. 'Though a boy in years and appearance, his manners were formed and his behaviour manly. He mixed in conversation with unaffected vivacity; and delivered his sentiments with perfect ease, equally free from shyness and flippancy, and always with strict attention to propriety and decorum.' While at college, he was regular in his studies and habits, and in the discharge of his religious duties, never omitted to attend chapel morning and evening. When a child, he had been taught to read the Bible by his father, and he appears never to have forgotten it:—

'I had frequent opportunities of observing Mr. Pitt's accurate knowledge of the Bible; and I may, I trust, be allowed to mention the following anecdote: In the year 1797, I was reading with him, in manuscript, my Exposition of the First of the Thirty-nine Articles, which I afterwards published in the Elements of Christian Theology. There were several quotations from Scripture, all of which he remembered, and made no observation upon them. At last, we came to a quotation, at which he stopped and said, "I do not recollect that passage in the Bible, and it does not sound like Scripture." It was a quotation from the Apocrypha, which he had not read.'

It was not only in language, but also in mathematics and philosophy, that Mr. Pitt's attainments were considerable. He was a great admirer of Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding; he had an elegant taste for the beauties of the English poets, and, when young, occasionally wrote verses. In May, 1778, Mr. Pitt lost his father: this illustrious statesman saw, with 'prophetic ken,' the future greatness of his son. This, as well as his affectionate heart and amiable character, appear in the following letters. The first is written by Lord Chatham to Mr. Pitt upon his going to the University in 1773:—

'Burton Pynsent, Oct. 9th, 1773.

'Thursday's post brought us no letter from the dear traveller. We trust this day will prove more satisfactory; it is the happy day that gave us your brother, and will not be less in favour with all here, if it should give us, about four o'clock, an epistle from my dear William. By that hour, I reckon, we shall be warm in our cups, and shall not fail to pour forth, with renewed joy, grateful libations over the much wished tidings of your prosperous progress towards your destination. We compute, that yesterday brought you to the venerable aspect of alma mater; and that you are invested to-day with the toga virilis. Your race of manly virtue, and useful knowledge is now begun, and may the favour of heaven smile upon the noble career!

'"Little ——— was really disappointed at not being in time to see you—a good mark for my young vivid friend. He is just as much compounded of the elements of air and fire as he was. A due proportion of terrestrial solidity will, I trust, come, and make him perfect. How happy, my loved boy, is it, that your mamma and I can tell ourselves, there is at Cambridge one, without a beard, and all the elements so mixed in him, that nature might stand up, and say, this is a man." I now take leave for to-day, not meaning this for what James calls a regular letter, but a flying thought, that wings itself towards my absent William. Horses are ready, and all is birth-day.

'Bradshaw has shone, this auspicious morning, in a very fine speech of congratulation; but I foresee, 'his sun sets weeping in the lowly west'; that is, a fatal bowl of punch will, before night, quench this luminary of oratory. Adieu, again and again, sweet boy; and if you acquire health and strength every time I wish them to you, you will be a second Sampson, and, what is more, will, I am sure, keep your hair.

'Every good wish attend your kind fellow traveller and chum; nor will be forgot in our flowing bowls to-day."

'To this interesting letter, Lady Chatham added the following postscript:

'If more could be said expressive of feelings, my dearest dear boy, I would add a letter to this epistle, but as it is composed, I will only sign to its expressive contents,

'Your fond and loving mother,

'HESTER CHATHAM.'

In another letter, dated a few days afterwards, he recommends his son, then in a bad state of health, to let his ardour be kept in until he is stronger, when he 'will make noise enough.' As every thing relating to Lord Chatham is interesting, we cannot deny ourselves the pleasure of quoting two more of his letters to his son:—

'Hayes, Sept. 2, 1777.

'I write, my dearest William, the post just going out, only to thank you for your most welcome letter, and for the affectionate anxiety you express for my situation, left behind in the hospital, when our flying camp moved to Stowe. Gont has for the present subsided, and seems to intend deferring his favours till winter, if autumn will do its duty, and bless us with a course of steady weather; those days, which Madame de Sevigné so beautifully paints, des jours filés d'or et de soie.

'I have the pleasure to tell you, your mother and sisters returned perfectly well from Bucks, warm in praises of magnificent and princely Stowe; and full of due sentiments of the agreeable and kind reception they found there. No less than two dancings, in the short time they passed there. One escape from a wasp's nest, which proved only an adventure to talk of, by the incomparable skill and presence of mind of Mr. Cotton, driving our girls in his carriage with four very fine horses, and no postillion. They fell into an ambuscade of wasps more fierce than Pandours, who best these courtes of spirit not inferior to Xanthus and Pordages, and stung them to madness; when disdaining the master's hand, he turned them short into a hedge, threw some of them, as he meant to do; and leaping down, seized the bridles of the leaders, which afforded time for your sisters to get out safe and sound, their honor, in point of courage, intact, as well as their bones: for they are celebrated not a little on their composure in this alarming situation. I rejoice that your times passes to your mind, in the evacuated seat of the Muses. However, knowing that those heavenly ladies (unlike the London fair) delight most, and spread their choicest charms and treasures in sweet retired solitude, I won't wonder that their true votary is happy to be alone with them. Mr. Preytmann will by no means spoil company, and I wish you joy of his return. How many commons have you lost of late? Whose fences have you broken; and in what lord of the manor's pound have any strays of science been found, since the famous adventure of catching the horses with such admirable address and alacrity? I beg my affectionate compliments to Mr. Wilson, and hope you will both beware of an inclosed country for the future. Little James is still with us, doing penance for the high living so well described to you in Mr. Pam's excellent epistle. All loves follow my sweetest boy in more abundance than I have time or ability to express.

'I desire my best compliments to the kind and obliging mother, who loves Cicero and you."

'My readers will be sorry to learn, that the following is the last letter of Lord Chatham, which I am able to submit to their perusal; it was written only seven or eight months before his death.'

'Hayes, Sept. 27, 1777.

'How can I employ my reviving pen so well as by addressing a few lines to the hope and comfort of my life, my dear William? You will have pleasure to see, under my own hand, that I mend every day, and that I am all but well. I have been this morning to Camden-place, and sustained, most manfully, a visit, and all the idle talk thereof, for above an hour by Mr. Norman's clock; and returned home, untired, to dinner, where I eat like a farmer. Lord Mahon has confounded, not convinced, the incorrigible sol-disant Dr. Wilson. Dr. Franklin's lightning, rebel as he is, stands proved the more innocent; and Wilson's nobis must yield to the pointed conductors. On Friday, Lord Mahon's indetachable spirit is to exhibit another incendum, to lord mayor, foreign ministers, and all lovers of philosophy and the good of society; and means to illuminate the horizon with a little bonfire of twelve hundred faggots and a double edifice. Had our dear friend been born sooner, Nero and the second Charles could never have amused themselves by reducing to ashes the two noblest cities in the world. My hand begins to demand repose;—so, with my best compliments to Aristotle, Homer, Thucydides, Xenophon, not forgetting the civilians, and law of nations tribe, adieu, my dearest William.

“Your ever most affectionate father,
“CHATHAM.”

Mr. Pitt was called to the bar in June, 1780, and went the Western Circuit that year. At the general election in that year, he was an unsuccessful candidate to represent the University of Cambridge in parliament; but, in January, 1781, he was returned for the borough of Appleby in Westmoreland. Mr. Pitt's public life was at a very critical and important moment. The country was engaged in war with North America, France, Spain, and Holland, without a single ally to assist her. In India, the native powers had entered into a formidable confederacy to expel the British from the country. At home, affairs were not more favourable; repeated failures in our naval and military operations had lowered the spirit of the people and weakened their confidence in government; trade was in a depressed state; there was a deficiency in the revenues, and the resources of the country were considered as nearly exhausted. How vast these resources still were, Mr. Pitt afterwards proved:—

“On the 20th of February, a circumstance of a very remarkable nature occasioned Mr. Pitt to make his first speech in the House of Commons. The subject of debate was, Mr. Burke's bill for economical reform in the civil list. Lord Nugent was speaking against the bill; and Mr. Byng, member for Middlesex, knowing Mr. Pitt's sentiments upon the measure, asked him to reply to his lordship. Mr. Pitt gave a doubtful answer; but in the course of Lord Nugent's speech, he determined not to reply to him. Mr. Byng, however, understood that Mr. Pitt intended to speak after Lord Nugent; and the moment his lordship sat down, Mr. Byng, and several of his friends, to whom he had communicated Mr. Pitt's supposed intention, called out, in the manner usual in the House of Commons, Mr. Pitt's name as being about to speak. This, probably, prevented any other person from rising; and Mr. Pitt, finding himself thus called upon, and observing that the house waited to hear him, thought it necessary to rise. Though really not intending to speak, he was from the beginning collected and unembarrassed; he argued strongly in favour of the bill, and noticed all the objections which had been urged by the noble lord who immediately preceded him in the debate, in a manner which greatly astonished all who heard him. Never were higher expectations formed of any person upon his first coming into parliament, and never were expectations more completely answered. They were indeed much more than answered; such were the fluency and accuracy of language, such the perspicuity of arrangement, and such the closeness of reasoning, and manly and dignified elocution—generally, even in a much less degree, the fruits of long habit and experience—that it could scarcely be believed to be the first speech of a young man, not yet two-and-twenty.

On the following day, Mr. Pitt, knowing his anxiety upon every subject which related to him, with his accustomed kindness, wrote to me at Cambridge, to inform me, that “he had heard his own voice in the House of Commons;” and modestly expressed his satisfaction at the manner in which his first attempt at parliamentary speaking had been received.”

Mr. Pitt spoke three times in the course of that session, and appears to have made a considerable impression. Mr. Fox estimated his talents from the first. Of this we have the following evidence:—

“After the close of the session in which Mr. Pitt made these three speeches, a friend of Mr. Fox told me, that upon his saying to Mr. Fox: “Mr. Pitt, I think, promises to be one of the first speakers ever heard in the House of Commons.” Mr. Fox instantly replied, “He is so already.” From this and other testimonies, it appears, that Mr. Fox was very early impressed with a high idea of Mr. Pitt's talents. It ought to be mentioned, to the mutual credit of these two great men, that in future life, when they were the leaders of two opposite parties, and the supporters of different systems of politics, they always in private spoke of each other's abilities with the highest respect. Mr. Fox, at a late period of Mr. Pitt's first administration, said, that “he had been narrowly watching Mr. Pitt for many years, and could never catch him tripping once; and in conversation with me, I always noticed, that Mr. Pitt considered Mr. Fox as far superior to any of his opponents, as a debater in the House of Commons.”

On the circuit in that year, he was employed in several election causes of great interest; and of his forensic talents we have the following account, furnished the author by a gentleman who was very intimate with Mr. Pitt:—

“Among lively men of his own time of life Mr. Pitt was always the most lively and convivial in the many hours of leisure which occur to young unoccupied men on a circuit; and joined all the little excursions to Southampton, Weymouth, and such parties of amusement as were habitually formed. He was extremely popular. His name and reputation of high acquisitions at the university, commanded the attention of his seniors. His wit, his good humour, and joyous manners, endeared him to the younger part of the bar. In some bribery causes from Criclade, he was retained as junior counsel; but even in that subordinate character, he had an opportunity of arguing a point of evidence with extraordinary ability. I remember, also, in an action of crim. con. at Exeter, as junior counsel, he manifested such talents in cross-examination, that it was the universal opinion of the bar, that he should have led the cause. During his short stay in the profession, he never had occasion to address a jury; but upon a motion in the court of king's bench, for an habeas corpus to bring up a man to be bailed, who was charged with murder, Mr. Pitt made a speech which excited the admiration of the bar, and drew down very complimentary approbation from Lord Mansfield. When he first made his brilliant display in parliament, those at the bar who had seen little of him, expressed surprise; but a few who had heard him once speak in a sort of mock debate at the Crown and Anchor tavern, when a club, called the Western Circuit Club, was dissolved, agreed, that he had then displayed all the various species of eloquence, for which he was afterwards celebrated. Before he distinguished himself in the House of Commons, he certainly looked seriously to the law as a profession. The late Mr. Justice Rooke told me, that Mr. Pitt dangled seven days with a junior brief and a single guinea fee, waiting till a cause of no sort of importance should come on in the court of common pleas. At Mr. Pitt's instance, an annual dinner took place for some years at Richmond Hill, the party consisting of Lord Erskine, Lord Redesdale, Sir William Grant, Mr. Boud, Mr. Lyster, Mr. Jekyll, and others; and I well remember a dinner, with Mr. Pitt and several of his private friends, at the Bear's Head in Eastcheap, in celebration of Shakespeare's Falstaff. We were all in high spirits, quoting and alluding to Shakespeare the whole day; and it appeared, that Mr. Pitt was as well and familiarly read in the poet's works as the best Shakespeareans present. But to speak of his conviviality is needless. After he was minister, he continued to ask his old circuit intimates to dine with him, and his manners were unaltered.”

In all the debates which took place for the removal of Lord North and his colleagues from office, Mr. Pitt took a very prominent part. He frequently suggested modes of proceeding when difficulties occurred; he constantly replied to the principal speakers on the opposite side; and though he had been scarcely twelve months in parliament, and was not yet twenty-three years of age, he answered their arguments and objections with the readiness and exactness of the most experienced debater, and in a style of oratory so dignified and brilliant that, at this early dawn, he was compared to his illustrious father in his meridian splendour.' In the Rockingham administration, Mr. Pitt was offered several situations, but he refused them, and soon afterwards publicly declared that he would never accept an office which did not entitle him to a seat in the cabinet. In noticing Mr. Pitt's motion for a Reform in Parliament, his biographer gives us his opinion on this much agitated question, which not only contains a good deal of feasible argument, but also exhibits so much candour that we cannot forego the pleasure of quoting it, as illustrative of the truth of a preliminary remark we made as to the liberality of the author. He is speaking of the fate of Mr. Pitt's motion, which was lost by a majority of twenty:—

'It is not to be inferred from this majority, that no defect was supposed to exist in the present construction of the House of Commons, and no departure to have taken place from the original plan of representation. The ground on which the motion was opposed was this, that it may be wiser to submit to certain deviations and irregularities in an established form of government, rather than, by attempting to correct them, to hazard the safety of the whole fabric. A practice may indeed prevail, utterly indefensible in theory, and irreconcilable with the design of the framers of a political institution, and yet, from the changes, to which time subjects every community, may not be mischievous in its nature, and may even be productive of beneficial effects. It is, for instance, a principle of our House of Commons, that its members should be chosen by the unbiased votes of their constituents. But the fact is, that a considerable number of the members are chosen through the influence of persons, who, from private connexions or various other causes, happen to have weight with the voters; and that seats in parliament, to a certain extent, are obtained through pecuniary means, as was acknowledged without scruple in the debate upon Mr. Pitt's motion. This, it will be admitted on all hands, was never in the contemplation of our ancestors, but still no material harm seems likely to result from it, while confined to its present bounds; and, perhaps, upon the whole, the good may preponderate. The two things chiefly to be desired in the House of Commons are, that it should be open, first, to persons of extensive property of every species, who, from their large stake in the country, will be most studious to consult and provide for its real interests; and, secondly, to men, who, by possessing superior talents, will be best able to promote the welfare, and raise the glory, of the nation. Members of the former description, who have been truly independent, and of the latter, who have been highly distinguished, have been introduced into parliament, by means of what are called close and rotten boroughs, among whom may be reckoned Lord Chatham, Lord North, Mr. Fox, and Mr. Pitt. View the question in another light: it is the duty of the House of Commons, both to direct the concerns of the kingdom at large, and to watch over and protect the particular interests of all those various classes of persons, of which the community consists; and the present diversity of the elective franchise affords an opportunity to men of all the liberal professions and respectable situations in life to become members of the House of Commons; men of landed property, monied men, merchants, bankers, officers in the army and navy, lawyers, civilians, diplomatists, and those who, from consciousness of ability, are ambitious to serve their king and country in some political department. Hence, not only every order in society has its guardians in the great council of the nation to prevent any partially oppressive or injurious measure, but the House of Commons has among its members persons, who can, from their own knowledge and experience, give information upon any point under deliberation, and suggest proposals upon subjects to which they have directed their attention, and in which the public good may be concerned. This great variety of characters in the members, is of itself attended with important advantages; and were they entirely or principally chosen from any single description of men, the worst consequences must inevitably ensue. Whatever defects, therefore, there may be in the present system of representation, and however short it may fall of ideal perfection, it seems no wonder, that the House of Commons, as now elected, should have been considered well calculated for all the practical purposes of one branch of a free government; and that it should have been decided, that there was no benefit in view sufficient to justify the risk, which must have been incurred by any alteration.'

THE PERCY ANECDOTES.

THE brothers Percy appear to calculate largely, and we suspect justly, on the avidity of the public for anecdote; as they still pour out from their abundant stores, their monthly portion, and still succeed in finding variety to the collection. Of the whole series, which
